

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

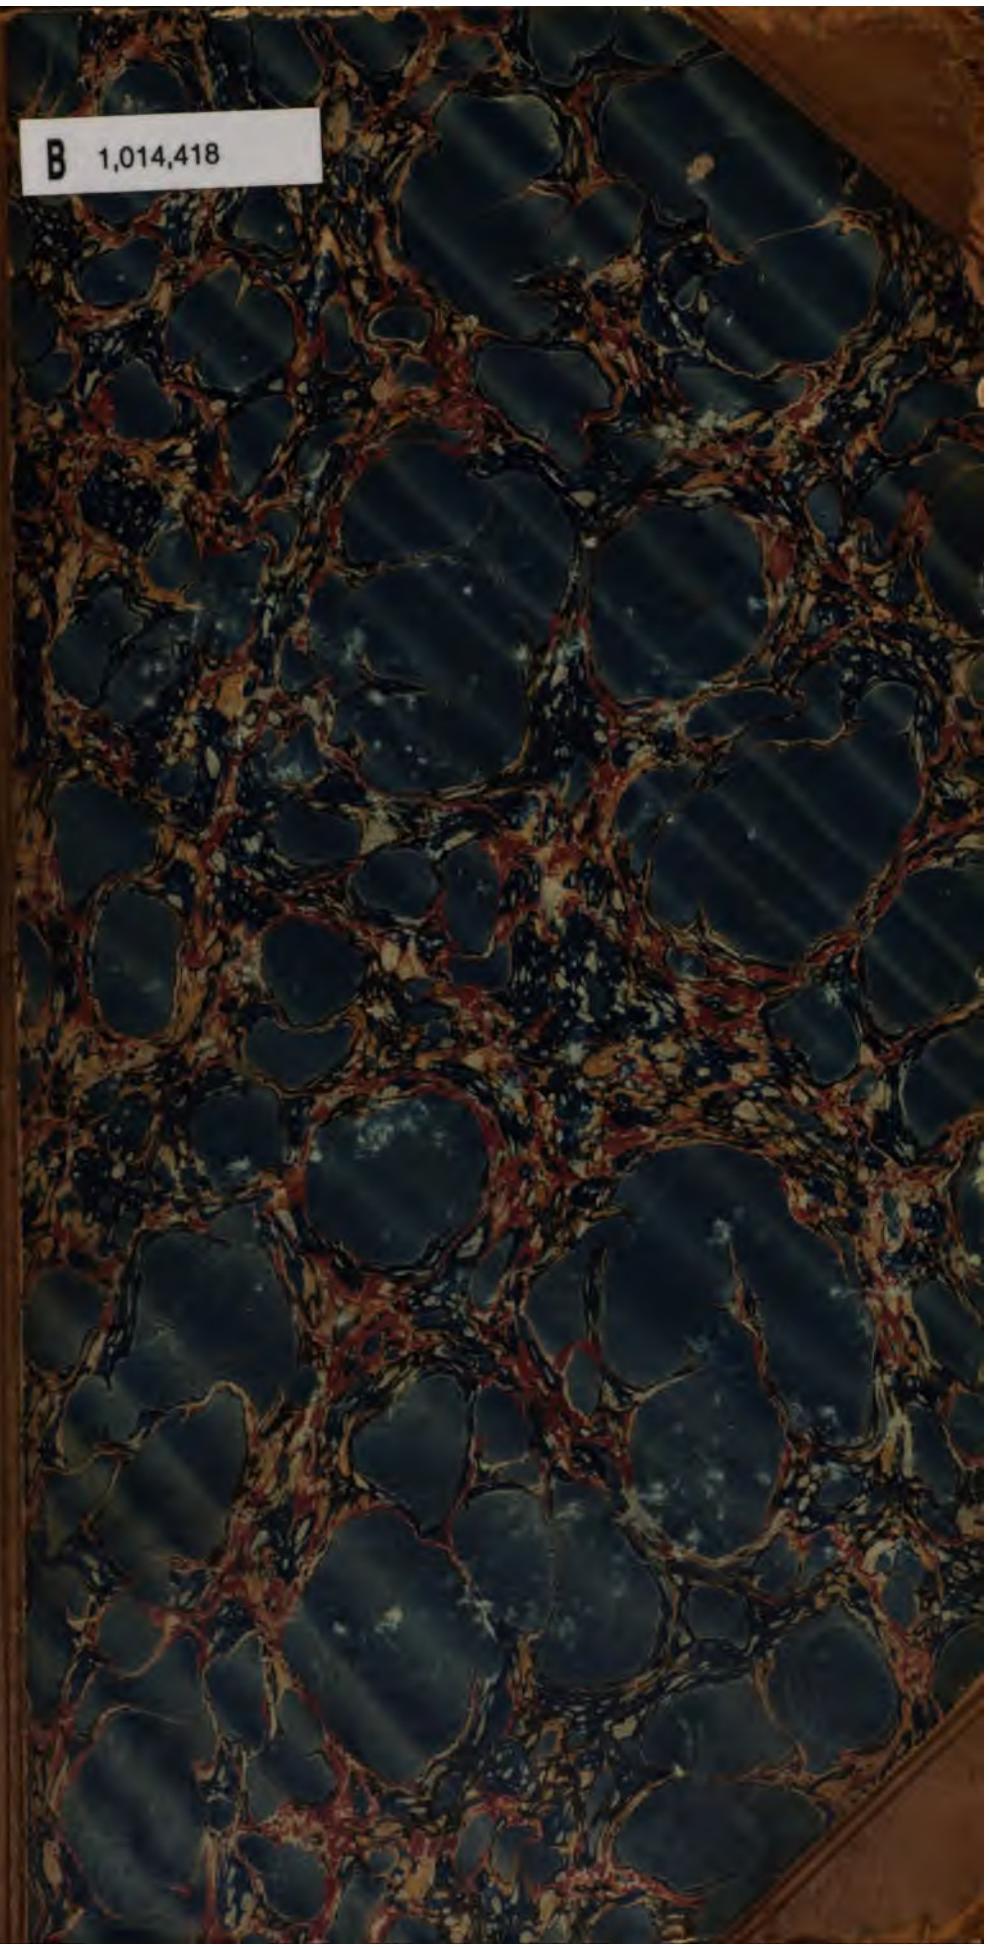

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

B 1,014,418

GENERAL LIBRARY
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN.

THE
Hagerman Collection

OF BOOKS RELATING TO HISTORY AND POLITICAL SCIENCE

BOUGHT WITH MONEY PLACED BY JAMES J. HAGERMAN OF CLASS OF '61

IN THE HANDS OF Professor Charles Kendall Adams

IN THE YEAR

1883.

HANSARD'S
PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,
THIRD SERIES:

COMMENCING WITH THE ACCESSION OF
WILLIAM IV.

36° & 37° VICTORIAE, 1873.

---

VOL. CCXVII.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE EIGHTH DAY OF JULY 1873,
TO
THE FIFTH DAY OF AUGUST 1873.

---

Fourth and Last Volume of the Session.

---

LONDON:
PUBLISHED BY CORNELIUS BUCK,
AT THE OFFICE FOR "HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES," 23, PATERNOSTER ROW. [E.C.]

---

1873.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

(3) 11

ANSWER

2000-02-01

卷之三十一

On the other hand, the results of the A and T are rather similar, and the two species seem to have been derived from a common ancestor.

Geologic Features of the Gulf Coast

Bijlmer en de Gouwe, 2019, 16(1) and the other two were captured in the same manner. The last was captured by a Mr. W. H.

McGillivray, who was engaged in shooting at a deer.

$$\frac{d}{dt} \left( \frac{\partial \mathcal{L}}{\partial \dot{x}_i} \right) = \frac{\partial^2 \mathcal{L}}{\partial x_i \partial t} \ddot{x}_i + \frac{\partial^2 \mathcal{L}}{\partial \dot{x}_i \partial t} \dot{x}_i + \frac{\partial^2 \mathcal{L}}{\partial x_i \partial \dot{x}_i} v_i + \frac{\partial^2 \mathcal{L}}{\partial \dot{x}_i \partial \dot{x}_i} \ddot{x}_i$$

Journal of Oral Rehabilitation 2003; 30: 633-642 © 2003 Blackwell Publishing Ltd, <http://www.blackwell-science.com/jor>, 10.1002/jor.10092

TABLE OF CONTENTS

TO

VOLUME CCXVII.

THIRD SERIES.

LORDS, TUESDAY, JULY 8.	Page
PRIVILEGE—THE APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF THIS HOUSE—SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE BILL—Observations, Earl Granville ; Reply, Lord Cairns .. . . . .	1
Canada Loan (Guarantee) Bill (No. 183)—
Moved , “That the Bill be now read 2 <sup>a</sup> ,”—( The Earl of Kimberley ) ..	4
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2 <sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.
Railway and Canal Traffic Bill (Nos. 172-211)—
Commons amendments to Lords amendments and Commons reasons for disagreeing to one of the amendments made by the Lords considered (according to Order) .. . . . .	8
Commons amendments to Lords amendments agreed to .
Moved , not to insist on the Amendment in Clause 25 to which the Commons have disagreed,—( The Lord President .)
After short debate, on Question, Whether to insist? their Lordships divided; Co-tents 79, Not-Contents 63; Majority 16:— Resolved in the Affirmative .
An amendment made to the said amendment; and a Committee appointed to prepare reasons to be offered to the Commons for the Lords insisting on their amendment.
PRIVILEGE—THE APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF THIS HOUSE—SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE BILL—Observations, Lord Cairns:—Short debate thereon .. . . . .	10
Gas and Water Works Facilities Act, 1870, Amendment Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Earl Couper); read 1<sup>a</sup> (No. 201) .. . . . .	34
VOL. COXVII. [THIRD SERIES.] [ b ]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JULY 8.		Page
INDIA —THE FOREST DEPARTMENT—COMPETITIONS—Question, Mr. Baker;	2
Answer, Mr. Grant Duff ..	35
THE TICHBORNE CASE —THE QUEEN v. CASTRO—Question, Mr. Whalley;
Answer, Mr. Bruce ..	36
THE ORDNANCE SURVEY —Question, Mr. Whalley; Answer, Mr. Ayrton ..	36
PARLIAMENT —QUESTIONS—RULES OF THE HOUSE—THE WAR DEPARTMENT BUILDINGS—Questions, Mr. Baillie Cochrane; Answers, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman ..	37
PARLIAMENT —RULES AND ORDERS OF THE HOUSE—CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1871—Question, Mr. Monckton; Answer, Mr. Speaker ..	38
Supreme Court of Judicature Bill [Long] [Bill 154]— Bill considered in Committee [Progress 7th July]	39
After some time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.
The House suspended its Sitting at ten minutes to Seven of the clock.
The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.
INTERNATIONAL LAW—ARBITRATION—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS — Moved , “That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to instruct Her Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to enter into communication with Foreign Powers with a view to further improvement in International Law and the establishment of a general and permanent system of International Arbitration,”—(Mr. Henry Richard)	52
After debate, Previous Question proposed, “That that Question be now put,”—(Viscount Enfield):—Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 88, Noes 98; Majority 10.
Division List, Ayes and Noes,	88
Main Question put, and agreed to.
Address to be presented by Privy Councillors.
Public Health Bill [Bill 99]— Order for Committee read :— Moved , “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,”—(Sir Charles Adderley).	90
After short debate, Moved , “That the Debate be now adjourned,”—(Mr. Dimsdale):—Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 36, Noes 92; Majority 56.
Question again proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,”— Moved , “That this House do now adjourn,”—(Mr. Knight):—Question put, and negatived.
Original Question put, and agreed to:— Bill considered in Committee ; Committee report Progress.
Moved , “That this House will, upon Friday next, again resolve itself into the said Committee.”
Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “Friday,” in order to insert the words “Tuesday the 12th day of August,”—(Mr. James Lowther,)—instead thereof.
Question put, “That the word ‘Friday,’ stand part of the Question:”—The House divided; Ayes 74, Noes 24; Majority 50.
Main Question put, and agreed to.
Resolved , That this House will, upon Friday next, again resolve itself into the said Committee.
Habitual Drunkards Bill [Bill 11]— Moved , “That the Order for the Second Reading be discharged,”—(Mr. D. Dalrymple)	95
Motion agreed to:—Order discharged:— Bill withdrawn .

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 9.	Page
Sale of Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill [Bill 52]—
Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Sir Dominic Corrigan)—	96
Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months,"—(Mr. Callan.)
Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question:"—After debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 83, Noes 140; Majority 57.
Words added:—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.—Second Reading put off for three months.
Municipal Boroughs Extension Bill [Bill 48]—
Moved, "That the Order for the Second Reading be discharged,"—(Mr. Henry Samuelson)—	120
After short debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Robert Fowler.)—After further short debate, Motion agreed to.
Moved, "That the Debate be adjourned till this day three months,"—(Mr. Henry Samuelson.)
Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 185; Noes 91; Majority 94.
Burials Bill [Bill 9]—
Order for Committee read:—Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"—(Mr. Osborne Morgan)	122
Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the said Order be discharged,"—(Mr. Pall)—instead thereof.
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."
After debate, it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.
LORDS, THURSDAY, JULY 10.
AFRICA—WEST COAST SETTLEMENTS—THE ASHANTEE INVASION—Question, The Earl of Carnarvon; Observations, The Earl of Lauderdale; Reply, The Earl of Kimberley	138
Statute Law Revision Bill (No. 174)—
House in Committee (according to Order)	140
Moved, to omit the reference to the section of the Emancipation Act with reference to the assumption of territorial tithes,—(The Lord Chancellor.)—Motion agreed to.
Amendment made:—Bill to be read 3 <sup>d</sup> To-morrow.
NAVY—PEBBLE POWDER—THE REVIEW AT PORTSMOUTH—Question, The Earl of Carnarvon; Answer, The Earl of Camperdown:—Short debate thereon	141
Public Schools (Eton College Property) Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Lord Lyttelton); read 1st (No. 204)	143
COMMONS, THURSDAY, JULY 10.
FRANCE—COMMERCIAL TREATY, 1873—EXPORT DUTY ON COAL—Question, Lord John Manners; Answer, Viscount Enfield	143
ARMY—"ADVANCED CLASS" EXAMINATIONS—Question, Sir John Lubbock; Answer, Mr. Cardwell	144
ROYAL MILITARY ACADEMY, WOOLWICH—GENTLEMEN CADETS—Question, Colonel Beresford; Answer, Mr. Cardwell	144

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 10.]	Page
LUNATIC ASYLUM BOARDS (IRELAND)—Question, Sir Dominic Corrigan; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	145
THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS—THE DERWENTWATER ESTATES—Question, Mr. T. E. Smith; Answer, Mr. Goschen	145
INDIA—REGULATIONS FOR EUROPEAN OFFICERS—PRIZE—Question, Colonel Stuart Knox; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff	146
MERCANTILE MARINE—LOSS OF LIFE AT SEA—Question, Mr. Alderman Lusk; Answer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue	147
ARMY—ABOLITION OF PURCHASE—MEMORIALS OF OFFICERS—Questions, Sir John Pakington, Major Arbuthnot; Answers, Mr. Cardwell	147
CHURCH OF ENGLAND—SACRAMENTAL CONFESSION—PETITION TO CONVENTION—Questions, Sir John Pakington; Answers, Mr. Bruce	148
ARMY—FIRST DEVON MILITIA—Question, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answer, Mr. Cardwell	149
CASE OF THE IRISH CIVIL SERVANTS—Questions, Mr. Plunket; Answer, Mr. Gladstone	149
CUSTOMS—EXTRA TREASURY CHIRKS—Question, Lord Elcho; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	150
ROYAL COMMISSION—MR. PLIMSOLL AND THE BOARD OF TRADE—Question, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue	151
NAVY—AGE OF CADETS—Question, Mr. Fitzwilliam Dick; Answer, Mr. Goschen	151
SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM—RETIREMENT OF MR. COLE—Question, Sir Henry Hoare; Answer, Mr. Ayrton	152
WAYS AND MEANS—POST OFFICE REVENUES—Question, Mr. White; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	153
IRELAND—DRAINAGE OF THE RIVERS SUCK AND SHANNON—Question, Major Trench; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	154
PRIVILEGE—THE APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS— SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE BILL—Explanation, Mr. Gladstone Moved, "That this House do now adjourn," —(Mr. Gladstone.) After debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.	154
Supreme Court of Judicature Bill (Lords) [Bill 154]
Bill considered in Committee [ Progress 8th July ]—	173
After some time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.
Turnpike Acts Continuance, &amp;c. Bill [Bill 156] Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [3rd July].
"That it be an Instruction to this Committee that they have power to make provision for rendering compulsory in England and Wales the Highway Acts 1862 and 1864."— (Lord George Cavendish.)
Question again proposed—Debate resumed—	191
Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned," —(Lord Henry Thynne.)—After further short debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 58, Noes 115; Majority 57.
Original Question again proposed:— Moved, "That this House do now adjourn," —(Mr. Clare Read.)—After short debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 44, Noes 116; Majority 72.
Original Question again proposed:— Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned," —(Colonel Parker.)—Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 46, Noes 104; Majority 38.
Original Question again proposed:— Moved, "That this House do now adjourn," —(Mr. Joshua Redden.)—Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 44, Noes 99; Majority 55.
Original Question again proposed:— Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned," —(Colonel Bartlelet.)—Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 40, Noes 94; Majority 54.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 10.]	Page
Turnpikes Acts Continuance, &amp;c. Bill—continued.
Original Question again proposed:— Moved , “That this House do now adjourn.”—Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 41, Noes 91; Majority 50.
Original Question again proposed:— Moved , “That the Debate be now adjourned,”—(Mr. Frederick Walpole):—Question put, and agreed to:—Debate adjourned, at half-past Three A.M., till this day (Friday).
Church Discipline Act Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. Whalley, Mr. Jones Parry); presented, and read the first time [Bill 234]	195
Regulation of Railways (Returns) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Chichester Fortescue, Mr. Arthur Peel); presented, and read the first time [Bill 232]	196
Treasury Chest Fund Bill—Ordered (Mr. William Henry Gladstone, Mr. Baxter); presented, and read the first time [Bill 233]	196
LORDS, FRIDAY, JULY 11.
ALDERNEY (HARBOUR AND FORTIFICATIONS)—Question, Observations, The Duke of Somerset; Reply, Viscount Halifax:—Short debate thereon	196
THE TURKO-PERSIAN BOUNDARY—Question, Observations, Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe; Reply, Earl Granville	201
Law Agents (Scotland) Bill (No. 163)—
House in Committee (according to Order): .....
Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Tuesday next; and Bill to be printed, as amended: (No. 207.)	203
Gas and Water Works Facilities Act (1870) Amendment Bill (No. 201)—
Moved , “That the Bill be now read 2 <sup>d</sup> ;”—(The Earl Cooper)	205
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2 <sup>d</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.
COMMONS, FRIDAY, JULY 11.
PARLIAMENT—STRANGERS ORDERED TO WITHDRAW	207
On Strangers being again admitted the House was proceeding with the “QUESTIONS.”
ARMY—SERVICE IN INDIA—LIMITATION OF ALLOWANCE—Question, Mr. W. M. Torrens; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman	209
INDIA—SCRIPTURE READERS—MR. SANDWELL—Question, Mr. Whalley; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff	210
NATIONAL EDUCATION COMMISSIONERS—THE CALLAN SCHOOLS—DISMISSAL OF REV. ROBERT O'KEEFFE—MOTION FOR COMMITTEE WITHDRAWN—
—Question, Observations, Mr. Bouvierie; Reply, Mr. Gladstone ..	210
PARLIAMENT—ORDER OF BUSINESS—Observations, Mr. Gladstone	213
Public Health Bill [Bill 99]—
Moved , “That the Order for Committee be read in order to its being discharged,”—(Sir Charles Adderley)	213
Motion agreed to:—Order read and discharged:—Bill withdrawn.
Supreme Court of Judicature Bill (Lords) [Bill 154]—
Bill considered in Committee, [Progress 10th July]	214
After some time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.
And it being now Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.
House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 11.]	Page
SUPPLY—Order for Committee read ; Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”	225
ARMY—THE VOLUNTEER FORCE—THE NEW REGULATIONS—RESOLUTION— Amendment proposed, To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, “it is expedient that inquiry should be made into the present state of the Volunteer Force, and into the causes that have led to the resignations of over 2,000 Officers’ Commissions, which are still vacant,”—(Colonel Charles Lindsay,) instead thereof	229
Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question ;”—After short debate, Question put, and agreed to.
Main Question, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,” proposed.
CHANCERY (FUNDS) ACT—THE ACCOUNTANT GENERAL IN CHANCERY— Observations, Mr. Dickinson ; Reply, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	263
THE TICHBORNE CASE—THE QUEEN v. CASTRO, ALIAS TICHBORNE—CONTEMPT OF COURT—Observations, Mr. Whalley ; Reply, Mr. Bruce	264
	[House counted out.]
 LORDS, MONDAY, JULY 14.
AFRICA—WEST COAST SETTLEMENTS—THE ASHANTEE INVASION—Question, The Duke of Buckingham ; Answer, The Earl of Kimberley	267
CHURCH ASSOCIATION—CONFESION IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND—MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE— Moved that a Select Committee be appointed to consider by what legislation or other means the danger apprehended of a considerable minority of the clergy and laity desiring to subvert the principles of the Reformation may be averted,—(The Lord Oranmore and Browne)	269
After debate, on Question ? Resolved in the Negative.
PERSIAN GOVERNMENT—CONCESSION TO BARON DE REUTER—ADDRESS FOR CORRESPONDENCE— Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copy of correspondence between Her Majesty’s Government and Baron de Reuter on the subject of the concession recently made by the Persian Government to him,—(The Earl of Carnarvon)	290
After short debate, Motion agreed to.
Steam Threshing Machines Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Earl of Morley); read 1 st (No. 210) .. .	301
 COMMONS, MONDAY, JULY 14.
PARLIAMENT—RULES AND ORDERS OF THE HOUSE AS TO STRANGERS— REPORTS OF THE DEBATES—Notices, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Mr. Mitchell Henry .. .	301
CRIMINAL LAW—THE WEAVERHAM COCK-FIGHTING CASE—Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor ; Answer, Mr. Bruce .. .	302
LAW AND JUSTICE—FOUR COURTS MARSHALSEA, DUBLIN—Question, Mr. Bruen ; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington .. .	303
GENERAL REGISTER AND RECORD OFFICE OF SHIPPING AND SEAMEN—THIRD CLASS CLERKS—Question, Lord George Hamilton ; Answer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue .. .	303
LICENSING ACT, 1872—WINE LICENCES TO GROCERS—Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson ; Answer, Mr. Bruce .. .	304
CUSTOMS OUT-PORT CLERKS—Question, Viscount Sandon ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer .. .	305
ARMY—GLANDERS AT LEEDS BARRACKS—THE 12TH LANCERS—Questions, Colonel Barttelot, Colonel Leigh ; Answers, Sir Henry Storkes .. .	306

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 14.]	Page
THE WELLINGTON MONUMENT—Question, Mr. Goldsmid; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer .....	308
RIVERS POLLUTION—THE RIVER RIBBLE—Question, Mr. F. Stanley; Answer, Mr. Stanfeld .....	308
AFRICA—THE WEST COAST SETTLEMENTS—THE ASHANTEE INVASION—Questions, Mr. Macfie, Sir Charles Adderley; Answers, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen .....	308
PATENT LAWS — INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE, VIENNA — Question, Mr. Macfie; Answer, Viscount Enfield .....	310
ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT—ANNUITIES TO CERTIFIED TEACHERS—Question, Lord George Hamilton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster .....	311
ARMY — AUTUMN MANOEUVRES — EXTRA ALLOWANCE TO VOLUNTEERS—Question, Sir Thomas Bateson; Answer, Sir Henry Storks .....	311
GUN FACTORY, WOOLWICH—PENSIONS TO WIDOWS OF ARTIFICERS—Questions, Mr. Baillie Cochrane; Answers, Mr. Baxter .....	312
BALANCE AND EXPENDITURE—WEEKLY RETURNS—Question, Sir George Balfour; Answer, Mr. Baxter .....	312
SCOTLAND—NORTHERN LIGHTS COMMISSIONERS—THE TAY LIGHTS—Question, Mr. J. W. Barclay; Answer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue .....	313
ARMY—THE LATE CAPTAIN CHARLES AGNEW—COMPENSATION FOR COMMISSION—Questions, Mr. Henry Samuelson; Answers, Mr. Cardwell .....	314
NAVY—CHATHAM DOCKYARD RAILWAYS—Question, Mr. Holmes; Answer, Mr. Goschen .....	315
POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPHIC DEPARTMENT — DELIVERY OF TELEGRAMS—Question, Mr. Clare Read; Answer, Mr. Monsell .....	316
MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT, 1871—UNSEAWORTHY VESSELS—Questions, Mr. Carter; Answers, Mr. Chichester Fortescue .....	316
ARMY RE-ORGANIZATION — CAVALRY SUB-LIEUTENANTS — Question, Sir Thomas Bateson; Answer, Mr. Cardwell .....	317
ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS—SIR JOHN PORT'S FOUNDATION, REPTON AND ETWALL—Question, Mr. R. Smith; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster .....	318
ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT, 1870 — STOURBRIDGE SCHOOL BOARD—Question, Mr. C. Dalrymple; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster .....	318
INDIA—THE INDIAN BUDGET—Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, Mr. Gladstone .....	319
TRIAL OF ELECTION PETITIONS—CANVASSING BY JUDGES—Question, Mr. Callan; Answer, The Attorney General .....	319
LEGISLATION—TURNPIKE ACTS CONTINUANCE BILL—Question, Lord George Cavendish; Answer, Mr. Hibbert .....	320
LANDED ESTATES COURT (IRELAND) BILL—Question, Colonel Stuart Knox; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington .....	320
Supreme Court of Judicature Bill (Lords) [Bill 154] —
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 11th July] .....	321
After long time spent therein, Bill reported:—Motion made and Question proposed, “That the Bill, as amended, be taken into consideration upon Thursday.”
PRIVILEGE—THE APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS—SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE — SCOTCH AND IRISH APPEALS—Observations, Mr. Bouvierie .....	345
After debate, Question put, and agreed to:—Bill, as amended, to be considered upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 237] .....
Turnpike Acts Continuance Bill [Bill 199] — Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [3rd July], “That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to make provision for rendering compulsory in England and Wales the Highway Acts 1862 and 1864,”—(Lord George Cavendish.)

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 14.]	Page
Turnpike, &amp;c. Committee —Continued to A seithills E sets W bns as G Question again proposed:—Debate resumed .....	102 382
Motion, by leave, withdrawn:—Bill considered in Committee .....	103 383
After long time spent therein, Bill reported, as attended to be considered this day, at Two of the clock. ....	103 383
Railway and Canal Traffic Bill [Bill 171]—Lords' Amendments .....	383
Moved , “That this House doth not insist on its disagreement to the Amendment made by the Lords in page 11, line 2, and which Amendment was leave out (may also, if they think fit), and insert (shall).” .....	A
Question put, and agreed to. ....	A
Amendment proposed, ....	A
To insert after the word “shall” in the said Lords' Amendments, the words “in all proceedings before them under sections 5, 10, 11, and 12 of this Act, and may, if they think fit, in all other proceedings before them under this Act.”—(Mr. Chichester-Corston.) .....	A
Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.” .....	A
Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out the figure “10.”—(Mr. Rathbone.) .....	A
Question put, “That the figure ‘10’ stand part of the said proposed Amendment.”—The House divided; Ayes 88, Noes 14: Majority 74:—Words inserted. ....	A
Civil Bills, &amp;c. (Ireland) [Salaries] Bill [Bill 187]—
Bill considered in Committee .....	383
Moved , “That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of the Consolidated Fund, of any increase of Salaries provided for under any Act of the present Session to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to Civil Bills and Courts of Quarter Sessions in Ireland.”—(Mr. Downing.) .....	M
Whereupon Motion made, and Question, “That the Chairman do report Progress,”—(Mr. Glyn,)—put, and negatived. ....	A
Original Question again proposed. ....	A
Whereupon Motion made, and Question put, “That the Chairman do report Progress,”—(Mr. Secretary Bruce:)—The Committee divided; Ayes 21, Noes 26; Majority 5. ....	A
Original Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 18, Noes 26; Majority 10. ....	A
[No Report.] ....	A
Salmon Fisheries Bill [Bill 98]—
Order for Consideration, as amended, read .....	384
Moved , “That the Bill be now taken into Consideration.”—Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 39, Noes 7; Majority 32.—Bill considered. ....	A
Amendments made; Bill to be read the third time to-morrow, at Two of the clock. ....	A
Penalties (Ireland) Bill —Ordered (The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Secretary Bruce); presented, and read the first time [Bill 239] .....	A
834	A
Public Health Act (1872) Amendment Bill —Ordered (Mr. Spencer Walpole, Mr. Reresford Hope, Sir Robert Torrens, Mr. William Fowler); presented, and read the first time [Bill 238] .....	A
835	A
LORDS, TUESDAY, JULY 15.
CHURCH ASSOCIATION—CONFESION IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND—Personal Explanation, Lord Oranmore and Browne; Reply, The Bishop of Winchester .....	A
385	A
Law Agents (Scotland) Bill (No. 207)—
Amendments reported (according to Order) .....	A
Further Amendments made:—Bill to be read 3 rd on Thursday next; and to be printed, as amended. (No. 213.) .....	A
387	A

TABLE OF CONTENTS

[July 15.]	1. MAY 1870
Gas and Water Facilities Act (1870) Amendment Bill	391
(No. 201)—
Bill considered in Committee	389
Bill reported, without Amendment, to be read 3 <sup>d</sup> , on Thursday next.
Militia (Service, &amp;c.) Bill (No. 206)	392
Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 <sup>d</sup> "—(The Speaker of the H. of C. ) Agreed to .
After short debate, Motion agreed to ;—Bill read 2 <sup>d</sup> , accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday , the 24th instant.
ARMY—MEDICAL OFFICERS OF THE ARMY—ROYAL WARRANT, 1858—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS	393
Moved that an humble Address be presented, to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to take into her consideration the present position as regards rank and pay of the medical officers of the Army who volunteered and served on the West Coast of Africa, between the years 1859 and 1867, in order that they may receive the benefit of the Royal Warrant signed the 1st of October 1858, of which they have hitherto been deprived.—(The Earl De La Warr )	392
After short debate, Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn .
SPAIN—CONVEYANCE OF CHINESE COOKIES INTO CURAÇA—Question, Observations, The Earl of Airlie; Reply, Earl Granville	394
CIVIL BILL IN ENGLAND AND WALES COMMONS, TUESDAY, JULY 15.
METROPOLIS—NEW COURTS OF JUSTICE—THE REVISED DESIGNS—Questions, Mr. Wait; Answers, Mr. Ayrton	398
SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE BILL—SCOTCH AND IRISH APPEALS—Observations, Mr. Gladstone	399
PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—VALUATION BILL—Questions, Mr. Assheton Cross, Mr. Vance; Answers, Mr. Stansfeld	400
REGISTRATION OF BIRTHS AND DEATHS BILL—Question, Mr. F. S. Powell; Answer, Mr. Stansfeld	401
Rating (Liability and Value) Bill [Bill 205]
Order for Consideration, as amended, read ..	401
After short debate, Moved , "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration,"—(Mr. Stansfeld.)
Amendment proposed, to leave out from the words "The Bill be" to the end thereof of the Question, in order to add the word "re-committed,"—(Mr. Cauley,) instead thereof.
After further short debate, Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived .
Question proposed, "That the word re-committed be added," instead thereof.
After further short debate, Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to add the words "in respect of Clauses 3 and 19, and of any new Clauses relating to the subject matter of those Clauses,"—(Mr. Cross:)—Question, "That those words be added to the proposed Amendment," put, and agreed to .
Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, as amended, to add, at the end thereof, the words "and also in respect of Clauses 4 and 6,"—(Mr. Graham:)—Question put, "That these words be there added."—The House divided; Ayes 136, Noes 193; Majority 57.
Words "re-committed in respect of Clauses 3 and 19, and of any new Clauses relating to the subject matter of those Clauses," added to the words "That the Bill be," in the Main Question.—Main Question so amended, put, and agreed to .—Bill considered in Committee	410
After short time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Friday , at Two o'clock.
VOL. CCXVII. [THIRD SERIES.]	[o]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 15.]	Page
Ecclesiastical Commissioners Bill [Lords] [Bill 285]— Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Gladstone) .....	424
Motion agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.
And it being now Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.
10 The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.
WINDWARD ISLANDS AND TRINIDAD—ECCLESIASTICAL POLICY—RESOLUTION — Moved, “That this House disapproves of the Ecclesiastical Policy of Her Majesty’s Government in the Windward Islands and in Trinidad,”—(Mr. Charley) .....	424
After debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 65, Noes 39; Majority 14.
CHURCH OF ENGLAND REVENUES—ADDRESS FOR A ROYAL COMMISSION — Moved, “That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the amount and application of the revenues of the Church of England and into the system of parochial benefices, with a view to the better adjustment of parishes and incomes and the amendment of the Law relating to patronage,”—(Mr. Thomas Hughes) .....	447
After debate, Question put, and negatived.
CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1871—MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE — Moved, “That a Select Committee be appointed to consider what changes it is desirable to make in the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1871,”—(Mr. Abberon Herbert) .....	459
11 After short debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 65, Noes 39; Majority 4.
Langbaugh Coroners Bill —Ordered (Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Winterbotham); presented, and read the first time [Bill 242].	460
COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JULY 16.
Weights and Measures (Metric System) Bill [Bill 99]— Moved, “That the Order for the Second Reading be discharged,”—(Sir Thomas Basley).	461
After short debate, Question put, and agreed to:—Order discharged:—Bill withdrawn.
Parliamentary Electors Registration Bill [Bill 32]— Moved, “That the Order for the Second Reading be discharged,”—(Mr. Poll) .....	463
After short debate, Question put, and agreed to:—Order discharged:—Bill withdrawn.
Labourers Cottages (Scotland) Bill [Bill 83]— Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [18th June], “That the Bill be now read a second time, and which Amendment was, to leave out the word ‘now,’ and at the end of the Question to add the words ‘upon this day three months.’”—(Sir James Elphinstone.)
Question again proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question:”—Debate resumed.	464
After long debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 74, Noes 78; Majority 4.
Words added:—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to:—Bill put off for three months.
Municipal Elections (Cumulative Vote) Bill [Bill 206]— Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Collins) .....	482
Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day three months,”—(Mr. Hardcastle.)

PART II OF CONTENTS.

[July 16.]	Page
Municipal Elections (Conservative Party) Bill—Question proposed, "That the word "now" stand part of the Question."	488
After debate, it being a quarter past one hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.
Wild Animals (Scotland) Bill—Ordered (Mr. James Barclay, Mr. Fordyce, Mr. Trevelyan); presented, and read the first time [Bill 248].	491
LORDS, THURSDAY, JULY 17.
Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (No. 1) Bill (No. 167)—
After short debate, House in Committee:—Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Tuesday next.
COMMONS, THURSDAY, JULY 17.
ROYAL ACADEMY—THE GIBSON BEQUEST—Question, Mr. C. S. Parker; Answer, Mr. Ayrton	493
THE ADMINISTRATIVE DEPARTMENTS—COURTS OF JUSTICE—Question, Mr. Rathbone; Answer, Mr. Gladstone	494
INDIA—REGULATIONS FOR EUROPEAN OFFICERS—PRIZE—Question, Mr. Vasey; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff	494
METROPOLIS—PARLIAMENT STREET—THE PUBLIC OFFICES—Question, Mr. A. Johnston; Answer, Mr. Ayrton	495
SUPPLEMENTARY MAGISTRATES (IRELAND)—Question, Lord Claud John Hamilton; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	496
THE LAND ACT IRELAND (CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEE)—Question, Mr. Vance; Answer, Mr. Baxter	496
ARMY RE-ORGANIZATION—COMMAND OF SUB-DISTRICTS—Question, Colonel North; Answer, Mr. Cardwell	497
PARLIAMENT—PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Dodson; Answer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue	497
PORTUGAL—SUPPLIES OF AMMUNITION—Question, Colonel Barttelot; Answer, Sir Henry Storks	498
EGYPT—CLANS OF BRITISH SUBJECTS—Question, Mr. Miller; Answer, Viscount Enfield	499
ARMY—NEW PASSAGE HILL, DEVONPORT—Question, Mr. J. D. Lewis; Answer, Mr. Cardwell	499
ARMY—THE AUTUMN MANOEUVRES—BILLETING—Question, Mr. Bonham-Carter; Answer, Sir Henry Storks	500
INTERNATIONAL LAW—ARBITRATION—Answer to ADDRESS [8th July] reported	500
NAVY—THE TROTMAN ANCHOR—Question, Lord Henry Scott; Answer, Mr. Goschen	501
Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment Bill [Bill 188]—Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. W. E. Forster)	502
Previous Question proposed, "That that Question be now put,"—(Mr. Torrens.)
After long debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 343, Noes 72; Majority 271:— With Question proposed, "That that Question be now put,"—(Mr. Torrens.)
Division List, Ayes and Noes	507
Bill read a second time, and committed; considered in Committee, and reported; to be printed as amended [Bill 245]; re-committed for Monday next.	507

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 17.]	Page
Juris Bill [Bill 85] — Bill considered in Committee .....	590
Moved , “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,”—(Mr. Cross)—After short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 78; Noes 126; Majority 48.	590
Moved , “That the Chairman do now leave the Chair,”—(Mr. F. S. Powell)—After further short debate, Motion withdrawn.	590
Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.	590
Licensing Law Amendment (Scotland) Bill —Considered in Committee—Resolution agreed to, and reported:—Bill amended (Sir Robert Aberdare, Sir Graham Montgomery, Sir David Wedderburn, Mr. Charles Dalrymple, Mr. Fardyce) presented, and read the first time [Bill 247].	591
Representative Councils in Counties (Ireland) Bill —Ordered (Mr. Butt, Mr. Callan)	591
Rating Liability (Ireland) Bill —Ordered (The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Secretary Bruce); presented, and read the first time [Bill 246].	591
LODGE, FRIDAY, JULY 18.
ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS—DENBIGH FREE GRAMMAR SCHOOL—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—
Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to refuse her assent to the schemes of the Endowed Schools Commissioners for the management of the Free Grammar School and of the Blue Coat School Charity at Denbigh in the county of Denbigh, North Wales.—(The Lord Bishop of Bangor)	592
After short debate, on Question? their Lordships divided; Contents 68, Not-Contents 46; Majority 22:—Resolved in the Affirmative .	592
ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS—HEATH FREE GRAMMAR SCHOOL—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—
Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to refuse her assent to the schemes of the Endowed Schools Commissioners for the management of the Free Grammar School of Queen Elizabeth at Heath in the borough of Halifax in the county of York, and of all the endowments thereof,—(The Marquess of Salisbury).	597
After short debate, on Question? Resolved in the Negative .
Conveyancing (Scotland) Bill (No. 141)—
House in Committee (according to Order) .....	598
Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Thursday next, and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 227.)	598
Steam Threshing Machines Bill (No. 210) —
Moved , “That the Bill be now read 2 <sup>d</sup> ,”—(The Earl of Morley). After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2 <sup>d</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.	601
Gas and Water Works Facilities Act (1870) Amendment Bill (No. 201) —
Bill read 3 <sup>d</sup> (according to Order) .....	602
After short debate, Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.
COMMONS, FRIDAY, JULY 18.
CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL—ALLEGED “PRINCIPAGE”—Questions, Mr. Whalley, Answer, Mr. Gladstone	603
IRISH LAND ACT—Question, Major Trench; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	605
PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—RULES AND PRACTICE OF THE HOUSE—Questions, Mr. Hermon, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answers, Mr. Gladstone	605

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 18.]	Page
THE VALUATION BILL — Question, Mr. Assheton Cross; Answer, Mr. Stansfeld .....	607
METROPOLIS — BETHNAL GREEN MUSEUM — Question, Mr. Wheelhouse; Answer, Mr. Ayton .....	607
IRELAND — THE LETTER-MILLIN COASTGUARD — Question, Mr. Mitchell Henry; Answer, The Marquess of Harrington .....	607
ARMY — ROYAL MARINES AND ROYAL MARINE ARTILLERY — Questions, Mr. Henry Samuelson; Answers, Mr. Goschen .....	608
Rating (Liability and Value) (not committed) Bill [Bill 205]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 16th July] .....	610
After short time spent therein; Bill reported; as amended, considered.
After short debate, Bill to be read the third time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 250.] [House counted out.] .....	610
And it being now ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.
House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.
SUPPLY — Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:—" .....
MERCANTILE MARINE — LOSS OF LIFE AT SEA — MOTION FOR A COMMISSION —
Moved , "That it is expedient that a Commission be appointed to inquire and report to the Board of Trade as to the practicability of stowing conveniently in Passenger Ships such a number of Refuge-Boats or Rafts, or other insubmersible appliances, as may be sufficient in their aggregate capacity to receive all on board in the event of accidents to the ships." — (Mr. Cooper-Temple) .....	619
[House counted out.] .....
LORDS, MONDAY, JULY 21.
THE LATE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER AND THE LATE LORD WESTBURY — Observations, The Duke of Richmond .....	621
OFFICERS OF HER MAJESTY'S ARMY — ABOLITION OF PURCHASE — ADDRESS FOR A ROYAL COMMISSION —
Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that she will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the allegations of the officers of Her Majesty's Army contained in the memorials mentioned in the Return made to this House (Parliamentary Paper No. 196.) as to the grievances which they state that they suffer, consequent upon the abolition of purchase. — (The Duke of Richmond) .....	621
After debate, on Question? their Lordships divided: Contents 129, Not-Contents 46; Majority 83: — Resolved in the Affirmative.
Division List, Contents and Not-Contents Nos. M 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 988, 989, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 999, 1000, 1000, 1001, 1002, 1003, 1004, 1005, 1006, 1007, 1008, 1009, 1009, 1010, 1011, 1012, 1013, 1014, 1015, 1016, 1017, 1018, 1019, 1019, 1020, 1021, 1022, 1023, 1024, 1025, 1026, 1027, 1028, 1029, 1029, 1030, 1031, 1032, 1033, 1034, 1035, 1036, 1037, 1038, 1039, 1039, 1040, 1041, 1042, 1043, 1044, 1045, 1046, 1047, 1048, 1049, 1049, 1050, 1051, 1052, 1053, 1054, 1055, 1056, 1057, 1058, 1059, 1059, 1060, 1061, 1062, 1063, 1064, 1065, 1066, 1067, 1068, 1069, 1069, 1070, 1071, 1072, 1073, 1074, 1075, 1076, 1077, 1078, 1078, 1079, 1079, 1080, 1081, 1082, 1083, 1084, 1085, 1086, 1087, 1088, 1088, 1089, 1089, 1090, 1091, 1092, 1093, 1094, 1095, 1095, 1096, 1097, 1098, 1099, 1099, 1100, 1101, 1102, 1103, 1104, 1105, 1106, 1107, 1108, 1109, 1109, 1110, 1111, 1112, 1113, 1114, 1115, 1116, 1117, 1118, 1119, 1119, 1120, 1121, 1122, 1123, 1124, 1125, 1126, 1127, 1128, 1129, 1129, 1130, 1131, 1132, 1133, 1134, 1135, 1136, 1137, 1138, 1139, 1139, 1140, 1141, 1142, 1143, 1144, 1145, 1146, 1147, 1148, 1149, 1149, 1150, 1151, 1152, 1153, 1154, 1155, 1156, 1157, 1158, 1159, 1159, 1160, 1161, 1162, 1163, 1164, 1165, 1166, 1167, 1168, 1169, 1169, 1170, 1171, 1172, 1173, 1174, 1175, 1176, 1177, 1178, 1178, 1179, 1179, 1180, 1181, 1182, 1183, 1184, 1185, 1186, 1187, 1188, 1188, 1189, 1189, 1190, 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194, 1195, 1195, 1196, 1197, 1198, 1199, 1199, 1200, 1201, 1202, 1203, 1204, 1205, 1206, 1207, 1208, 1209, 1209, 1210, 1211, 1212, 1213, 1214, 1215, 1216, 1217, 1218, 1219, 1219, 1220, 1221, 1222, 1223, 1224, 1225, 1226, 1227, 1228, 1229, 1229, 1230, 1231, 1232, 1233, 1234, 1235, 1236, 1237, 1238, 1239, 1239, 1240, 1241, 1242, 1243, 1244, 1245, 1246, 1247, 1248, 1249, 1249, 1250, 1251, 1252, 1253, 1254, 1255, 1256, 1257, 1258, 1259, 1259, 1260, 1261, 1262, 1263, 1264, 1265, 1266, 1267, 1268, 1269, 1269, 1270, 1271, 1272, 1273, 1274, 1275, 1276, 1277, 1278, 1278, 1279, 1279, 1280, 1281, 1282, 1283, 1284, 1285, 1286, 1287, 1288, 1288, 1289, 1289, 1290, 1291, 1292, 1293, 1294, 1295, 1295, 1296, 1297, 1298, 1299, 1299, 1300, 1301, 1302, 1303, 1304, 1305, 1306, 1307, 1308, 1309, 1309, 1310, 1311, 1312, 1313, 1314, 1315, 1316, 1317, 1318, 1319, 1319, 1320, 1321, 1322, 1323, 1324, 1325, 1326, 1327, 1328, 1329, 1329, 1330, 1331, 1332, 1333, 1334, 1335, 1336, 1337, 1338, 1339, 1339, 1340, 1341, 1342, 1343, 1344, 1345, 1346, 1347, 1348, 1349, 1349, 1350, 1351, 1352, 1353, 1354, 1355, 1356, 1357, 1358, 1359, 1359, 1360, 1361, 1362, 1363, 1364, 1365, 1366, 1367, 1368, 1369, 1369, 1370, 1371, 1372, 1373, 1374, 1375, 1376, 1377, 1378, 1378, 1379, 1379, 1380, 1381, 1382, 1383, 1384, 1385, 1386, 1387, 1388, 1388, 1389, 1389, 1390, 1391, 1392, 1393, 1394, 1395, 1395, 1396, 1397, 1398, 1399, 1399, 1400, 1401, 1402, 1403, 1404, 1405, 1406, 1407, 1408, 1409, 1409, 1410, 1411, 1412, 1413, 1414, 1415, 1416, 1417, 1418, 1418, 1419, 1419, 1420, 1421, 1422, 1423, 1424, 1425, 1426, 1427, 1428, 1429, 1429, 1430, 1431, 1432, 1433, 1434, 1435, 1436, 1437, 1438, 1438, 1439, 1439, 1440, 1441, 1442, 1443, 1444, 1445, 1446, 1447, 1448, 1449, 1449, 1450, 1451, 1452, 1453, 1454, 1455, 1456, 1457, 1458, 1459, 1459, 1460, 1461, 1462, 1463, 1464, 1465, 1466, 1467, 1468, 1469, 1469, 1470, 1471, 1472, 1473, 1474, 1475, 1476, 1477, 1478, 1478, 1479, 1479, 1480, 1481, 1482, 1483, 1484, 1485, 1486, 1487, 1488, 1488, 1489, 1489, 1490, 1491, 1492, 1493, 1494, 1495, 1495, 1496, 1497, 1498, 1499, 1499, 1500, 1501, 1502, 1503, 1504, 1505, 1506, 1507, 1508, 1509, 1509, 1510, 1511, 1512, 1513, 1514, 1515, 1516, 1517, 1518, 1519, 1519, 1520, 1521, 1522, 1523, 1524, 1525, 1526, 1527, 1528, 1529, 1529, 1530, 1531, 1532, 1533, 1534, 1535, 1536, 1537, 1538, 1538, 1539, 1539, 1540, 1541, 1542, 1543, 1544, 1545, 1546, 1547, 1548, 1549, 1549, 1550, 1551, 1552, 1553, 1554, 1555, 1556, 1557, 1558, 1559, 1559, 1560, 1561, 1562, 1563, 1564, 1565, 1566, 1567, 1568, 1569, 1569, 1570, 1571, 1572, 1573, 1574, 1575, 1576, 1577, 1578, 1578, 1579, 1579, 1580, 1581, 1582, 1583, 1584, 1585, 1586, 1587, 1588, 1588, 1589, 1589, 1590, 1591, 1592, 1593, 1594, 1595, 1595, 1596, 1597, 1598, 1599, 1599, 1600, 1601, 1602, 1603, 1604, 1605, 1606, 1607, 1608, 1609, 1609, 1610, 1611, 1612, 1613, 1614, 1615, 1616, 1617, 1618, 1618, 1619, 1619, 1620, 1621, 1622, 1623, 1624, 1625, 1626, 1627, 1628, 1629, 1629, 1630, 1631, 1632, 1633, 1634, 1635, 1636, 1637, 1638, 1638, 1639, 1639, 1640, 1641, 1642, 1643, 1644, 1645, 1646, 1647, 1648, 1649, 1649, 1650, 1651, 1652, 1653, 1654, 1655, 1656, 1657, 1658, 1659, 1659, 1660, 1661, 1662, 1663, 1664, 1665, 1666, 1667, 1668, 1669, 1669, 1670, 1671, 1672, 1673, 1674, 1675, 1676, 1677, 1678, 1678, 1679, 1679, 1680, 1681, 1682, 1683, 1684, 1685, 1686, 1687, 1688, 1688, 1689, 1689, 1690, 1691, 1692, 1693, 1694, 1695, 1695, 1696, 1697, 1698, 1699, 1699, 1700, 1701, 1702, 1703, 1704, 1705, 1706, 1707, 1708, 1709, 1709, 1710, 1711, 1712, 1713, 1714, 1715, 1716, 1717, 1718, 1718, 1719, 1719, 1720, 1721, 1722, 1723, 1724, 1725, 1726, 1727, 1728, 1729, 1729, 1730, 1731, 1732, 1733, 1734, 1735, 1736, 1737, 1738, 1738, 1739, 1739, 1740, 1741, 1742, 1743, 1744, 1745, 1746, 1747, 1748, 1749, 1749, 1750, 1751, 1752, 1753, 1754, 1755, 1756, 1757, 1758, 1759, 1759, 1760, 1761, 1762, 1763, 1764, 1765, 1766, 1767, 1768, 1769, 1769, 1770, 1771, 1772, 1773, 1774, 1775, 1776, 1777, 1778, 1778, 1779, 1779, 1780, 1781, 1782, 1783, 1784, 1785, 1786, 1787, 1788, 1788, 1789, 1789, 1790, 1791, 1792, 1793, 1794, 1795, 1795, 1796, 1797, 1798, 1799, 1799, 1800, 1801, 1802, 1803, 1804, 1805, 1806, 1807, 1808, 1809, 1809, 1810, 1811, 1812, 1813, 1814, 1815, 1816, 1817, 1818, 1818, 1819, 1819, 1820, 1821, 1822, 1823, 1824, 1825, 1826, 1827, 1828, 1829, 1829, 1830, 1831, 1832, 1833, 1834, 1835, 1836, 1837, 1838, 1838, 1839, 1839, 1840, 1841, 1842, 1843, 1844, 1845, 1846, 1847, 1848, 1849, 1849, 1850, 1851, 1852, 1853, 1854, 1855, 1856, 1857, 1858, 1859, 1859, 1860, 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, 1868, 1869, 1869, 1870, 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, 1878, 1879, 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884, 1885, 1886, 1887, 1888, 1888, 1889, 1889, 1890, 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, 18

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
COMMONS, MONDAY, JULY 21.	[12 M.W]
ARMY—THE GENERAL COMMANDING IN IRELAND—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Cardwell	657
LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANIES ACT, 1870—LIFE ASSURANCE OFFICES RETURNS—Question, Sir Frederick W. Heygate; Answer, Mr. Chichester Forstesue	657
THE MAURITIUS—ECCLESIASTICAL ESTABLISHMENTS—Questions, Major Arbuthnot; Answers, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen	658
Union of Benefices Bill [Bill 92]
Moved , "That the Order for the Adjourned Debate upon going into Committee be discharged,"—(Mr. Spencer Walpole)	659
Motion agreed to :—Order discharged :—Bill withdrawn.
METROPOLIS—SMALL-POX HOSPITAL AT HATCHAM—Question, Mr. Watney; Answer, Mr. Stansfeld	659
PUBLIC WORKS LOANS—ENGLAND AND IRELAND—Questions, Mr. Delahunt; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	660
IRELAND—ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—Question, Mr. Kavanagh; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	661
ARMY—THE ROYAL ENGINEERS—Question, Colonel Learmonth; Answer, Mr. Cardwell	661
THE BOARD OF TRADE—REGISTER OF SHIPPING OFFICE—THIRD CLASS CLERKS—Question, Lord George Hamilton; Answer, Mr. Chichester Forstesue	662
PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—Questions, Mr. Bourke, Mr. Assheton Cross, Mr. R. N. Fowler, Mr. Wheelhouse, Mr. Dixon, Mr. Dillwyn; Answers, Mr. Holt, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. W. E. Forster	663
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE
Moved , "That To-morrow, and upon every succeeding Tuesday during the remainder of the Session, Orders of the Day have precedence of Notices of Motion, Government Orders of the Day having the priority,"—(Mr. Gladstone)	665
After short debate, Question put, and agreed to .
Supreme Court of Judicature Bill (Lords) [Bill 237]
Moved , "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration,"—(Mr. Attorney General)	669
Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "now taken into Consideration," in order to add the words "re-committed in respect of Clause 14 (Salaries of future Judges),"—(Mr. Gregory)—instead thereof.
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."
After short debate; Question put, and agreed to :—Main Question put, and agreed to :—Bill considered.
After further debate, Bill to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.
Rating) Liability and Value) Bill [Bill 250]
Moved , "That the Bill be now read the third time,"—(Mr. Stansfeld)	685
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read the third time; Amendments made; Bill passed .
Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill [Bill 162]
Moved , "That the Bill be now read the second time,"—(Mr. Chichester Forstesue)	690

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 21.]	1871 VOL II. NO. 21.	Page
Crown Private Estates Bill (Lords). [Bill 228]—	162
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Gladstone) .....	693
Amendment proposed, To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add, the words "it is inexpedient to extend the scope of the Act 25 and 26 Vic. c. 37 until the secrecy at present attaching exclusively to Crown testaments is abolished," —(Mr. Anderson,) instead thereof.
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.—Main Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 167, Noes 35; Major- ity 132.
Division List, Ayes and Noes .....	716
Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.
Endowed Schools Act (1869) Amendment Bill [Bill 267]—	718
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. William Edward Forster)
Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months,"—(Mr. Dilhurn.)
Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question:" —After short debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 84, Noes 70; Majority 14.
Main Question put, and agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and com- mitted for Thursday.
LORDS, TUESDAY, JULY 22.
ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS—DUNLISH FREE GRAMMAR SCHOOL—
Her Majesty's Answer to the Address of Friday last reported .....	736
THE LATE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER AND THE LATE LORD WESTBURY—
Observations, Earl Granville:—Short debate thereon .....	736
Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (No. 1) Bill (No. 187)—
Amendments reported (according to Order) .....	742
Amendment moved, in Clause 1, to omit ("after the passing of this Act"), and insert ("the first of January, 1874,")—(The Earl Beauchamp.)
After short debate, on Question? Resolved in the Negative; and Bill to be read 3d on Thursday next.
LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) ACT, 1870—MOTION FOR PAPERS—
Moved , for a copy of the decree and reversal granted by Mr. Justice Lawson at Dublin on the 3d day of March 1873 in respect to the claims made by Michael Friel of Bally- michael in the county of Donegal, plaintiff, v. The Earl of Leitrim, respondent, under the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870; showing the amount awarded, the costs of the decree, and the costs of the reversal:
Also copy of the costs as taxed by the clerk of the peace under the direction of the judge according to the order of the judge if the Court of Land Cases Reserved, and dated the 1st day of June 1872;
2. Copy of the dismiss of the chairman of quarter sessions in the county of Monaghan to the claims of James Creaghan v. The Earl of Dartrey; under the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870; and the affiance, with costs, granted by Mr. Justice Lawson to the above decree at the late assizes for the county of Monaghan, and the judgment of the judge for the granting of that affiance.
Also copy of all entries in the book of the clerk of the peace for the county of Monaghan as to the case of the claims of the said James Creaghan v. The Earl of Dartrey.
And copy of the taxation of costs under the rules of the judges of the Court of Land Cases Reserved, (The Earl of Leitrim) .....	751
Motion agreed to.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

[July 22.]	Page
LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) ACT (1870) AMENDMENT &amp;c.
Moved for, Return of the Land Cases decided in each county from the 25th day of February 1872 to the 12th day of July 1873; showing the amount of rent in each case and the tenement valuation of the premises, the sums awarded as compensation and as costs in each case by the chairman of quarter sessions, the cases in which appeals have been carried up to the judge or judges of assize, the judgment in each case and the costs, the cases which have been remitted by the judge or judges of assize to the Court of Land Cases Reserved, the judgment of that court and the costs: [Papers]—(The Earl of Leitrim) .....	751
Motion agreed to.
IRISH CHURCH TEMPORALITIES COMMISSION—QUESTION, THE EARL OF LEITRIM;
Answer, The Marquess of Lansdowne .....	752
CONSTABULARY (IRELAND) — SUB-CONSTABLE JOHN HOWE — MOTION FOR PAPERS
Moved for, Copy of the report made by sub-constable John Howe, dated Ballycumber, the 26th of March 1873, or thereabouts, relative to the alleged cruelty to a horse near Ballycumber in the King's County, Ireland: [and other Papers]—(The Earl of Leitrim) .....	752
On Question? Resolved in the Negative.
COMMONS, TUESDAY, JULY 22.
ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (1870) AMENDMENT, &amp;c. (re-committed) BILL [Bill 245]
Order for Committee read:—Moved, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,”—(Mr. W. E. Forster) .....	753
Amendment proposed,
To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in the opinion of this House, no Amendment of the Education Act will be satisfactory which does not make the attendance of children at school and the formation of School Boards compulsory throughout England and Wales, and which fails to remove the objections entertained to the principles embodied in the twenty-fifth section of the Act,”—(Mr. Dixon,)—instead thereof.
Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After short debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 129, Noes 45; Majority 84.
Division List, Ayes and Noes .....	760
Main Question, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,” put, and agreed to.
Bill considered in Committee.
After some time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.
It being now Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.
House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.
SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE BILL (LORDS) [Bill 237]
Moved, “That the Bill be now read the third time,”—(Mr. Attorney General) .....	785
Amendment proposed,
To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in the opinion of this House, it is desirable to extend the jurisdiction of the new Supreme Court of Appeal to the whole of the United Kingdom,”—(Sir David Wedderburn,)—instead thereof.
Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.—Main Question put and agreed to.—Bill read the third time.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 22.]	Page
Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment, &amp;c. (re-committed) Bill [Bill 245]—
Bill considered in Committee .....	790
After short time spent therein, Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday. ....
Constabulary Force (Ireland) Bill—Resolution [July 21] reported, and agreed to:—
Bill ordered (The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Secretary Bruce); presented, and read the first time [Bill 257] .....	802
Defence Acts Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Mr. Secretary Cardwell, Sir Henry Stork); presented, and read the first time [Bill 256] .....	802
Local Rates and Taxes (Scotland) Bill—Ordered (The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Bruce); presented, and read the first time [Bill 256] .....	802
COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JULY 23.
ORDER—ALTERATION OF QUESTIONS BY THE CLERKS AT THE TABLE—THE PERSIAN CONCESSIONS TO BARON REUTER—Observations, Question, Mr. Baillie Cochrane; Replies, Mr. Speaker, Viscount Enfield .....	803
BELGIUM—ARMY RE-ORGANIZATION—Question, Sir George Jenkinson; Answer, Viscount Enfield .....	804
AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS' MEETING—ALLEGED DISTURBANCES AT LEIGHTON BUZZARD—Question, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice; Answer, Mr. Bruce .....	805
Household Franchise (Counties) Bill [Bill 8]—
Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Trevelyan) .....	806
Previous Question moved, "That that Question be now put,"—(Mr. Collins) .....	823
After long debate, it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow. ....
Post Office Telegraph Services (Loan) Bill—Resolution [July 22] reported, and agreed to:—Bill ordered (Mr. Bonham-Carter, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Baxter) .....	854
East India (Great Southern of India and Carnatic Railway Companies) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Grant Duff, Mr. Ayrton); presented, and read the first time [Bill 258] .....	854
LORDS, THURSDAY, JULY 24.
Salmon Fisheries Bill (No. 215)—
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2 <sup>o</sup> ,"—(The Earl of Morley) .....	855
Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2 <sup>o</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next at 10 o'clock, from 10 to 12 noon .....
Conveyancing (Scotland) Bill (No. 227)—
Amendments reported (according to Order).—Leave out to read 2 <sup>o</sup> accordingly .....	856
Amendment made:—Further Amendments made; Bill to be read 3 <sup>o</sup> To-morrow, and to be printed, as amended. (No. 282) .....
Order of the Day for considering the Commons Amendments to the SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE BILL, read .....	856
THE ALBERT AND EUROPEAN ARBITRATIONS—EX-LORD CHANCELLORS—Observations, Lord Cairns; Reply, The Lord Chancellor. ....
Supreme Court of Judicature Bill—Commons Amendments—
Moved, "That the said Amendments be now considered,"—(The Lord Chancellor) .....	866
Moved, To leave out from ("That") to the end of the Motion for the purpose of inserting the following words:—"As it is now admitted by the promoters of the Bill that there should be only one Court of Ultimate Appeal for the United Kingdom, and as it is uncertain whether any such Court can be newly constituted in England which will give the same satisfaction to Scotland and Ireland which it is admitted
VOL. CCXVII. [THIRD SERIES.]	[ d ]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 24.]

Supreme Court of Judicature Bill—continued.

that this House has afforded, it is inexpedient, without allowing time for further inquiry, to pass a Bill which establishes a separate Court of Ultimate Appeal for England, and must therefore render a repeal of the settlement under the Acts of Union necessary, if the appeals from those countries are to be transferred to that Court, the formation of which will justify Scotland and Ireland desiring to have separate Courts of Ultimate Appeal in their own capitals if no longer allowed to come to this House; and it is therefore expedient that the consideration of the Amendments made by the House of Commons be deferred for three months,")—(The Chairman of Committees.)

After debate, on Question, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Motion? their Lordships divided: Contents 61, Not-Contents 34; Majority 27.

Division List, Contents and Not-Contents .....

Resolved in the Affirmative.

Original Motion agreed to; Commons Amendments considered accordingly.

Several Amendments disagreed to; some agreed to; some agreed to, with Amendments.

A Committee appointed to draw up Reasons to be offered to the Commons for disagreeing to several of their Amendments.

PROTEST .....

COMMONS, THURSDAY, JULY 24.

	Page
NEWFOUNDLAND — TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION — Question, Sir John Kennaway; Answer, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen	898
Egypt—SUZ CANAL—INCREASE OF DUES—Question, Mr. Norwood; Answer, Viscount Enfield	899
TURKEY—COURTS OF JUSTICE—Question, Sir Dominic Corrigan; Answer, Viscount Enfield	900
CRIMINAL LAW—CONVICT LABOUR AT DARTMOOR—Question, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Answer, Mr. Baxter	900
MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT—UNSEAWORTHY SHIPS—THE "WILLIAM," OF EXETER—Questions, Mr. Gilpin; Answers, Mr. Chichester Fortescue	901
CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS—Question, Mr. Dillwyn; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	902
METROPOLIS—THE AUTHORIZED BOOK OF CAB FARES—RAILWAY STATIONS—Question, Mr. W. Lowther; Answer, Mr. Bruce	902
METROPOLIS—FIRES—WATER SUPPLY—Question, Mr. W. Lowther; Answer, Mr. Stansfeld	903
CRIMINAL LAW—APPROPRIATION OF PENALTIES—Question, Mr. W. H. Smith; Answer, Mr. Bruce	903
IRELAND—REVISION OF LIST OF MAGISTRACY—Question, Mr. Callan; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	904
PUBLIC WORKS LOANS—ENGLAND AND IRELAND—Question, Mr. Delahunt; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	905
ARMY—GUNPOWDER—MR. DUFFEY'S INVENTION—Question, Mr. Raikes; Answer, Sir Henry Storks	906
ARMY—SECOND BATTALIONS OF MILITIA REGIMENTS—Question, Mr. Stanley; Answer, Mr. Cardwell	907
THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON—THE GENEVA ARBITRATION—PRESENTS TO ARBITRATORS—Question, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck; Answer, Mr. Gladstone	907
NAVY—SHIP-BUILDING—PLANS OF THE GOVERNMENT—Question, Lord Henry Lennox; Answer, Mr. Goschen	908
POST OFFICE—REGISTRATION OF LETTERS CONTAINING POSTAGE STAMPS—Question, Mr. Macfie; Answer, Mr. Monsell	910

TABLE OF CONTENTS

[July 24.]

[ 12 ] Page

POST OFFICE—THE GLASGOW POST OFFICE—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Monsell .....	911
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—REVISED CODE, 1878, ARTICLE 59—TEACHERS FOR ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS—Question, Sir John Kennaway; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster .....	912
POST OFFICE—DUBLIN POST OFFICE—SORTERS AND LETTER CARRIERS— Question, Mr. Pim; Answer, Mr. Monsell .....	912
PARLIAMENT—ORDER OF PUBLIC BUSINESS—Questions, Mr. Assheton Cross, Mr. Beresford Hope, Sir John Hay; Answers, Mr. Gladstone .....	913
SCIENCE AND ART—THE BRITISH MUSEUM AND SOUTH KENSINGTON Question, Mr. Mundella; Answer, Mr. Gladstone .....	914
NAVY—SALE OF GREENWICH HOSPITAL ESTATES—Question, Mr. Fawcett; Answer, Mr. Goschen .....	915
IRELAND—PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT—Question, Mr. Callan; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington .....	916
CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS (SCOTLAND)—PRIVATE PROSECUTORS—Question, Mr. Cameron; Answer, Mr. Bruce .....	917
BALLOT ACT—BOARDS OF GUARDIANS—VOTING PAPERS—Question, Mr. Bourke; Answer, Mr. Hibbert .....	918
CRIMINAL LAW—PUBLIC PROSECUTORS—Question, Mr. Magniac; Answer, Mr. Bruce .....	918
HOUSEHOLD FRANCHISE (COUNTIES) BILL—Question, Mr. C. Forster; Answer, Mr. Trevethan .....	919
FRANCE—THE TREATY OF COMMERCE—Question, Mr. Whitwell; Answer, Viscount Enfield .....	919
INDIA—THE INDIAN BUDGET—Observations, Mr. Fawcett .....	919
Moved, "That the House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Fawcett:)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .....	919
Endowed Schools Act (1869) Amendment Bill [Bill 207]
Order for Committee read:—Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"—(Mr. William Edward Forster) .....	921
Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Newdegate,) instead thereof .....	921
Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to .....	921
Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to .....	921
Bill considered in Committee .....	921
After long time spent therein, Bill reported, as amended, to be considered To-morrow .....	921
Landed Estates Court (Ireland) (Judges) Bill [Bill 182]
Moved, "That the Order for the Second Reading be discharged,"—(The Marquess of Hartington) .....	955
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Order discharged:—Bill withdrawn .....	955
Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment, &amp;c. Bill
Bill, as amended, considered .....	956
After long debate, Bill to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock .....	956
Rating Liability (Ireland) Bill [Bill 246]
Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(The Marquess of Hartington) .....	956
Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months,"—(Mr. Pim.) .....	962

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 24.]	Page
Rating Liability (Ireland) Bill—continued
Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question:" —After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.
Main Question put, and agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.
 Law Agents (Scotland) Bill—
Lords' Amendments considered	963
Amendment made by the Lords, that Writers to the Signet should hereafter be enrolled as law agents.
Moved, "That the House disagree with the Amendment,"—(Mr. Grieve:)—After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Lords Amendment disagreed to.
Lords' Amendment, that members of the Society of Solicitors should be enrolled as law agents disagreed to.
On Motion of The Lord Advocate, Lords Amendment to insert "incorporated" in lieu of "unincorporated," in line 12, page 7, agreed to.
After further short debate, Committee appointed, "to draw up reasons to be assigned to The Lords for disagreeing to certain of the Amendments made by The Lords to the Law Agents (Scotland) Bill"	963
 Appropriation of Seats (Cahel and Sligo) Bill—
Moved, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill, for the appropriation to the towns of Kingstown and Queenstown of the seats vacated by the disfranchisement of the boroughs of Cahel and Sligo,"—(Mr. Butt)
After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.	963
 Expiring Laws Continuance Bill—Ordered (Mr. Baxter, Mr. William Henry Gladstone); presented, and read the first time [Bill 261]	964
 LORDS, FRIDAY, JULY 25.
 NAVY—PEBBLE POWDER—THE REVIEW AT PORTSMOUTH—Question, Lord Vivian; Answer, The Earl of Camperdown	964
 ARMY—THE "BOXER SHRAPNEL" SHELL—ADDRESS FOR CORRESPONDENCE—
Moved [for] Copies of Correspondence in 1870-71 between the authorities at the War Office and Mr. W. Hope, V.C., late of the 7th Royal Fusiliers, relative to the shell adopted into the service, and officially known as the "Boxer Shrapnel," which Mr. Hope claims to be his invention, and substantially identical with a shell deposited by himself in charge of the late Superintendent of the Royal Laboratory, Woolwich Arsenal, in December 1856:
Also for, Copies of any Correspondence between the authorities at the War Office and Major-General Boxer, or the Judge Advocate-General, or other Law Officer in the Crown, upon the above subject,—(The Earl of Longford)	966
After short debate, the latter paragraph withdrawn:—Address agreed to.
 ARMY—THE IRISH MILITIA—Question, Lord Dunsany; Answer, The Marquess of Lansdowne	970
 Public Records (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill (No. 209)—
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2 <sup>d</sup> ,"—(The Lord O'Hagan)	971
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2 <sup>d</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.
 Revising Barristers Bill (No. 218)—
House in Committee (according to Order)	972

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 25.]		Page
Rating (Liability and Value) Bill (No. 281)—
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>,"—(The Earl of Kimberley)	973
Amendment moved, to leave out ("now,") and insert ("this day three months,")—(The Lord Henniker.)
After debate, on Question, that ("now") stand part of the Motion? their Lordships divided; Contents 43, Not-Contents 59; Majority 16.
Division List, Contents and Not-Contents .. .. ..	998
Resolved in the Negative; and Bill to be read 2<sup>o</sup> this day three months.
COMMONS, FRIDAY, JULY 25.
CRIMINAL LAW—SELF-MUTILATIONS IN CHATHAM CONVICT PRISON—Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, Mr. Bruce	995
PUBLIC WORKS LOANS—ENGLAND AND IRELAND—Question, Mr. Delahunty; Answer, Mr. Baxter .. .. ..	996
IRELAND—AMNESTY TO POLITICAL PRISONERS—Question, Mr. Butt; Answer, Mr. Gladstone .. .. ..	997
IRELAND—CORONER FOR MEATH—Question, Mr. J. Martin; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington .. .. ..	998
Crown Private Estates Bill, (Lords) [Bill 222]—
Order for Committee read .. .. ..	1000
After short debate, Bill considered in Committee.
After short time spent therein, Bill reported, without Amendment.
Moved, "That the Bill be read the third time upon Monday next,"—(Mr. Gladstone) .. .. ..	1007
Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "Monday," in order to insert the word "Friday,"—(Mr. Dickinson,)—instead thereof.
Question, "That the word 'Monday' stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to:—Main Question put, and agreed to:—Bill to be read the third time upon Monday next.
Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment, &amp;c. Bill [Bill 245]—
Order for Third Reading read .. .. ..	1007
After debate, Bill read the third time, and passed.
Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment (re-committed) Bill [Bill 258]
Bill considered in Committee .. .. ..	1023
After some time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.
And it being now Seven of the clock, House suspended its sitting.
House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.
SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:"—
INDIA—OFFICERS OF THE NATIVE ARMY OF INDIA—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS—
Amendment proposed,
To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to be graciously pleased to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the mode in which European Officers are supplied to the Native Army of India, and to the promotion, pay, pensions, and retiring allowances of such officers,"—(Mr. Bourke,)—instead thereof .. .. ..	1028
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—After long debate, Question put, and agreed to.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 25.]

	Page
SUPPLY—Order for Committee— continued . —	1053
CUSTOM-HOUSE OFFICERS AT THE OUTPORTS—Postponement of Motion Viscount Sandon	1058
THE LICENSING ACT—Observations, Mr. Vernon Harcourt; Reply, Mr. Bruce;—Short debate thereon	1058
POST-OFFICE—COMPULSORY REGISTRATION OF STAMPS, &c.—Observa- tions, Mr. Monk .....	1064
Main Question, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,” put, and agreed to.	1064
SUPPLY— considered in Committee.
Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.	1064
Endowed Schools Act (1869) Amendment Bill, [Bill 207]
Bill, as amended, considered .....	1065
Amendments made:—Bill to be read the third time upon Monday next.
ROYAL NAVAL ARTILLERY VOLUNTEER FORCE BILL—Ordered (Mr. Goschen, Mr. Shaw, Lefevre); presented, and read the first time [Bill 264] .....	1066
SANITARY ACT (1866) AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL—Ordered (The Marquess of Har- tington, Mr. Secretary Bruce); presented, and read the first time [Bill 266] .....	1066
FOUR COURTS MARSHALSEA (DUBLIN) BILL—Ordered (The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Secretary Bruce); presented, and read the first time [Bill 265] .....	1066

LORDS, MONDAY, JULY 28.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS—DENBIGH FREE GRAMMAR SCHOOL— Explanation, The Marquess of Ripon .....	1067
OFFICERS OF HER MAJESTY'S ARMY—ABOLITION OF PURCHASE—The Queen's Answer to the Address of Monday last reported by the Lord Steward .....	1067
MARRIAGE OF H.R.H. THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH—Message from the Queen—Delivered by the Earl Granville, and read by the Lord Chancellor .....	1068
Ordered, That the said Message be taken into consideration to-morrow .
EAST AFRICA—THE SLAVE TRADE—OBSERVATIONS—RESOLUTION— Moved to resolve, That in the opinion of this House late proceedings and events in East Africa render it desirable that the consular authority of Great Britain in the Portuguese dominion from Cape Delgade to Delagoa Bay should now be re-established, (The Lord Campbell) .....	1068
After short debate, Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.
STANDARDS COMMISSION, 1870—WEIGHTS AND MEASURES—Observations, Question, Lord Colchester; Reply, Earl Cowper .....	1076
ACHIN—ADDRESS FOR CORRESPONDENCE— Moved , “That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copy of the Correspondence relating to the abrogation of the Treaty of 1824,”—(The Lord Stanley of Alderley) .....	1077
After short debate, Motion agreed to.
INDIA—PUNJAUB, &c.—ARMY SERVICES—MOTION FOR A RETURN— Moved for, Return of the services in the field of the army on the Punjab frontier from 1849 to 1863, for which medals were granted; showing the strength of the force employed, the name of the officer who commanded, the number of casualties, upon each occasion separately: And for, Similar Return respecting the Bazotee Expedition of February 1869; and to ask the State for India, why the provisions of the Warrant of 1863, granting

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 28.]	Page
Law Agents (Scotland) Bill—
Commons Reasons for disagreeing to certain of the Amendments made by the Lords considered (according to Order) .....	1084
Moved, not to insist upon the Amendments made by their Lordships, ( The Lord Chancellor. ) After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Lords' Amendments to which the Commons have disagreed not insisted on.
BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—
Moved, That for the remainder of the Session the Bill or Bills which are entered for consideration on the Minutes of the day shall have the same precedence which Bills have on Tuesdays and Thursdays.—( The Lord Redesdale. )
Motion agreed to.
THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, MONDAY, JULY 28, 1856.—See page 2
IRELAND—FRANKFORD BUNCH OF MAGISTRATES— Question, Sir Patrick O'Brien; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington .....	1085
ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT—EXAMINATION IN MUSIC IN TRAINING SCHOOLS— Question, Mr. Wingfield Baker; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster .....	1086
POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPHS—RETURN MESSAGES— Question, Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence; Answer, Mr. Motteux .....	1087
COMMERCIAL TREATY BETWEEN AVO AND FRANCE— Question, Mr. Macfie; Answer, Viscount Enfield .....	1087
METROPOLITAN POLICE—LIGHTING OF CELLS— Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, Mr. Bruce .....	1088
ARMY—ADJUTANTS OF YOUTHMANE REGIMENTS— Question, Mr. Brocklehurst; Answer, Mr. Cardwell .....	1088
ARMY—MEDICAL DEPARTMENT—THE MEDICAL WARRANT— Question, Mr. D. Dalympyle; Answer, Mr. Cardwell .....	1088
AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS MEETING—ALLEGED DISTURBANCES AT LEIGH- TON BUZZARD— Questions, Colonel Gilpin; Answers, Mr. Bruce, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice .....	1089
FORESTORIES—ENCROACHMENTS AT TRURO— Question, Colonel Hogg; An- swer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue .....	1090
PARLIAMENTARY REPORTING IN THE COLONIES— Question, Mr. Pim; Answer, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen .....	1091
TREATY OF WASHINGTON—BOARD OF ASSESSORS—CLAIM FOR AVES ISLAND — Question, Viscount Sandon; Answer, Viscount Enfield .....	1092
ARMY—WAR OFFICE—CHIEF CLERK, MILITARY DEPARTMENT— Question, Mr. Watney; Answer, Mr. Cardwell .....	1092
DUCHY OF LANCASTER—GENOVA OVER LANCASTER STAMPS— Question, Mr. E. Stanley; Answer, Mr. Childers .....	1093
SPAIN—RECOGNITION OF THE CARLISTS— Question, Mr. Callan; Answer, Viscount Enfield .....	1094
ROYAL COMMISSION ON LOSS OF LIFE AT SEA—MR. PLIMSOLL AND THE BOARD OF TRADE— Question, Mr. Slater-Booth; Answer, Mr. Chi- chester Fortescue .....	1094
NAVY—CHATHAM DOCKYARD—NEW RIVER WALL— Question, Mr. J. B. Smith; Answer, Mr. Goschen .....	1096
H.R.H. THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH—
Message from Her Majesty brought up, and read by Mr. Speaker .....	1096
Moved, "That this House will to-morrow, at Two of the clock, resolve itself into Committee to consider Her Majesty's Gracious Message,"— ( Mr. Bruce. )
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Committee thereupon To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 28.]

Page

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT ORDERS OF THE DAY—
Moved , “That on Wednesday next, and every succeeding Wednesday, Government Orders of the Day do have precedence,”—( Mr. Bruce )	1098
After short debate, Motion agreed to.
SUPPLY—considered in Committee—
(In the Committee.)
CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.—CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.
(1.) £57,800, to complete the sum for New Courts of Justice and Offices.—After short debate, Vote agreed to	1098
CLASS V.—(2.) £207,445, to complete the sum for Consular Establishments Abroad, &c.—After debate, Vote agreed to ..	1100
SUPPLY—POST OFFICE SERVICES.
(3.) £2,745,342, Post Office Services, &c.—After debate, Vote agreed to ..	1110
(4.) £679,000, Post Office Telegraphic Service.
SUPPLY—SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.
(5.) £15,000, Metropolitan Police Courts.	1122
(6.) £8,500, New Palace at Westminster and further Embankment of the River Thames.—After debate, Vote agreed to ..	1129
(7.) £28,740, Embassy Houses at Vienna and Washington.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ..	1134
(8.) Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £5,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1874, for the Superintendent of Convict Establishments, and for the Maintenance of Convicts in Convict Establishments in England and the Colonies” ..	1136
After short debate, Moved , “That the Vote be omitted.”—( Colonel Barttelot ) ..	1136
After further short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 129, Noes 45; Majority 84.
(9.) Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £26,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1874, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Commissioners of Police, of the Police Courts, and of the Metropolitan Police Establishment of Dublin” ..	1136
Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £1,000, &c.”—( Mr. M'Laren )—After debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
Original Question again proposed:—Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £14,000, &c.”—( Mr. M'Laren ) ..	1145
Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 71, Noes 124; Majority 53.
Original Question put, and agreed to.
(10.) £153,750, Constabulary Force (Ireland).—After short debate, Vote agreed to ..	1143
(11.) £23,725, Supplementary sum, Miscellaneous Legal Charges in Ireland.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ..	1146
(12.) £27,000, Supplementary sum, British Museum.	1146
Moved , to omit the Vote.—( Lord George Hamilton ).—On Question, Vote agreed to ..	1146
(13.) £1,500, Supplementary Sum, National Gallery.
(14.) Motion made, and Question proposed, “That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £3,711, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1874, for the Expenses of Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions Abroad” ..	1148
Moved , to omit the Vote.—( Mr. Cavendish Bentinck ).—After short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided; Ayes 138, Noes 16; Majority 122.
(15.) £51,700, Supplementary sum, Colonial Local Revenue, &c.
(16.) £15,000, Supplementary sum, Tonnage Bounties, &c.
(17.) £14,000, Supplementary sum, Temporary Commissions.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ..	1150
(18.) £7,000, Supplementary sum, Miscellaneous Expenses.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ..	1150
(19.) £5,760, Repayment of Moneys under the Kensington Station and North and South Junction Railway Act 1859 (Repayment of Monies) Act 1872.
(20.) £10,000, Dover Harbour.—After short debate, Vote agreed to ..	1151
£42,000, Supplementary sum, Telegraph Extension Works.	1151

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 28.]

Page

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Committee continued.	1157
SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.
(22.) £847,467, Half-Pay, Reserved Half-Pay, &c., Navy and Royal Marines.
(23.) £187,740, Freight of Ships, &c.
(24.) £12,000, Supplementary sum, Navy (Scientific Branch).
(25.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £15,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of the increased Rate of Retired Pay to certain Classes of Officers now on the Active List" —	1151
Moved, to omit the Item £15,000.—(Sir John Hay)—After short debate, Question put:—The Committee divided ; Ayes 69, Noes 30; Majority 39.
(26.) £142,961, Greenwich Hospital and School.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

WAYS AND MEANS—

Considered in Committee

1158

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the Service of the year ending on the 31st day of March 1874, the sum of £26,470,716, be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

LORDS, TUESDAY, JULY 29.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH—THE QUEEN'S MESSAGE—Her Majesty's most gracious Message of yesterday considered (according to Order)	1159
---	------

Then, after short debate, an humble Address of thanks and concurrence ordered nomine dissentientis to be presented to Her Majesty thereupon: The said Address to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with white staves.

Pollution of Rivers Bill (No. 230)—

Moved, "That the Order for Committee be discharged,"—(The Duke of Northumberland)	1161
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Order discharged; and Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment, &c. Bill (No. 243)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2 <sup>d</sup> ,"—(The Lord President)	1162
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 <sup>d</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

CONFESION IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND—ADDRESS FOR A PAPER—

Moved, that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copy of petition presented to the Upper House of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury by the Archbishop of Canterbury, praying among other things for the training and licensing of a body of confessors in the Church of England; together with the names of the subscribers and copy of the answer to the same presented by the Committee of the whole Upper House,—(The Earl of Harrowby)	1166
After short debate, Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Supreme Court of Judicature Bill [H.L.]—

Returned from the Commons with the amendments to which the Lords have disagreed not insisted on; and with the amendments made by the Lords to the amendments made by the Commons agreed to, with an amendment; and with consequential amendments to an amendment made by the Commons: The said amendment and consequential amendments to be considered on Thursday next.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JULY 29.	Page
WEST RIDING MAGISTRACY—Questions, Mr. Carter; Answers, Mr. Bruce	1172
RAILWAYS — RAILWAY PASSENGERS' COMMUNICATION—Questions, Colonel North, Mr. J. G. Talbet; Answers, Mr. Chichester Fortescue	1172
ARMY—RETIRING ADJUTANTS OF MILITIA AND VOLUNTEERS—Question, Lord Elcho; Answer, Mr. Cardwell	1173
SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM — NATURAL HISTORY MUSEUM—Questions, Major Beaumont; Answers, Mr. Ayrton	1174
DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICE — FOREIGN REPRESENTATIVES IN MOROCCO—Question, Mr. Graham; Answer, Viscount Enfield	1175
FRANCE—THE NEW COMMERCIAL TREATY — Questions, Mr. Newdegate; Answers, Viscount Enfield, Mr. Gladstone	1176
NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—TEACHERS IN IRISH WORKHOUSE SCHOOLS — Question, Mr. Pim; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	1177
THE BRITISH MUSEUM—DUPLICATE BOOKS—Question, Mr. Baines; Answer, Mr. Spencer Walpole	1178
POST OFFICE—CAPE OF GOOD HOPE AND ZANZIBAR MAIL CONTRACT— Question, Mr. Slater-Booth; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	1179
ELEMENTARY EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—NEW CODE, 1878.—THE MUSIC FINE—Question, Mr. Brogden; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster	1179
 PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE POST OFFICE BALANCES Moved, "That the House will proceed, this day, with the Motion relating to Post Office Balances, of which Notice has been given, after the Order of the Day for a Committee to consider of Her Majesty's Message,"—(Mr. Gladstone.)
Motion agreed to.
 H.R.H. THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH—THE QUEEN'S MESSAGE—
Message from Her Majesty [28th July] considered in Committee (In the Committee.)	1180
Queen's Message read.
Moved, (1.) "That the annual sum of Ten Thousand Pounds be granted to Her Majesty, out of the Consolidated Fund of Great Britain and Ireland, towards providing for the Establishment of His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh and Her Imperial Highness the Grand Duchess Marie Alexandrovna of Russia, the said Annuity to be settled on His Royal Highness for his life, in such manner as Her Majesty shall think proper, and to commence from the day of the Marriage of their Royal Highnesses, such Annuity to be in addition to the Annuity now enjoyed by His Royal Highness under the Act of the twenty-ninth year of Her present Majesty."
(2.) "That Her Majesty be enabled to secure to Her Imperial Highness the Grand Duchess Marie Alexandrovna, in case she shall survive His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, an annual sum not exceeding Six Thousand Pounds during her life, to support her Royal Dignity,"—(Mr. Gladstone.)
After short debate, Motion agreed to.
Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.
 POST OFFICE (BALANCES)—TELEGRAPHIC DEPARTMENT—MIS-APPROPRIATION OF FUNDS—RESOLUTION—
Moved, "That this House, having considered the Reports of the Select Committee of Public Accounts, records its disapproval of the conduct of the Post Office in respect of the mis-appropriation of balances therein mentioned; and is of opinion that the control of the Treasury over the Post Office as a Revenue Department having proved inadequate for the earlier detection and rectification of such irregularities requires to be more watchfully exercised,"—(Mr. Cross)	1189
Amendment proposed, To leave out from the word "House" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "regrets to find, from the Reports of the Committee of Public Accounts, that the Post Office revenue and Savings Bank balances have been largely employed for the purpose of Telegraph capital expenditure without the authority of Parliament, and is of opinion that it is the duty of the Government to take effectual measures to prevent the recurrence of such a proceeding,"—(Sir John Lubbock,)—instead thereof	1205

PARLIAMENTARY
TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 29.]	[29 JULY 1870]	Page
Post Office (Balances) Telegraphic Department—Misappropriation of Funds— Resolution—continued
Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question;"—After long debate, Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 111, Noes 161; Majority 50.
Division List, Ayes and Noes
Words added:—Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.
Resolved, That this House regrets to find, from the Reports of the Committee of Public Accounts, that the Post Office revenue and Savings Bank balances have been largely employed for the purposes of Telegraph capital expenditure without the authority of Parliament, and is of opinion that it is the duty of the Government to take effectual measures to prevent the recurrence of such a proceeding.
It being now Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.
The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.
SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—REPORT
Resolutions [July 28] reported
Moved, "That the said Resolutions be now read a second time."
CUSTOM HOUSE CLERKS AT THE OUTPORTS—Observations, Viscount Sandon. After debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Colonel Hogg:)—After further debate, Question put, and agreed to:—Debate adjourned till To-morrow.
Telegraphs Bill [Bill 262]—
Order for Committee read
After short debate, Bill considered in Committee
After short time spent therein, Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.
Railway Regulation Bill [Bill 23]—
Bill considered in Committee
After short time spent therein, Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.
Expiring Laws Continuance Bill [Bill 261]—
Order for Committee read:—Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"—(Mr. Baxter)
Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day month, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Butt)—instead thereof.
After short debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.
Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.
Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to:—Bill considered in Committee.
After short time spent therein, Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act (1870) Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. Butt, Mr. P. J. Smyth); presented, and read the first time [Bill 271] COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JULY 30.
NAVY—ASSISTANT SURGEONS—Question, Sir Dominic Corrigan; Answer, Mr. Goschen
IRELAND—THE COUNTY OF LOUTH—Question, Mr. Callan; Answer, Mr. Gladstone

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 31.]

	Page
CRIMINAL LAW—THE WEAVERHAM COCK-FIGHTING CASE—Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answer, Mr. Bruce	1324
AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS MEETING—LEIGHTON BUZZARD—ALLEGED DISTURBANCES—Observations, Mr. Bruce	1325
PARLIAMENT—THE NEW PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—THE FERSOES—Questions, Mr. Bowring; Answers, Mr. Ayrton	1326
FISHERY BOARD (SCOTLAND)—BRANDING FEES—Question, Mr. Macfie; Answer, Mr. Baxter	1327
IRELAND—THE IRISH CONSTABULARY—Question, Sir Frederick W. Heygate; Answer, Mr. Bruce	1327
IRELAND—LABOURERS' COTTAGES—Question, Sir Frederick W. Heygate; Answer, Mr. Bruce	1328
PATENT RIGHTS—INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE, VIENNA—Question, Mr. Macfie; Answer, Mr. Baxter	1328
POST OFFICE—REGISTRATION OF LETTERS—Question, Mr. Macfie; Answer, Mr. Monsell	1329
METROPOLIS—KNIGHTSBRIDGE BARRACKS, MILLBANK, AND HYDE PARK—Question, Sir Thomas Bateson; Answer, Mr. Cardwell	1329
CHURCH OF ENGLAND—WEST INDIES CLERGY ACT—THE BISHOP OF KINGSTON—Question, Sir Charles Adderley; Answer, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen	1330
HARBOURS, DOCKS, AND PIERS ACT, 1847—Question, Mr. Stevenson; Answer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue	1331
POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—SUB-POSTMASTERS—Question, Mr. Plunket; Answer, Mr. Monsell	1332
EPPING FOREST—EXPENDITURE AND CHARGES—Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, Mr. Ayrton	1333
POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT—HERRING'S TELEGRAPH PRINTING INSTRUMENT—Question, Mr. W. M. Torrens; Answer, Mr. Monsell	1334
SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—THE VOTE FOR DOVER HARBOUR—Question, Mr. Rylands; Answer, Mr. Chichester Fortescue	1334
ARMY—7TH LANCASHIRE MILITIA—Question, The O'Donoghue; Answer, Mr. Cardwell	1334
PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—Question, Mr. Baillie Cochrane; Answer, Mr. Gladstone:—Short debate thereon	1335
 Duke of Edinburgh's Annuity Bill [Bill 272]
Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Gladstone)	1337
Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now" and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day month,"—(Mr. P. A. Taylor.)
After debate, Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question:—"—The House divided; Ayes 162, Noses 18; Majority 144.
Division List, Noses	1358
Main Question put, and agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow, at Two of the clock.
 Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill—
Order for Second Reading read	1358
After debate, on Question, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"
EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—Question, Mr. Fawcett; Answer, Mr. Goschen	1385
ARMY—ARTILLERY—THE 35-TON GUN—Observations, Lord Elcho; Reply, Sir Henry Storks:—Short debate thereon	1386
Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[July 30.]	Page
Factory Acts Amendment Bill [Bill 47]—
Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [11th June], “That the Bill be now read a second time:”—Question again proposed:—Debate resumed .. .	1287
Amendment proposed:
To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in the opinion of this House, it is undesirable to sanction a measure which would discourage the employment of women, by subjecting their labour to a new legislative restriction to which it is not proposed to subject the labour of men,”—(Mr. Fawcett)—instead thereof.
Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”
After debate, it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.
Consolidated Fund Appropriation Bill—Ordered (Mr. Bonham-Carter, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Baxter); presented, and read the first time .. .	1306
Militia Pay Acts Amendment Bill—Ordered (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Mr. Secretary Cardwell); presented, and read the first time [Bill 273] .. .	1306

LORDS, THURSDAY, JULY 31.

Supreme Court of Judicature Bill—
Commons' Amendments, &c. considered.
Commons' Amendment to Lords' Amendments to Commons' Amendments and Commons' consequential Amendments considered (according to Order) .. .	1307
And, after short debate, agreed to.
Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment Bill (No. 243)—
House in Committee (according to Order) .. .	1308
Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received To-morrow; and Standing Orders No. 37. and 38. to be considered in order to their being dispensed with; Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 265.)
Endowed Schools Act (1869) Amendment Bill (No. 253)—
Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2 <sup>a</sup> ;”—(The Lord President) .. .	1309
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2 <sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.
Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill (No. 254)—
Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2 <sup>a</sup> ;”—(The Earl Cowper) .. .	1318
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2 <sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.
Conspiracy Law Amendment Bill (No. 256)—
Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2 <sup>a</sup> ;”—(The Earl of Kimberley) .. .	1819
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2 <sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

COMMONS, THURSDAY, JULY 31.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT—SCHOOL BOARD, HOLME ST. CUTHBERT'S—
Question, Mr. F. S. Powell; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster .. .	1321
CRIMINAL LAW—FORGED TELEGRAMS—
Question, Mr. Peek; Answer, The Attorney General .. .	1821
NAVY—THE ROYAL MARINES—
Question, Mr. Watney; Answer, Mr. Goschen .. .	1322
ARMY—THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF OF THE FORCES IN IRELAND—
Questions, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Otway; Answers, Mr. Cardwell .. .	1323

TABLE OF CONTENTS

COMMONS, FRIDAY, AUGUST 1.	Page
IRELAND—THE COUNTY OF LOUGH—Question, Mr. Gallan; Answer, Mr. Bruce	1429
DOMINION OF CANADA—CHARGES OF CORRUPTION IN REFERENCE TO PACIFIC RAILROAD—Questions, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Answers, Mr. Gladstone	1430
ARMY—ISSUE OF FREE RATIONS—Question, Major Arbuthnot; Answer, Mr. Cardwell .. .. ..	1432
THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON OFFICERS OF HER MAJESTY'S ARMY—ABOLITION OF PURCHASE—Question, Major Arbuthnot; Answer, Mr. Cardwell ..	1432
ARMY—MAJORS OF THE SCOTTISH CORPS (INDIA)—Question, Major Arbuthnot; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff .. .. ..	1436
IRELAND—DRAINAGE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT, 1863—DRAINAGE OF THE RIVERS SUCK AND SHANNON—Questions, Major Trench; Answers, Mr. Gladstone .. .. ..	1438
NAVY—OFFICERS OF THE NAVY—RELATIVE RANK—Question, Mr. H. Samuelson; Answer, Mr. Shaw-Lefevre .. .. ..	1435
METROPOLIS—SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM—Question, Lord Echo; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster .. .. ..	1436
THE MILITARY SYSTEM OF BELGIUM—Question, Mr. Dimsdale; Answer, Viscount Enfield .. .. ..	1436
ARMY ORGANIZATION—EXCHANGES—HON. CAPTAIN DRUMMOND—Question, Lord Echo; Answer, Mr. Cardwell .. .. ..	1436
ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT—BOARDED SCHOOLS—THE NATIONAL ANTHEM—Question, Lord Claud John Hamilton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	1437
PARLIAMENT—ORDER OF BUSINESS—Question, Mr. Haweck; Answer, Mr. Gladstone .. .. ..	1438
Moved , “That the Orders of the Day appointed for the Evening Sitting this day be postponed until after the Notice of Motion relating to the Widows and Families of Civil Servants of the Crown and the three Notices of Motions next following,”— (Mr. Gladstone.)
After short debate, Motion agreed to.
Duke of Edinburgh's Annuity Bill [Bill 272]—
Bill considered in Committee .. .. ..	1440
After short time spent therein, Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow.
Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill—
Order for Committee read:— Moved , “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair” .. .. ..	1450.
After short debate, Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow.
EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS—
Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [31st July], “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—Question again proposed:—Debate resumed .. .. ..	1454
After debate, Moved , “That the Debate be now adjourned.”— (Mr. Beckett-Denison:) —Motion agreed to:—Debate further adjourned till To-morrow.
And it being now five minutes to Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.
The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the CIVIL SERVANTS (PENSIONS TO WIDOWS AND
Mr. Baillie Cochrane .. .. ..	1471
vations, [it.]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

LORDS, SATURDAY, AUGUST 2.	Page
Endowed Schools' Act (1889) Amendment Bill (No. 253)—
Amendments reported (according to Order). . . . .	1472
Further Amendments made; The Queen's Consent signified; the Standing Orders Nos. 37. and 38. considered (according to Order) and dispensed with; Bill read 3 rd , with the Amendments, and passed, and sent to the Commons.
COMMONS, SATURDAY, AUGUST 2.
NATIONAL EDUCATION COMMISSIONERS—The CALLAN Schools—Dismissal of REV. MR. O'KEEFE: Question, Mr. Agar-Ellis; Answer, Mr. Gladstone	1473
PARLIAMENT—THE COUNT OUT—Observations, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck	1474
Moved, "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.)
After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill—
Order for Third Reading read .. . . . .	1477
After short debate, Bill read the third time and passed.
EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS—
Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [31st July], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair;"
—Question again proposed:—Debate resumed .. . . . .	1477
After long debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.
Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.
ACCOUNTS considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)
After short debate, Resolved, That it appears by the Accounts laid before this House that the total Revenue of India for the year ending the 31st day of March 1872 was £50,110,215; the charges in India, including the collection of the Revenue, Interest on Debt, and Public Works ordinary, were £37,282,808; the charges in England (including £1,249,040, the value of Stores supplied to India) were £7,980,017; the Guaranteed Interest on the Capital of Railway and other Companies, in India and in England, deducting net Traffic Receipts, was £1,723,218, making a total charge for the same year of £46,986,038; and there was an excess of Income over Expenditure in that year amounting to £3,124,177; that the charge for Public Works extraordinary, was £1,628,474, and that, including that charge the excess of Income over Expenditure was £1,495,703.
Resolution to be reported upon Monday.
Four Courts Marshalsea (Dublin) Bill (Bill 265)—
Bill considered in Committee .. . . . .	1509
Moved, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair,"—(The Marquess of Hartington:)—Motion agreed to. [No Report.]
LORDS, MONDAY, AUGUST 4.
Duke of Edinburgh's Annuity Bill (No. 278)—
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2 nd ,"—(The Earl Granville) .. . . . .	1510
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2 nd accordingly; Committee negatived: Then Standing Orders Nos. 37. and 38. considered (according to Order) and dispensed with:—Bill read 3 rd , and passed.
Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill—
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2 nd ,"—(The Earl Granville) .. . . . .	1510
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2 nd accordingly; Committee negatived: Then Standing Orders Nos. 37. and 38. considered (according to Order) and dispensed with:—Bill read 3 rd , and passed.
VOL. CCXVII. [THIRD SERIES.]	[ f ]

TABLE OF CONTENTS

COMMONS, FRIDAY, AUGUST 1.	Page
IRELAND—THE COUNTY OF LOUTH—Question, Mr. Gallan; Answer, Mr. Bruce ..	1429
DOMINION OF CANADA—CHARGES OF CORRUPTION IN REFERENCE TO PACIFIC RAILROAD—Questions, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Answers, Mr. Gladstone ..	1430
ARMY—ISSUE OF FREE RATIONS—Question, Major Arbuthnot; Answer, Mr. Cardwell ..	1432
THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON OFFICERS OF HER MAJESTY'S ARMY—ABOLITION OF PURCHASE—Question, Major Arbuthnot; Answer, Mr. Cardwell ..	1432
ARMY—MAJORS OF THE SCIENTIFIC CORPS (INDIA)—Question, Major Arbuthnot; Answer, Mr. Grant Duff ..	1435
IRELAND—DRAINAGE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT, 1883—DRAINAGE OF THE RIVERS SUCK AND SHANNON—Questions, Major Trench; Answers, Mr. Gladstone ..	1436
NAVY—OFFICERS OF THE NAVY—RELATIVE RANK—Question, Mr. H. Samuelson; Answer, Mr. Shaw-Lefevre ..	1435
METROPOLIS—SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM—Question, Lord Elcho; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	1436
THE MILITARY SYSTEM OF BELGIUM—Question, Mr. Dimsdale; Answer, Viscount Enfield ..	1436
ARMY ORGANIZATION—EXCHANGES—HON. CAPTAIN DRUMMOND—Question, Lord Elcho; Answer, Mr. Cardwell ..	1436
ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT—BOARD SCHOOLS—THE NATIONAL ANTHEM—Question, Lord Claud John Hamilton; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster ..	1437
PARLIAMENT—ORDER OF BUSINESS—Question, Mr. Hawett; Answer, Mr. Gladstone ..	1438
Moved , “That the Orders of the Day appointed for the Evening Sitting this day be postponed until after the Notice of Motion relating to the Widows and Families of Civil Servants of the Crown and the three Notices of Motions next following,”—(Mr. Gladstone.)
After short debate, Motion agreed to.
Duke of Edinburgh's Annuity Bill [Bill 272] —
Bill considered in Committee ..	1440
After short time spent therein, Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow.
Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill —
Order for Committee read:— Moved , “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair” ..	1450
After short debate, Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow.
EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS —
Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [31st July], “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair:”—Question again proposed:—Debate resumed ..	1454
After debate, Moved , “That the Debate be now adjourned.”—(Mr. Beckett-Denison:)—Motion agreed to:—Debate further adjourned till To-morrow.
And it being now five minutes to Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.
The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.
CIVIL SERVANTS (PENSIONS TO WIDOWS AND FAMILIES) —Observations, Mr. Baillie Cochrane ..	1471
[House counted out.]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

LORDS, SATURDAY, AUGUST 2.	Page
Endowed Schools Act (1869) Amendment Bill (No. 253)—
Amendments reported (according to Order) .....	1472
Further Amendments made; The Queen's Consent signified; the Standing Orders Nos. 37. and 38. considered (according to Order) and dispensed with; Bill read 3 <sup>d</sup> , with the Amendments, and passed, and sent to the Commons.
COMMONS, SATURDAY, AUGUST 2.
NATIONAL EDUCATION COMMISSIONERS—THE CALLAN SCHOOLS—DISMISSAL OF REV. MR. O'KEEFE: Question, Mr. Agar-Ellis; Answer, Mr. Gladstone .....	1473
PARLIAMENT—THE COUNT OUT: Observations, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck .....	1474
Moved, "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.)
After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill—
Order for Third Reading read .....	1477
After short debate, Bill read the third time and passed.
EAST INDIA REVENUE ACCOUNTS—
Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [31st July], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair;" .....
Question again proposed:—Debate resumed .....	1477
After long debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.
Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.
ACCOUNTS considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)
After short debate, Resolved, That it appears by the Accounts laid before this House that the total Revenue of India for the year ending the 31st day of March 1872 was £50,110,215; the charges in India, including the collection of the Revenue, Interest on Debt, and Public Works ordinary, were £37,282,808; the N.W.I. charges in England (including £1,249,040, the value of Stores supplied to India) were £7,980,017; the Guaranteed Interest on the Capital of Railway and other Companies, in India and in England, deducting net Traffic Receipts, was £1,723,218, making a total charge for the same year of £46,986,038; and there was an excess of Income over Expenditure in that year amounting to £3,124,177; that the charge for Public Works extraordinary was £1,628,474, and that, including that charge the excess of Income over Expenditure was £1,495,705.
Resolution to be reported upon Monday.
Four Courts Marshalsea (Dublin) Bill (Bill 265)—
Bill considered in Committee .....	1509
Moved, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair,"—(The Marquess of Hartington:)—Motion agreed to. [No Report.]
LORDS, MONDAY, AUGUST 4.
Duke of Edinburgh's Annuity Bill (No. 278)—
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2 <sup>d</sup> ,"—(The Earl Granville) .....	1510
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2 <sup>d</sup> accordingly; Committee negatived: Then Standing Orders Nos. 37. and 38. considered (according to Order) and dispensed with:—Bill read 3 <sup>d</sup> , and passed.
Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill—
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2 <sup>d</sup> ,"—(The Earl Granville) .....	1510
After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2 <sup>d</sup> accordingly; Committee negatived: Then Standing Orders Nos. 37. and 38. considered (according to Order) and dispensed with:—Bill read 3 <sup>d</sup> , and passed.
VOL. CCXVII. [THIRD SERIES.]	[ f ]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 4.]		Pg.
UNITED STATES—CONSULAR CONVENTION—OFFENCES ON THE HIGH SEAS—
Question, Lord Monson; Answer, Earl Granville ..	1512
PUBLIC OFFICES—NEW ADMIRALTY AND WAR OFFICES—Question, Lord Redesdale; Answer, The Duke of St. Albans :—Short debate thereon
1513
THE BALLOT ACT—DECLARATION OF THE STATE OF THE POLLS—Notice, ( Lord Denman ) .. .. ..
	1514
COUNTY COURTS (ENGLAND)—MOTION FOR A RETURN—
Moved for, Return from every County Court in England of the specific days on which the Judge sat in the six months ended the 30th June 1872, together with the following particulars, viz.:—
The County Court of holden at [Tabular form.] .. .. ..	1515
—( The Lord Chancellor ) .. .. ..	1515
Motion agreed to.
PRIVATE BILLS—
Standing Orders 159. 176. 178. 179. 182. 184. 185. 186A. 189. and Schedule referred to in Standing Order 181 (sect. 1.), considered, and amended; and to be printed as amended,—( The Chairman of Committees. ) (No. 274.)
COMMONS, MONDAY, AUGUST 4.
LUNACY COMMISSION—DEATH OF MR. COMMISSIONER LUTWIDGE—Question, Lord Ernest Bruce; Answer, Mr. Winterbotham .. .. ..
	1516
POST OFFICE—DELIVERY OF LETTERS—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Monsell .. .. ..
	1517
ARMY—CONTROL DEPARTMENT—Question, Mr. Holt; Answer, Sir Henry Storks .. .. ..
	1518
METROPOLIS—SOUTH KENSINGTON AND BETHNAL GREEN MUSEUMS—Question, Mr. Mundella; Answer, Mr. Gladstone .. .. ..
	1519
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)—REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE—Question, Colonel North; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster .. .. ..
	1520
WAYS AND MEANS—ESTIMATES AND REVENUE—Question, Mr. White; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer .. .. ..
	1521
SPAIN—CAPTURE OF THE “VIGILANTE”—Questions, Dr. Brewer; Observations, Mr. Otway; Reply, Viscount Enfield .. .. ..
	1522
Moved , “That this House do now adjourn,”—( Dr. Brewer. ) AFRICA—THE WEST COAST SETTLEMENTS—THE ASHANTI INVASION—Question, Sir Patrick O’Brien; Answer, Mr. Gladstone .. .. ..
	1525
Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—FACILITIES FOR VISITING THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT—Question, Mr. Holt; Answer, Mr. Ayrton .. .. ..
	1526
DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICE—H.M. CONSUL AT CONSTANTINOPLE—CASE OF MR. PAUL TOMASIAN—Question, Mr. Locke; Answer, Viscount Enfield .. .. ..
	1527
DOMINION OF CANADA—THE GUARANTEED LOAN—Question, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Answer, The Solicitor General .. .. ..
	1527
POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—DUBLIN LETTER CARRIERS—Question, Major Trench; Answer, Mr. Monsell .. .. ..
	1528
DRAINAGE (IRELAND) ACTS, 1835 & 1839—THE RIVER SHANNON—Questions, Major Trench; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer .. .. ..
	1528
POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS DEPARTMENT—INCREASE OF STAFF—Question, Mr. J. G. Talbot; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Monsell .. .. ..
	1529
CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND)—THE CONVICT MONTGOMERY—Question, Colonel North; Answer, Mr. Winterbotham .. .. ..
	1529
CIVIL SERVICE PENSIONS—Question, Mr. Watney; Answer, Mr. W. H. Gladstone .. .. ..
	1530

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 4.]	Page
CRIMINAL LAW—THE WEAVERHAM COCK-FIGHTING CASE—Question, Mr. Jacob Bright; Answer, Mr. Bruce	1531
NAVY—CHATHAM DOCKYARD—THE RIVER WALL—Questions, Mr. Cawley; Answers, Mr. Goschen, Sir Henry Storks	1531
PARLIAMENT—HOUR OF MEETING OF THIS HOUSE—Observations, Mr. J. Lowther:—Short debate thereon	1532
Conspiracy Law Amendment Bill—
Order for Consideration of Lords' Amendments read .....	1533
Moved, "That the Lords' Amendments be taken into Consideration this day three months,"—(Mr. Vernon Harcourt) .....	1533
After short debate, Question put, and agreed to.
Factory Acts Amendment Bill [Bill 47]—
Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [30th July], "That the Bill be now read a second time":—
Question again proposed:—Debate resumed .....	1544
After short debate, Question put, and agreed to:—Main Question, by leave, withdrawn:—Bill withdrawn.
Post Office—MAIL CONTRACT (TABLE BAY AND ZANZIBAR), AND (ZANZIBAR AND ADEN)—
Moved, "That the fresh Contract for the Conveyance of the Mails between Table Bay and Zanzibar with the Union Steam Ship Company be approved,"—(Mr. Bruce) ..	1553
After short debate, Motion agreed to.
Then—
Resolved, That the Contract for the Conveyance of Mails between Zanzibar and Aden with the British India Steam Navigation Company be approved,—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)
LORDS, TUESDAY, AUGUST 5.
PROROGATION OF THE PARLIAMENT—
The ROYAL ASSENT was given to several Bills; And afterwards HER MAJESTY'S SPEECH was delivered to both Houses by The LORD CHANCELLOR.
Then a Commission for proroguing the Parliament was read.
After which,
The LORD CHANCELLOR said—
My Lords, and Gentlemen,
By virtue of Her Majesty's Commission, under the Great Seal, to us and other Lords directed, and now read, we do, in Her Majesty's Name, and in obedience to Her Commands, prorogue this Parliament to Wednesday the Twenty-second day of October next; to be then held; and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued to Wednesday the Twenty-second day of October next.
COMMONS, TUESDAY, AUGUST 5.
Law of Evidence Bill [Bill 274]—
Moved, That the Order for the Second Reading be discharged,"—(The Attorney General) .....	1559
Motion agreed to:—Order discharged; Bill withdrawn.
CRIMINAL LAW—MIDDLESEX GRAND JURIES—Question, Mr. Eykyn; Answer, Mr. Bruce	1560
SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM—Question, Mr. Goldsmid; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster	1560
CRIMINAL LAW—THE WEAVERHAM COCK-FIGHTING CASE—Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Sir Henry Storks	1560

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[August 5.]	Page
THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON OFFICERS OF HER MAJESTY'S ARMY—ABOLITION OF PURCHASE —Question, Colonel North ; Answer, Sir Henry Storks ..	1561
CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT—CASE OF MR. FREETH —Question, Mr. Watney ; Answer, Mr. W. H. Gladstone ..	1561
NAVY—CHATHAM DOCKYARD—THE RIVER WALL —Question, Mr. Cawley ; Answer, Sir Henry Storks ..	1562
PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS—DECLARATION OF THE POLL —Question, Mr. Macfie ; Answer, Mr. Bruce ..	1562
ARMY—PENSIONERS FROM WOOLWICH ARSENAL —Question, Mr. Board ; Answer, Sir Henry Storks ..	1563
MEXICO—DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS —Question, Mr. H. B. Sheridan ; Answer, Viscount Enfield ..	1563
PATENT RIGHTS—INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE, VIENNA —Question, Mr. Macfie ; Answer, Viscount Enfield ..	1564
 IRELAND—DUNDALK MAGISTRACY—MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE —
Moved , “That there be laid before this House, a Copy of Correspondence, and all Documents connected therewith, between the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, his Lordship's Secretaries, and Mr. Callan, M.P., and E. H. M'Ardle, esquire, between the 23rd day of December 1868 and the 31st day of July 1869, with respect to the filling up of a vacancy on the Dundalk Bench of Magistrates, by the appointment of the Chairman of the Town Commissioners thereto,”—(Mr. Callan) ..	1564
After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.
 COUNTIES, IRELAND (LORD LIEUTENANTS AND MAGISTRATES)—MOTION FOR A RETURN —
Moved , “That there be laid before the House, a Return, as per annexed form, as to each county in Ireland stating the name of Lieutenant and date of his appointment as such : names of the local Magistracy with dates of appointment, distinguishing resident from non-resident, and amount of property for which each Magistrate appears rated for the relief of the poor as Occupier and as immediate Lessor, and stating whether usually resident or non-resident in County, in a tabular form,”—(Mr. Callan) ..	1566
After short debate, Motion negatived.
 PROROGATION OF THE PARLIAMENT —
Message to attend The Lords Commissioners ..	1570

For the Death of the Duke of Northumberland.
For the Death of the Duke of Bedford.
For the Death of the Duke of Rutland.
LORDS.

For the Death of the Duke of Norfolk.
For the Death of the Duke of Argyll.
For the Death of the Duke of Hamilton.
For the Death of the Duke of Lauderdale.
SAT. FIRST.

For the Death of the Duke of Marlborough.

TUESDAY, JULY 15.

The Earl De La Warr, after the Death of his Brother.

The Lord Stourton, after the Death of his Father.

The Lord Manners, after the Death of his Father.

MONDAY, JULY 21.

The Lord Lytton, after the Death of his Father.

TUESDAY, JULY 22.

The Earl of Chesterfield, after the Death of his Cousin.

FRIDAY, JULY 25.

COMMONS.

NEW WRITS ISSUED.

MONDAY, JULY 21. For the Death of the Duke of Northumberland.
For Stafford (Eastern Division), v. John Robinson McClean, esquire, deceased.

FRIDAY, JULY 25. For Greenwich, v. Sir David Salomons, baronet, deceased.
For Dundee, v. George Armitstead, esquire, Chiltern Hundreds.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

MONDAY, AUGUST 4.
Greenwich—Thomas William Boord, esquire.

HANSARD'S
PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES, IN THE
FIFTH SESSION OF THE TWENTIETH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 10 DECEMBER, 1868, AND THENCE CONTINUED TILL 6 FEBRUARY, 1873, IN THE THIRTY-SIXTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

FOURTH AND LAST VOLUME OF THE SESSION.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 8th July, 1873.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE — Report—Improvement of Land.

PUBLIC BILLS—*First Reading—Gas and Water Works Facilities Act, 1870, Amendment* (201).*

*Second Reading—Canada Loan Guarantee (183); National Debt Commissioners (Annuities)* (191); Blackwater Bridge* (197); Prison Officers Superannuation (Ireland)* (192).*

*Committee—Report—Slave Trade (East African Courts)* (187); Slave Trade (Consolidation)* (188).*

*Report—Ecclesiastical Commissioners* (200).*

PRIVILEGE—THE APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF THIS HOUSE—SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE BILL.

EARL GRANVILLE: Before we proceed to the Orders of the Day, I wish to make an appeal to the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cairns). I prefer doing it now to waiting till his Notice comes on, and I make the appeal with the more confidence because it relates to a Bill on which the noble and learned Lord co-operated with great fairness with my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, in order to attain an object of importance to this House, and of the greatest importance with regard to the administration of justice in this country. The noble and learned Lord proposes—

“To call the attention of the House to the change in the proposals of the Government in reference to the Appellate Jurisdiction of this House which has been made since the Judicature Bill passed through this House, and to the consequences involved in this change; and to ask the Government whether they intend, and at what time, in the present Session to lay before this House a complete scheme for regulating appeals in Scotland and Ireland analogous to the appellate system for England contained in the Judicature Bill.”

It is impossible not to understand that the first portion of this Notice refers to certain proceedings going on in the House of Commons at the present moment. Now, I have always been led to believe that, though the practice in matters of this kind is similar in both Houses, and though, in some respects, we are much more loose in the observance of points of Order than the other House, we ought in anything that regulates the relations of the two Houses to be equally scrupulous with them as to the mode in which we act. I have taken some pains to ascertain, and a combination of authorities satisfies me beyond all doubt, that such a Notice would not have been allowed to remain on the Votes of the other House. I think it is obvious, therefore, that it cannot be in accordance with the practice of your Lordships' House. I am quite aware that it is easy by ingenious devices to overcome any difficulty as to reference to the other House. I should deprecate that on the part of any Member of this House, and I am quite sure that the noble and learned Lord, in his position in this House, and having occupied with great distinction a post in which he superintended our discussions, would avoid any practice of that sort. I am informed by one of the most distinguished Members of the House of Commons—a Member perfectly independent of Her Majesty's Government—that the person of highest authority there would feel himself in considerable embarrassment in maintaining the universally acknowledged practice with regard to references to this House if Notices of this kind were given here. It is obvious that if we begin, retaliation will follow; and that, however convenient for us to anticipate a discussion to come on on any particular Bill, inconvenience and mischief would arise with regard to the mutual practice of the two Houses. I therefore venture to point out to the noble and learned Lord the difficulties of the position in which we should find ourselves, and to appeal to his sense of what is right in this matter not to go against the practice in the House of Commons, and which, I believe, is equally the practice of your Lordships' House.

LORD CAIRNS : I feel grateful to the noble Earl for the caution which he has been kind enough to give me, and shall endeavour to profit by it. I should have thought it more convenient if the noble Earl had waited to hear what I had to say before suggesting that what I was about to say would be out of Order. There is, however, this difference between the noble Earl and me. I have had the advantage of hearing what he has said, and I venture to suggest that nothing is more out of Order than for the Leader of this House to tell us that he has consulted the authorities in the House of Commons, and that when their practice differs from ours our duty is to follow it.

EARL GRANVILLE: I protest against the remark of the noble and learned Lord. Wishing to know what was the undoubted practice of the other House, I ascertained it from those most likely to tell me; and to imagine that to ascertain a fact in that way is an insult to your Lordships' House shows the very great difficulty which the noble and learned Lord has in making the slightest answer to the points which I submitted to him.

CANADA LOAN (GUARANTEE) BILL.

(The Earl of Kimberley.)

(NO. 183.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the purpose of the Bill was to guarantee the payment of a loan to be raised by the Government of Canada for the construction of public works, and to repeal the Canada Defences Loan Act, 1870. He would remind their Lordships that during the negotiations that resulted in the Treaty of Washington, the Dominion Government abstained from pressing their claim to compensation for the Fenian Raids, on account of the resolute refusal of the United States Government to entertain it; and they subsequently suggested that a guarantee by this country would be a mark of goodwill to Canada, and would facilitate the steps necessary to give effect to the Treaty. They also suggested that the guarantee authorized by the Canada Defences Loan Act, 1870, to the loan of £1,100,000 to be raised by the Dominion Government for the purposes of fortification and defences—no part of which had, however, been borrowed—should be cancelled or rather transferred to the execution of works of a peaceful character. They further proposed the commutation of a certain sum promised for armaments—bringing up the total sum proposed to be guaranteed to £4,000,000. Her Majesty's Government agreed to transfer the guaranteee of the sum for defences to the execution of works of a peaceful and productive character, but they did not think the sum for armaments could properly be included; and they ultimately agreed to propose a guarantee of £3,600,000—that was to say, of a further sum of £2,500,000 in addition to the £1,100,000 already guaranteed—to be expended in the improvement of canals and in the construction of a railway connecting the present railway system of Canada with the Pacific—connecting Canada with the Hudson's Bay territory, the North-west territory, and British Columbia. The Government, while thinking Canada bound to use its utmost efforts to defend itself—as it had gallantly done—thought this an exceptional case in which some assistance should be given; for the Fenian Raids, though as contemptible in their execution as they were wanton and unprovoked, and though repelled by the Canadians themselves with some help from the Imperial Government, involved an expense not to be measured by the actual injury perpetrated; and they were not directed against or caused by any Canadian policy, but arose out of the relations of this country with Ireland. However wise, moreover, it might be to abstain from guarantees, it must be remembered that the Dominion Government had undertaken the government of vast territories—a task which necessitated efficient means of communication throughout—and for this purpose this gigantic railway, which would be 2,900 miles in length, had been undertaken. The territory to be traversed had been described as barren, but there were few richer territories than the belt of the Saskatchewan. They were decidedly superior to Minnesota, whose progress had been unequalled in American colonization; and though the climate was rude there was no difficulty in producing corn and cattle. He believed a stream of emigration would before long be directed thither. The Dominion Government proposed to raise the sum of £8,000,000 sterling, to be expended in the construction of the Pacific Railway, and on the enlargement and improvement of the Canadian canals, and to make concessions of land for the line, the construction of which within 10 years was a condition on which British Columbia had acceded to the Confeder-tion. The Imperial guarantee would enable Canada to effect a loan at lower interest than would otherwise be necessary, and her finances were in a condition which caused no misgiving as to her ability to bear the expense. It was not unreasonable, therefore, that we should to a certain extent help her with our own credit. The Canadian Government intended hereafter to construct the fortifications for which the loan of £1,100,000 was proposed; but they thought it inopportune to do this at a time when relations with the United States had been put on a mature and amicable basis, and one of the most eminent of Canadian statesmen (the late Sir George Cartier) had expressed to him strongly his opinion that the defence of a small portion of frontier would be useless until complete and efficient communications between the different parts of the Dominion had been effected. With respect to the allegation that this guaranteee was a bribe to the Canadians to forego their claims upon the United States on account of the Fenian Raids, he altogether repudiated such an imputation. The Bill was the result of Imperial policy—it was based on sound and sufficient grounds, and would place Canada and the other provinces of the Dominion in a state of permanent peace and tranquillity. That policy was not attributable to any one party or Ministry in this country. It had been promoted by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon), by his noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs when he was at the head of the Colonial Office, and by his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War; and since he had himself been at the Colonial Office he had done his best to carry it out. The Treaty of Washington was on the whole greatly beneficial to Canada—in particular the provisions that secured to the Dominion the free import of fish and fish oil into the United States. Canada, moreover, was interested in the settlement of the differences between England and the United States, and though this country had reserved its right to bring forward the Canadian claim at a future time, there was no outstanding question between the Dominion and the United States. Congratulating his predecessors and the country on the confederation of the North American Provinces, he would further express his hope that the work would soon be completed by the adhesion of Newfoundland. He thought it a matter for congratulation to the colonists that they had thus risen superior to local jealousies; and he would conclude by inviting the House to show its goodwill to the Dominion, and promote the accomplishment of the work by passing the Bill.

Earl Granville

Moved that the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.—
(The Earl of Kimberley.)

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he would join his noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies in repudiating the unworthy suggestion that had somehow gained circulation, that this guarantee was in the nature of a bribe. He knew that the Government of this country—from whatever party it might be constituted—was incapable of offering any such inducement; and he was equally convinced that the Government of the Dominion was equally incapable of accepting one. It was a matter of Imperial policy, and was one of the conditions for the entry of British Columbia into the Confederation. He had no special love for guarantees, and if his memory did not deceive him the right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Government and his Chancellor of the Exchequer had both in former times been eloquent in denouncing them; he should nevertheless give his support to the present proposition, believing that it was calculated to produce great advantage in consolidating the Empire. He did not think the proposed railway so doubtful a scheme as some people considered it; for, notwithstanding the enormous tract of country through which the line would pass, the engineering difficulties were few, while there could be no doubt it would open up a vast country of great fertility and mineral wealth. He dissented, however, from the noble Earl's opinion that the construction of the fortifications would be inopportune at the present moment; for notwithstanding the good understanding that now prevailed, he held that every country had a right to fortify its frontier without being supposed to menace its neighbours. He had doubts as to the propriety of the transfer of a former guarantee, though his last conversation with Sir George Cartier partly removed them; but he supported the Bill in consideration of the difficulties under which Canada had accepted the Treaty of Washington, and the vast importance of the consolidation of the Confederation. When he considered, moreover, that the loan was to be borrowed by the Canadian Government on the security of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, so that, should the railway prove a failure in a pecuniary sense the loss would not fall on us, he thought the guarantee might be given without much danger.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM AND CHANDOS said, that having some personal knowledge of the subject from his former connection with the Colonial Office, and from his acquaintance with eminent Canadian statesmen, he desired to express his full approval of the Bill. He approved especially of the diversion of the guarantee, given for constructing fortifications, to the construction of railways and reproductive works. He had always regretted that the first step of the Canadian Government should be to apply her resources to the erection of defences, which, however valuable in a military point of view, could only protect isolated parts of the frontier. He maintained that the strength of the Dominion rested in developed resources, increased population, and perfect means of communication, and that a railway promoting these objects would be the best provision for a contingency which recent transactions, though not altogether to be approved, had made very remote.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC BILL.—(Nos. 172-211.)

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONSIDERED.

Commons amendments to Lords amendments and Commons reasons for disagreeing to one of the amendments made by the Lords considered (according to order).

Commons amendments to Lords amendments agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON asked their Lordships to waive the Amendment in Clause 25, to which the Commons disagreed. The clause as originally drawn gave power to the Commissioners, "if they think fit," at the instance of any party to the proceedings before them, to state a case in writing for the opinion of a Superior Court upon any question of law. Their Lordships, however, struck out the words "may also, if they think fit," and inserted "shall," making the direction absolute instead of discretionary. To this Amendment the Commons disagreed, giving as their reasons that the Amendment would give rise to vexatious and costly litigation, which might be made use of to render the Bill inoperative; and secondly, because the matter might safely be left to the discretion of the Commissioners. The Government had been willing to accept the Amendment with some alterations; but both sides of the other House were agreed in treating it as inexpedient. He certainly thought that the absolute power of appeal would give an immense advantage to the Railway Companies, who possessed a power of the purse with which it would be vain for an individual to contend. He thought, further, that it was not clear whether this power did not extend to arbitration cases.

Moved, not to insist on the Amendment in Clause 25 to which the Commons have disagreed.—(The Lord President.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he was sorry he could not agree in the course which the Lord President proposed, and which was not that which had the sanction of the Lord Chancellor on a former occasion, for the noble and learned Lord supported the Amendment which made the granting an appeal compulsory. As to the argument about the power of the purse possessed by Railway Companies, if it applied at all it applied universally, and a Railway Company ought not to be allowed an appeal on any occasion whatever. Under these circumstances, he hoped their Lordships would insist on their Amendment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, it was true that, on a former occasion, he gave an opinion that it was desirable there should be a right of appeal in all cases; but it would be an exaggeration of that opinion to say that he would accept the responsibility of advising their Lordships to resist the other House on such a matter. He would not advise their Lordships to differ from the Commons, though perhaps if he had been in the House of Commons he should have advised that House not to differ from their Lordships.

LORD CAIRNS thought it most undesirable that the appeal should be left to the discretion of the Commissioners. One man might grant it in every case, while another, resenting the notion that he could be wrong, would endeavour invariably to refuse it. He urged that the security to be given for costs would prevent improper appeals, and would propose the insertion of words which in arbitration cases would leave an appeal to the discretion of the Commissioners.

LORD HOUGHTON advocated adherence to the Amendment, on the ground that if the Commissioners had the power of refusing appeals they might incur discredit by being supposed to exercise it unduly.

On Question, Whether to insist? their Lordships divided:—Contents 79; Not-Contents 63: Majority 16.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

An amendment made to the said amendment; and a Committee appointed to prepare reasons to be offered to the Commons for the Lords insisting on their amendment: The Committee to meet on Thursday next, at a quarter before Five o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—THE APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF THIS HOUSE—SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE BILL.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD CAIRNS rose, pursuant to Notice, to call the attention of the House to the change in the proposals of the Government in reference to the appellate jurisdiction of this House which has been made since the Judicature Bill passed through this House, and to the consequences involved in this change; and to ask the Government whether they intend, and at what time, in the present Session, to lay before this House a complete scheme for regulating appeals in Scotland and Ireland analogous to the appellate system for England contained in the Judicature Bill, and said: My Lords, the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs at an earlier part of the evening called your Lordships' attention to a question of Order to what he said I was about to state. Now, my Lords, it appeared to me then as it appears now, whether I should not have done right to bring on my Notice as a question of Privilege before the Orders of the Day; but as the Orders were not numerous, and were not likely to occupy much time, I was content to allow them to pass unchallenged. Referring, then, to the Notice I have given, I wish to call your Lordships' attention to a matter which, in my opinion, deeply concerns, not only the Judicature of this country, but also the Privileges of your Lordships' House. The Judicature Bill is so fresh in your Lordships' mind that I need do nothing more than mention one or two circumstances with regard to it which are necessary for my present purpose. The Judicature Bill, which was introduced in this House, was founded mainly upon the recommendations of the Judicature Commission. As to the majority of the proposals contained in that Bill it may be truly said that the public opinion was to a great extent fully matured. That Bill dealt with the Superior Courts of the First Instance in this country—it consolidated them—it amalgamated or "fused" the systems of law which they had to administer. It also proposed to deal with what, up to the time of its introduction, had been the intermediate Courts of Appeal—it amalgamated and strengthened the elements of which they were constituted—and formed one Court of Appeal, the decisions of which should be final and irreversible. The system, so far as England is concerned, which that Bill provided was a complete system. I do not now intend to enter upon any questions which might arise as to the various provisions of the Bill. I am well aware that many of your Lordships were not altogether satisfied with that part of it which—to use an expression somewhat common, though perhaps not altogether correct—took away your Lordships' jurisdiction. But whatever may have been individual opinions as to that or other parts of the Bill, no doubt the system provided by the Bill was, so far as England is concerned, clear, distinct, and complete. The measure, however, made no provision which dealt with any part of the Judicature of Scotland or Ireland, and—without in any way wishing to raise any argument ad hominem against my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, but with the view of reminding your Lordships of the nature of the information which we received from him, I shall take the liberty of mentioning what fell from my noble and learned Friend upon this part of the question. The noble and learned Lord in introducing the Bill to your Lordships' House in that part of his most lucid and able speech in which he entered at length into the advantages of a system under which we should have a Court of First Instance and one irreversible appeal from that Court, said—

"I do not propose to deal by this Bill with the appeals from Scotland or Ireland. Those countries have each their own system of jurisprudence and judicature, with which, so far as their original jurisdiction is concerned, this Bill does not in any way deal. Furthermore, the evidence given before your Lordships' Committee last year by gentlemen conversant with the practice of appeals from Scotland was to the effect that no change was desired in that country. I think the views entertained by the people of Scotland on this subject are entitled to very great respect; it would be an unwise and unnecessary thing to propose changes applicable to that country which the public opinion of that country does not require. As to Ireland, there was also no evidence that any change was wanted. I do not, of course, conceal from myself that if you establish in England a thoroughly good appellate jurisdiction, and find that it works as we hope it will work, opinion both in Scotland and Ireland may probably hereafter tend to the application and adoption of the same system in those countries."—[3 Hanard coxiv. 348-9.]

Nothing can be more satisfactory than that exposition of the principle on which my noble and learned Friend acted, and I have no doubt that these are still his views on the matter. But upon the second reading of the Bill the noble and learned Lord went a little further. He said—

"With regard, however, to Irish and Scotch appeals, there were constitutional objections to transferring that portion of their Lordships' jurisdiction to what might be represented as an English Court, unless that transfer were made by the desire or with the approval of the two countries. The Act of Union with Scotland expressly provided that no appeals from that country should be decided by an English Court. With that provision standing in the Act of Union with Scotland it would have been a more dangerous question than he should like to raise in this Bill if the Government had proposed to transfer to the new Court of Appeal the power of reviewing the decisions of the Scotch Courts without first ascertaining that such a transfer would be approved by the people of Scotland. A similar objection also applied to Ireland. It could hardly be forgotten by their Lordships that in the last century a sharp controversy between the English and Irish Bar arose out of the authority assumed by the Court of Queen's Bench in England to act as a Court of Appeal in Irish cases. That was ultimately solved in favour of the authority of the Irish House of Lords, and in the Act of Union it was provided that Irish appeals should be brought to the House of Lords of the United Kingdom. If it were now proposed to transfer Irish cases to the Court proposed to be established, the Government might inadvertently and unadvisedly revive that controversy which was settled by the Act of Union, and in the ever-varying currents of opinion in Ireland, with the demand for Home Rule, they might have brought a hornet's nest about them if they had raised that question. If, however, Parliament should now establish a Court such as may command its judgments, its constitution, its wisdom, and its authority to public opinion both in Scotland and Ireland, and especially if the Court should be established in such a manner as to admit of the introduction of the best elements of the Scotch and Irish Judicatures, they might, after ripe experience, look forward eventually to the further development of that as well as of other parts of the measure. At present it seemed better that their Lordships should begin to do what they saw to be practicable, hoping that if the new Court began well all further improvements would in the result naturally follow, seeing that such improvements, once begun, had a natural tendency to increase and develop themselves."—[3 Hansard, ccxiv. 1738-9.]

These observations of my noble and learned Friend were well known throughout the three kingdoms; and so far from giving rise to any disappointment or disapprobation in either Scotland or Ireland, I am not aware that they have been received otherwise than with approval by the people of those countries. Your Lordships may recollect that the Bill was referred to a Select Committee of the House. Upon that Committee I had the honour of serving. It was a very large Committee, and upon it were several of my noble and learned Friends; in addition to whom, however, was a very large number of what I may call the non-legal Members of the House; and I can only say that in my experience of Select Committees of this House I have never seen a Committee where the attendance was so full, and where the consideration of a Bill was so careful. The Committee sat from day to day, the Members of it assembled at the earliest possible hour, and sat through the whole of the day; and the Bill having been so considered was reported to your Lordships' House, and passed the third reading. I recollect, that at the conclusion of the Committee, the noble Earl opposite said—and the statement is one in which your Lordships will all concur—that the passage of the Bill through this House was creditable to the House; that the great object of all appeared to be to facilitate the passage of the measure, subjecting it to a fair, proper, and wholesome criticism at the right time for doing so. But before the Bill left this House a circumstance occurred to which I must refer. Immediately before the third reading of the Bill the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees (Lord Redesdale) proposed a Resolution of which he had given Notice, and that Motion he pressed to a division. The Resolution of my noble Friend was to the effect that one tribunal of ultimate appeal for the hearing of disputed suits from the Courts of all the three kingdoms is more advantageous than separate tribunals for such appeals. Some discussion occurred on that Resolution. I recollect saying that I regretted not being able to support the proposal of the noble Lord, because it appeared to me that its ultimate consequence would be to extend the jurisdiction of the Court to be created by the Bill to appeals from Scotland and Ireland, which I considered that the House had clearly indicated its intention not to do. I must assume that an opinion on the subject similar to my own prevailed also with Her Majesty's Government, for I find that on the division the Motion of the noble Lord was voted against by my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, the Marquess of Lansdowne, the Earl of Camperdown, the Marquess of Ripon, Earl Granville, the Earl of Kimberley, the Earl of Morley, Viscount Halifax, the late Lord Chancellor, and others, Members of Her Majesty's Government. The result was that the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees was placed in a minority, and his Resolution was rejected. We are now informed—indeed, I believe I may say we have Parliamentary Notice, being furnished with the proceedings of what goes on in the other House—but, at all events, we know that the proposal of Her Majesty's Government now is that the Court which was created by this Bill as it passed your Lordships' House is to be made a Court of Appeal for Scotland and Ireland as well as for England. That is to say, that that which it was so expressly stated was not to be done will now be done, and that the vote of this House which declared the adoption of the Resolution of the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees to be inex-dient is to be overruled. The first observation which I wish to make on the subject is that, in my opinion, the course which has been taken by Her Majesty's Government, though no doubt undesigned, is at the same time a clear, a palpable, and a most serious infringement of the privileges of this House. I have always understood the rule to be this—that it is a Privilege of your Lordships' House that any Bill affecting the limits of the jurisdiction of the House must be commenced in this House, and that having commenced here it cannot be altered elsewhere. This privilege of your Lordships' House is by no means an antiquated privilege which has abated from desuetude, or been abandoned from indisposition to assert it. It never has been departed from in any manner, but has, within the memory of many noble Lords around me, been asserted and allowed. In 1851, when there was before the House of Commons a Bill for the improvement of the Court of Chancery, which contained a clause empowering this House to require the assistance of the Equity in the same manner as it required the assistance of the Common Law Judges in hearing appeals, Lord Lyndhurst called the attention of your Lordships' House to the proposal, which he declared to be a breach of the privileges of your Lordships' House. That appears to be a tolerably harmless provision. It was taking away nothing from the power of this House, but Lord Lyndhurst called the attention of the House to it as a question of Privilege. I find that on the 23rd of June in that year a debate took place on the subject, and Lord Lyndhurst on that occasion, in moving that it be referred to the Committee of Privileges to consider and report what course should be taken, said—

"This House and the other House of Parliament had been always jealous of any invasion of their privileges, and it was certainly important (particularly at the present moment, when they saw what was passing around them) that their Lordships should exercise caution and vigilance in the maintenance of their just rights and privileges. He had always understood that it was a principle and part of the policy of Parliament that no Bill, affecting in any manner, even remotely, the rights of the Peerage, or of their Lordships' House, the jurisdiction and authority of this House, the manner in which that jurisdiction should be exercised, or the parties employed to sit in that jurisdiction, should originate in the other House of Parliament. That was a principle stated in very distinct terms by Sir William Blackstone (1 Blackstone, 168), and by many other writers who had directed their attention to the subject of the constitution; and in consequence of that principle he now took the liberty of addressing their Lordships."—[3 Hansard, cxvii. 1069-70.]

Lord Cairns

It may be as well that I should read to your Lordships the statement of Sir William Blackstone on the subject. It is somewhat fuller than it was necessary for Lord Lyndhurst to quote for the purpose which he then had in view. The statement of Sir William Blackstone was as follows—

"All Bills likewise which may in their consequences any way affect the right of the Peerage are by the custom of Parliament to have their first rise and beginning in the House of Peers and to suffer no changes or amendments in the House of Commons."

Lord Lyndhurst continued on the occasion to which I am referring—

"Their Lordships were aware (it was a matter of perfect notoriety—it had appeared in the Votes of the other House)—

That, my Lords, can scarcely be out of Order in 1873 which was perfectly in Order in 1851—

"That a Bill had been brought into the other House for the purpose of improving the administration of justice in the Court of Chancery."

Lord Lyndhurst went on to say—

"Thus far he concurred in the objects of the Bill. The question which remained was, how this assistance was to be obtained? He was quite sure, with reference to the principle he had before stated, it ought not to be obtained through the medium of any Bill introduced into the other House of Parliament. The Bill to which he had referred contained a provision that certain persons should attend their Lordships' House to hear appeals; that they should be summoned; and that, in accordance with such summons, they should attend their Lordships and give their advice and assistance. Could anything be more inconsistent with the known privileges of their Lordships' House, than such a provision in a Bill introduced in the other House? It related to their Lordships' jurisdiction—it related to the manner in which that jurisdiction was to be exercised—it related to persons to assist in the exercise of that jurisdiction. Applying those facts to the principle he had before stated, he begged to say, with some confidence, that it was a direct invasion of the privileges of their Lordships' House."—[3 Hansard, cxvii. 1071.]

At the time the late Marquess of Lansdowne was the Leader of the Government in this House, and the noble Earl the present Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who now leads the House, sat beside the Marquess of Lansdowne as a Member of the Government. The discussion continued, and the Lord Chancellor of the day (Lord Truro) said that—"The Bill was prepared with an earnest desire to avoid all infringement upon their Lordships' privileges. Although it was quite true that the ancient Judges were in the habit of attending that House, they were in truth the persons who prepared the Bills. When the House had resolved that a law should be adopted for a particular intent and purpose, the Judges prepared the Bill, but this practice not being the case in modern times, the Judges only attended when summoned. The purport of his clause in the Bill which gave occasion to his noble and learned Friend's observations was that the Vice Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls should attend in like manner as the Judges of the Courts of Common Law, and should in like manner give advice and assistance by their opinion upon all questions prepared for their consideration. If the clause should be found to interfere with their Lordships' privileges he trusted it would be so modified as to secure those privileges from any interference whatever."

"Lord LYNDHURST stated that he had no objection to the substance of the clause; he only wished it to be carried into effect in a constitutional way. It ought not to be introduced into a Bill coming from the House of Commons.

"The Marquess of LANSDOWNE said . . . He could assure the noble and learned Lord that the clauses of which he complained had not been inserted in the Bill with any view of violating the privileges of their Lordships' House; nor could it be accurately stated that their privileges had been violated until the Bill came up to them containing this objectionable clause. Until the Bill came up to them from the House of Commons, their Lordships were not in a state to say that any clause had been improperly inserted in the Bill by the House of Commons. He had no objection to the Motion.

"Lord STANLEY vindicated the course pursued by his noble Friend. . . . But the argument of the noble Marquess was entirely opposed to the argument of the noble Lord on the Wool-sack, who did not consider the clause one violating their privileges, but one which had been studiously framed not to infringe them in any respect.

"The Duke of RICHMOND claimed the right of the House of Lords to insert money clauses in their Bills. It was a privilege which they always claimed, although it was contested by the House of Commons. The latter Assembly had given directions that any Bill with money clauses inserted should be kicked to the Bar by their Speaker. Of late they had not been so uncourteous. But if this Bill came up with the clause referred to contained in it, he would move that the Lord Chancellor kick it to the Bar.

"The Marquess of LANSDOWNE intimated the intention of the Government to have the clause withdrawn."—[3 Hansard, cxvii. 1073-75.]

The noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) requires a precedent for the course which I am now pursuing, and I think I have furnished him with one, which it is not only allowable but absolutely necessary to follow in the present instance. I say so because if we wait until the Bill comes back to us we shall be too late—I mean too late for those who have any good will towards the measure, as I have; because, if the Bill comes up from the other House with a provision which infringes the Privileges of your Lordships' House, it will not become a question of agreement or disagreement with the Commons' Amendments, a question of a Conference or advancing Reasons one way or the other—for no House of Parliament would submit to have its privileges thus dealt with by the other branch of the Legislature. Each House of Parliament is the judge of its own privileges. Let me remind your Lordships of the rule which has been laid down by Lord Coke, and which has been invariably acted upon—

"Whatever matter arises concerning either House of Parliament ought to be discussed and adjudged in that House to which it relates, and not elsewhere."

Now, if a Bill which infringes the Privileges of this House comes up from the other House of Parliament we cannot amend it and we cannot disagree from the Amendments made in it on a question of Privilege. There is only one course which, as far as I know, can be adopted by this House, and that is, to lay the Bill aside. It would be too late to do anything else when the Bill comes up here; and it is therefore important that attention should at once be called to the matter, in order that the provision to which I am referring may be withdrawn while it can be withdrawn.

And now, my Lords, I want to know what is the reason why this infringement of the Privileges of this House should be attempted? Is it to carry out to its logical consequences anything that has been done by your Lordships already? I will show you that not only is that not the case, but that the proposed change will entirely overthrow the principles on which we have proceeded. What were the grounds on which your Lordships were called to agree to the cessation of appeals from England coming to this House? The grounds were two. One ground was advanced much more by my noble and learned Friend the late Lord Chancellor in connection with the measure which he brought forward last year than by my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack this year. That ground was that so long as you have in this country a Judicial Committee of the Privy Council hearing appeals from the Colonies, and this House hearing appeals from the United Kingdom, you have two co-ordinate and final Courts of Appeal, both of whose decisions are irreversible, and that there was therefore a possibility of collision between those two co-ordinate powers. The ground—and, as I think, the more solid ground—urged with great force by my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack this year was that it was a good thing in itself to have as perfect a hearing in a Court of First Instance as could be secured, and as strong a Court of Appeal as could be created. My noble and learned Friend urged that the multiplication of appeals was an evil, and that a second appeal was not a good thing in itself. That is a view which has largely prevailed among those for whose opinions I entertain a great respect—among members of the Bench—it is a view which was urged with great force in this House some years ago, and which has been largely adopted by the Press of this country. There is much, I think, to be said in favour of it, although it does not perhaps carry with me the weight which it does with many other persons. Such, however, was the argument which was urged very strongly by my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack this year. Let us consider it for a few moments. I have always maintained that this was the turning point of the question—where the appeal should lie and where it should be heard. It is not necessary to show that so long as there were only some 50 or 60 appeals to be disposed of every year, there was nothing whatever to prevent this House from disposing of them with perfect facility. It was absurd to talk of the inconveniences arising from any irregularity of attendance, because they could easily be obviated; but if you are to have only one Court of Appeal, to which every subject of appeal must come—and I think I mentioned last year that there would be some 400 or 500 of them—perhaps more—it would be quite impossible for this House to undertake that duty and to discharge it satisfactorily. How is that principle to be applied to Scotland and Ireland? Is it a part of the proposal of the Government that they are to deal with Scotland and Ireland as they have dealt with England? Nothing of the kind. We are told that the Government have not quite made up their minds as to what is to be done in the case of Scotland and Ireland in regard to intermediate appeals, but there is a suggestion that they should continue as they are at present. If so, the whole reason that exists for dealing with the English appeals in the way the Bill deals with them fails entirely to apply to the case of Scotland and Ireland, by your leaving them the intermediate appeals they possess. Take the danger of the possibility of a conflict between two great co-ordinate Courts of Appeal—the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and the House of Lords. What is the proposal with respect to Scotland and Ireland? I understand that the Court of Appeal to be established by the Judicature Bill is to have a paid member from the Scotch Bar and a paid member from the Irish Bar, and at least two ex officio members from Scotland and two from Ireland; and the reason given for that is that, coming from those countries, they should hear Scotch and Irish appeals. The consequence is that, the Court sitting in Divisions, which are not to consist of less than three members—and they are not at all likely to consist of more—you will have Scotch appeals heard by a Division with at least two Scotch members, and the Irish appeals heard by a Division with at least two Irish members. The Indian appeals will be heard by a Division in which at least the two Indian Judges who at present sit in the Judicial Committee will be found; and I suppose you will have the English appeals heard by the English Judges. Thus you will have—not two co-ordinate Courts of Appeal, because the decisions of every one of those Divisions will be irreversible, but you will have a quadrilateral Court of Appeal—four Courts of Appeal deciding according to different grooves and running in different channels of thought; and the possibility suggested to us last year as a reason for making a change—namely, of a difference of opinion between the Judicial Committee and this House in an English case—will, I say, be turned into the certainty of a difference of opinion between the various Divisions of your Court of Appeal. Well, when this objection is taken, what do we find? Why, that the Government ridicule that idea, quote the example of the Judicial Committee and the House of Lords, and say, "Only look; for 100 years you have had two great co-ordinate Courts of Appeal sitting side by side, yet they have never come into collision; no practical man would take into account such a possibility; you are not to suppose these three or four Divisions are more likely to come into collision than the Judicial Committee and the House of Lords." So that the reason assigned last year as a ground for our parting with our jurisdiction is actually ridiculed this year when it is shown that that possibility has become a certainty in reference to a collision between the different Divisions of your new Appellate Court.

Now, my Lords, is this infringement of our Privileges called for by the public opinion of Scotland and Ireland? The evidence taken before your Lordships' Committee last year may be taken as a fair indication of the feeling of the profession, at all events in regard to Scotch and Irish appeals. No stronger evidence could be imagined of the contentment of the Scotch and Irish with their appeals coming to this House. I think the present Lord Advocate deprecated any change taking the Scotch appeals from this House. Well, your Committee of last year reported accordingly. Has there been any manifestation of public opinion in consequence of the announcement at the beginning of this Session that Scotch and Irish appeals were to be retained in this House? I am not aware of any. I have searched for the opinion of Scotchmen on this great and important proposal. One gentleman representing an important constituency and a supporter of the Government (Mr. Macfie), I find, says—

"A great amount of ignorance prevailed upon the subject, and that ignorance had been rendered more profound by the misleading articles that had appeared in some of the newspapers which ought to have known better. The amendments which would make the Bill applicable to Scotland had only just been put upon the paper, it would be next week before they could be proposed and discussed, and therefore he thought that on the whole, it would be better to postpone, at any rate until next Session, the proposal to bring Scotland within the scope of the measure. His own view was that the best course to adopt, instead of bringing Scotch appeals to England, and so necessitating a cost which would give the rich suitors an advantage over the poor, would be to create a well-paid and thoroughly efficient Appellate Court in Scotland which should have jurisdiction over all appeals relating to that country."

My noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack did not use too strong an expression when he said the Government would be bringing a hornet's-nest about their heads if they opened that question of Scotch and Irish appeals. I see that some Resolutions were adopted the other day at a meeting of the Bar of Ireland, and they amounted to this that it would be a very good thing to have a Central Court of Appeal in London, provided it could sit in Dublin; and it should be profusely ornamented by members of the Irish Bar and Irish Bench. That was very patriotic and sensible, though, perhaps, hardly consistent in expression. Now, there are three views which might be taken in this matter. Scotland and Ireland might say—"We would like to be as you are going to be in England—namely, to have only one hearing and then a great Court of Appeal, extinguishing all intermediate appeals, which cost much money." A second view would be this—"Oh, we are quite content with our Primary Courts; we like our intermediate appeals, and don't want them taken away; and we are willing to go to London for an ultimate appeal." But the third, and much more serious view would be if Scotland and Ireland should say—"How did we ever come to London with our appeals at all; how did the thing begin? Scotchmen never went to London before the Treaty of Union; and the reason was that whereas they had their own Parliament and their own House of Lords at home until you absorbed them, and since then we have followed them, and come to the House of Lords in London." And suppose the people of Ireland should say—"We did once go to the Court of Queen's Bench in England; but the country was very nearly in rebellion, and in 1780 you had again to legislate and give the thing up. We would not endure it; and we had our appeal to our own House of Lords." The Irish people would not stand it; and the only footing on which they came to London was that their own House of Lords was absorbed in your Lordships' House. But suppose the Scotch and Irish should say—"If that arrangement is to come to an end, we should like to do our own business at home; we should like to have a well paid and thoroughly efficient Court of Appeal in Scotland—as Mr. Macfie suggests. What is the use of two Scotch Judges and one English Judge sitting in London to hear a Scotch case? It would be just as easy to send the English Judge down to hear it in Edinburgh, instead of requiring all the parties, the writers and agents, to come to London with all the consequential expense; would it not be better to have the Scotch appeals heard at home, letting your English Judge go to Edinburgh for the purpose?" An outcry is being raised in Ireland already—I judge from the Press of that country—and being raised, too, by a part of the Press which is not in the habit of demanding "Home Rule"—against the centralization of the proposal now made; and it is being asserted—a thing which is, at least, intelligible—that if there is to be a Court of this kind, it ought to sit in Dublin, and be a strong Court of Appeal. Are these views, my Lords, to be silenced by a complete change in the proposals of the Government made at 24 hours' notice and without any public intimation or discussion? The noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) intimates that there is a Constitutional objection to this discussion. Well, my Lords, I had a letter this morning from a gentleman in Scotland reminding me of what I had forgotten, of the most singular wording of the Act of Union. Here is the wording of one Article—

"That no causes in Scotland be cognisable by the Courts of Chancery, Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, or any other Court in Westminster-hall; and that the said Courts, or any other of the like nature, after the Union, shall have no power to cognosce, review, or alter the acts or sentences of the Judicatures within Scotland, or stop the execution of the same."—Article xix.

Now, my Lords, do you suppose that the Court which you propose by the Judicature Bill to set up is not a Court "of like nature" with those which the Act of Union stated should not be cognoscible of Scotch causes? Do you suppose that the writing in between two lines of the words "Imperial Court" will alter the nature of the Court? I do not say that, after clear announcement, upon a plain understanding, after full opportunity given to the country to express its opinion, no alteration could be made. What I do say is, that it cannot be done upon 24 hours' notice, and that what is proposed to be so effected is a clear breach of the Privileges of your Lordships' House. It is a breach of Privilege which if carried into effect will not only not be a logical consequence of what we have agreed to, but will run counter to the principle on which we have acted, and by agreeing to which we shall stultify all that we have done. Further, it is a breach of Privilege which is not even said to be called for, as to which there is no assertion made that the country at large requires it. Indeed, the country at large appears to be profoundly ignorant as to the proposals of Her Majesty's Government. I have no doubt that the proposal has been inadvertently made by the Government. I cannot but think that they have no desire to infringe the privileges of your Lordships' House. I should be sorry indeed to treat this as a party question. The position and the jurisdiction of your Lordships' House may, out of doors, be a matter of party agitation; but inside this House I am unable to conceive a difference of opinion arising between us as to the propriety of our maintaining our just and clear privileges. I am unable to picture to myself a division in this House in which would appear on the one side those who would maintain the Privileges of your Lordships' House, and on the other those who would destroy them. I am equally unable to imagine Her Majesty's Government proposing to lead a party of that description. If they do, of this I am quite sure—that they will find few indeed to follow them. I have, my Lords, shown already that I was justified in calling attention to the subject, and that it would be too late to do so when the Bill came again before your Lordships' House. Then the question would be whether the Bill should or should not be laid aside. I own—speaking for myself—I should regret being obliged to come to the conclusion at which I should then be forced to arrive, and to see a Bill in which I recognize so much good lost for this Session. My Lords, in point of form, I wish to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they intend, and at what time, in the present Session, to lay before this House a complete scheme for regulating appeals in Scotland and Ireland analogous to the Appellate System for England contained in the Judicature Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, whatever else I may think of the nature of the important subject to which my noble and learned Friend has directed your attention, I can most sincerely say I regret that from any cause whatever the harmony which has prevailed in your Lordships' House with respect to this important Bill should have been disturbed. Whatever may happen, I shall at all events retain a grateful recollection of my noble and learned Friend's services in promoting the Bill in its earlier stages in your Lordships' House; nor, my Lords, shall I forget the candour and fairness with which this House generally met the proposals of this Bill and endeavoured to bring them to a successful issue; and I shall most deeply regret if for any cause it shall appear to your Lordships, in any contingency that may happen, to be your duty to take a different course. I feel therefore a great difficulty in replying to my noble and learned Friend who has, I think, placed your Lordships and the Government in a position of unprecedented embarrassment by the course he has taken tonight. My noble and learned Friend, in treating of this question, has, I think, —although he has endeavoured to avoid it—made himself fairly amenable to a charge of breach of Order. I do not profess to have had so much experience in your Lordships' House as he has had, but I have been told by some upon whose opinions I rely, that it is a breach of Order in your Lordships' House to refer to speeches delivered in this House in reference to a Bill promoted during the present Session. Whether that be so or not, it will not, I think, be denied that it is in the highest degree inconvenient to enter into a discussion here as to what has passed or may now be passing in the other House of Parliament. My noble and learned Friend has not, to my mind, given any satisfactory reason for taking the course he has adopted in that respect. My noble and learned Friend has said something as to the communication to your Lordships of the Votes and Proceedings of the other House of Parliament; but, my Lords, I am not aware of any Vote passed by the other House upon the subject to which my noble and learned Friend has referred, and I infer, therefore, that my noble and learned Friend alluded to a Notice which may have been placed upon the Papers which by courtesy have been communicated to us by the other House. But, my Lords, I think you will be of opinion that Notices placed for discussion upon the Paper of the other House of Parliament cannot and ought not to be made the subject of discussion in your Lordships' House. It would involve the risk of very serious inconvenience in the way of mutual comment and criticism in each House as to what is going on in the other; and, I venture to think, would greatly increase the difficulty of dealing with any question subject to such treatment. But my noble and learned Friend has not only favoured us with observations on what has appeared on the Votes of the other House, but with what, I presume, were remarks upon observations supposed to have been made in the other House of Parliament. My Lords, to do justice to a subject of this kind its whole history ought to be before us, with all the considerations which may have suggested the taking of a certain course in "another place." But I must decline to follow what would otherwise be my wish—namely, to go fully into that which may have occurred elsewhere. I will endeavour as best I can to answer my noble and learned Friend without transgressing the rules of Order to which I have before referred. Whether my noble and learned Friend was in Order in quoting them or not, nothing could be more accurate than the extracts he read from the observations I made in introducing the Bill and on its second reading in reference to Scotch and Irish Appeals. I have no desire whatever to recede in any way from anything I then said. I stated that on principle I was in favour of bringing all appeals, whether from Scotland or from Ireland, to one Final Court, but that, though I anticipated that ultimately the opinion of Scotland and Ireland would tend that way, I did not yet see signs of such a state of opinion as would justify me in then making that proposal. My noble and learned Friend says that since the Bill left your Lordships' House the Government have made certain proposals. How can I explain the position of that matter without going into an account of what has passed, or may be passing, in "another place?" All I can say is, that the Government did not originate any such proposals. They originated elsewhere; and the Government did not acquiesce in them until they were in possession of certain grounds — what they thought sufficient grounds—for believing that Irish and Scotch opinion desired them, and that the representatives of those opinions were, indeed, prepared, with the aid and concurrence of the party to which my noble and learned Friend belongs, to force those proposals on the Government. That is what I am authorized to state, and what I do state with perfect confidence. I will abstain from going further into what passed within the walls of Parliament, but I am at liberty to state what has occurred outside the walls of Parliament. My noble and learned Friend has referred to a public demonstration of opinion which has occurred in Ireland—first, on the part of the Bar, and, next, on the part of a considerable number of the Judges. I cannot but think that it was a somewhat rhetorical artifice of my noble and learned Friend to comment with much humour and effect upon some of the suggestions of the Irish Bar, which were not of a very practical character. Adopting the principle that there should be one Court of Appeal for the whole country—and not only one Court in the abstract, but the particular Court proposed by the Bill with some additional members—they recommended that that Court should occasionally sit in Dublin. It did not appear to the Government, in estimating the weight of that expression of opinion, that that particular incident or episode was at all of the essence of the matter. Substantially the opinion expressed was, that they apprehended that the efficiency of this House as a Court of Ultimate Appeal would not be permanently as great as heretofore if the stronger elements were withdrawn from it to the great Court of Appeal in England, and that under the circumstances which would be created by the passing of this Bill, they desired that appeals from Ireland should be brought to the same Court. This opinion on the part of the Bar of Ireland, spontaneously expressed, and backed by the opinion of the Judges, and, further, not involving—at all events, as the Government understood—any unreasonable or impossible condition, did go a long way to satisfy one of the conditions necessary to be satisfied before the Bill could be extended to Irish appeals—namely, that if it were done it should be done rather at the request of opinion in Ireland, than forced upon that country by a proposal of the English Government. With regard to Scotland, information reached the Government, in a manner which the Government are accustomed to consider authentic—and I may mention that it related to matters outside the walls of Parliament, in order that I may be consistent in referring to it—that that proposal was desired by those who were naturally looked to as representing opinion in Scotland. I believe that not less than 32 gentlemen in that position met together, without any selection of persons, and were unanimously of opinion in favour of this proposal. I am further informed that since that time—indeed, as recently as Thursday last—a meeting of the Faculty of Advocates was held in Edinburgh, when the same proposition was carried, and that by so large a majority that the minority were not willing to have their numbers ascertained by anything like a division. The practical result is that there has been every indication of a unanimous expression of opinion in favour of the proposal from all who have spoken for Ireland and Scotland, after the very considerable lapse of time which occurred since the Bill was introduced, and after the large opportunities which have been afforded for its consideration, and without the least hint from the Government that their inclination was that way. In the absence, indeed, of any such inclination whatever, these expressions of opinion, apparently without a dissentient voice, were pressed upon them. My noble and learned Friend has only done justice to the Government in saying that if there had been any infringement or any neglect of any Privilege of their Lordships' House, it had been entirely by inadvertence. No question of any breach of Privilege ever occurred to any Member of the Government, nor, as far as I know, to anybody either in your Lordships' House or in the House of Commons. I must state that if my noble and learned Friend had intended to present the question of Privilege in such a very serious aspect, and if such very important consequences might follow from it, it is to be regretted that it did not appear on the face of the Notice; so that we on our part might have been able to look into the matter and see whether the precedents of Parliament to which he referred were altogether such as he supposes. If the matter be such as my noble and learned Friend has represented, it ought to receive, and it will receive, the serious and deliberate consideration of the Government; but we have not been placed in a situation to search for precedents in answer to what has been urged by my noble and learned Friend. But of this I am perfectly sure—that when there has been no intention to invade your Lordships' privileges, your Lordships will not be obliged in their defence to adopt any such extreme course as that which my noble and learned Friend suggested with regard to the Bill when it might be returned to your Lordships' House. It will always be in your Lordships' power to exercise the discretion now frequently exercised by the other House of Parliament when money clauses have inadvertently crept into Bills which have originated in your Lordships' House. The modern practice in cases of breach of privilege has been this:—Each House, when in a clear case its Privileges have been intentionally invaded, will of course have to discharge the duty of maintaining those Privileges; but when they have been invaded unintentionally, and when there is no reason to imagine that any disrespect has been intended, each House, regarding the public interests as well as its own dignity, has indeed always objected to those matters which have been introduced into a Bill, which it deemed to touch its Privileges, but has never thought itself under the necessity of depriving the public of the benefit of a measure otherwise salutary and unobjectionable, on the ground that this is the only proper way of marking its sense of a proposal inconsistent with its Privileges. When Blackstone went the length of saying that not only no Bill affecting the Privileges or the powers of the House of Lords could be introduced in the other, but that not even changes or Amendments could be made in a Bill of that kind by the House of Commons, he went beyond what is justified and warranted by the practice of modern times. I venture to say, with great deference to my noble and learned Friend, that the doctrine that no Bill affecting the Privileges or powers of your Lordships' House should be introduced in the other House would be very inconvenient; and that it would also be very inconvenient if your Lordships were not allowed to introduce an amendment into any Bill, whereby the Privileges of the Commons might be affected. Your Lordships know that a very highly important Bill, affecting the representation of the people, having come from the House of Commons, was altered materially in your Lordships' House. It will require much greater authority than my noble and learned Friend has adduced to induce me to believe that a different rule would be applicable on the part of the House of Commons in the case of Bills originated in your Lordships' House—and this Bill was originated in your Lordships' House. It never entered my mind for a single moment that when the time came for Ireland and Scotland bringing appeals to the same High Court of Appeal as England, Ireland and Scotland should lose the benefit of their local Courts of Appeal. I do not think your Lordships will deem it your duty to take a course which would destroy the Bill. As to the course which has been adopted by the other House with reference to this Bill, I do not think it is inconsistent with the Privileges of your Lordships' House.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I shall not venture to join issue with the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack on a question of law; but the noble and learned Lord appears to think that if Scotch and Irish Judges are added to the Court of Final Appeal to be created by this Bill, there will be an end of all objection to the change made in the other House in the Bill which is complained of by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns). But, in my judgment, such a course will by no means solve the difficulty, because in that case either the Court must be divided into nationalities, or else we shall have Irish and Scotch Judges sitting to hear English appeals, which will certainly be an absurdity. With reference to the constitutional aspect of the case, charges have been made against the present course of the Government. First, that they are invading the Act of Union; and secondly, that they are committing a breach of the Privileges of this House. There can be no doubt that the Act of Union may be repealed or altered by Act of Parliament; but such an Act could only be passed after the people of the country interested had been consulted on the subject. And what are the noble and learned Lord's views as to the proper method of ascertaining the wishes of the people of Scotland and Ireland on this question. Why, a meeting of lawyers is held at Dublin, another in Edinburgh, and a third in a dining-room in London; and the opinion expressed at those meetings is held to be that of the people of Scotland and of Ireland. The noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) appears to be under the impression that the law is the property of the lawyers, and that no one else should be allowed to say a word in the matter. But, in my opinion, something more than the opinion of a few lawyers is necessary before you can proceed to repeal the solemn Act of Union. There are many means of ascertaining the opinion of the people on this subject. It can be arrived at by means of an inquiry conducted by either a Royal Commission or by Committees of the Houses of Parliament, or else in an informal manner by leaving the subject over for discussion by the people during the Recess. But the Government are going to proceed without any inquiry whatever. Why, if you were going to alter a sewer in Edinburgh under the Local Government Act, you would take more care to ascertain the feelings of the people on the subject than you do when you are going to alter the Act of Union. If you were going to alter the Edinburgh sewer, you would send down a Commissioner, who would hold a Court, would hear both sides, and would invite an expression of opinion generally; but in the present case nothing of the kind has been done in order to ascertain the sentiments of those who will be affected by the measure. This is not the way to deal with a sensitive, and perhaps I may say an irritable, people like the Irish; because, however quiet they may be now when they do not thoroughly understand the point at issue, the time may arrive when the real nature of the change will come home to them, and great dissatisfaction on their part may be the result. Under these circumstances, therefore, it behoves us not to attempt to deal with this subject rashly and without due and careful consideration. In dealing with the question of Privilege, the noble and learned Lord showed considerable skill. The question of Privilege is one of real importance. The privileges of this House extend to matters which concern our own constitution, and it would be rather hard if, while we are debarred from originating or altering Money Bills, and from originating measures dealing with the constitution of the other House, we should be debarred from determining in what manner our own constitution should be changed. I defy the noble and learned Lord to point out one case in which the House of Commons has passed over a breach of its Privileges. This very year the House of Commons ordered a Bill to be laid aside on account of a breach of its Privileges. If we once pass over a breach of Privilege the privilege is gone for ever, because it is a mere matter of usage and precedent, and once it is neglected it disappears altogether. I only ask this House to be as particular with respect to its Privilege as the House of Commons is with regard to its own—and we know that the business of this country is completely blocked because of the pertinacious assertion by the House of Commons of its Privileges, which prevent this House from commencing a considerable number of measures of importance. Should the House of Commons after this notice persist in sending up the Bill, with the clauses relating to the Appellate Jurisdiction of Scotland and Ireland in it, we shall have no alternative left us but either to renounce our Privilege or to assert it. It was a great wrench to some of us to pass this Bill, because it takes away a certain portion of our jurisdiction; but because we thought that it contained much that would be of advantage to the country, and because the legal and general opinion of the country was in its favour, we considered it would not be right to reject it; and I appeal to the testimony of noble Lords opposite to show that no party feeling has prevented us from giving it our heartiest support. We have been asked whether we think it right that all the labour that has been bestowed on this Bill should be thrown away. We have no choice in the matter. The fact that the Bill originated in this House, and that the House of Commons have merely inserted clauses in it, makes no difference in the breach of Privilege which has been committed. The House of Commons does not allow us to introduce clauses into a Money Bill; and should we attempt to introduce clauses into such a Bill the House of Commons would reject it. Under these circumstances, unless we are willing to sacrifice our privilege altogether, if the House of Commons sends up this Bill containing these clauses we shall be compelled to reject it. The result will be that a great reform, much desired by the people of this country, will be postponed, and if the Bill is lost it will be lost not through our act, but through the fault of the House of Commons.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The noble Marquess is in error in assuming that were we to introduce money clauses into a Bill, not exclusively a Money Bill, the House of Commons would reject the entire Bill. They would probably reject the clauses, but not the whole Bill.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL agreed that the Act of Union was an instrument that ought to be treated with the greatest respect, though the truth was it had ceased to have much application. The clause in the Act of Union which related to the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords was applicable to a totally different state of circumstances from the present. It applied to a state of things under which appeals were supposed to be heard by the House of Lords sitting as a House, and not as a kind of Superior Court; whereas, when exercising their appellate jurisdiction, the House now sat as a mere Westminster Hall Court. He thought, he might add, the Members of the Government had some cause to complain that no Notice had been given by the noble and learned Lord that he intended to raise the question of Privilege—it was quite a new idea that had not occurred to any Member of the Government—and they had consequently been deprived of the opportunity of looking into the question, or even of providing themselves with a single book of reference. It was, in fact, a question resting on the opinion of the noble and learned Lord whether there had been a breach of Privilege or not. The matter, however, would be carefully inquired into, and assuredly their Lordships' privileges would be upheld.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND pointed out that, so far as the House was in possession of the views of the Scotch people on the subject, they were in favour of maintaining the jurisdiction of the House of Lords over their appeals—so that if it were true that the House of Lords sitting on appeals were a mere Westminster Hall Court, that was the Court the Scotch people preferred. As to the complaint that his noble and learned Friend near him had not given sufficient Notice of the questions which he might raise in the course of his speech, he would merely remark that it was not usual to place an analysis of the intended speech on the Notice Paper; and in the present instance his noble and learned Friend's Notice was intended merely as a warning, and no immediate action was to be taken at the close of the discussion. He hoped that warning would not be lost on the Government, for he was sincerely anxious that the Judicature Bill should become law; for he had always been of opinion that it was not very creditable to the House that the attempts which year after year had been made to deal with the question should have turned out failures. He trusted, therefore, the Government would find the means of preventing the recurrence of any such failure, without, at the same time, seeking to commit a breach of the Privileges of the House, and that the Bill would be speedily passed into law.

THE LORD CAIRNS defended himself against the charge of not having given sufficient Notice as to the course which he meant to pursue. It was impossible for him to have entered more into detail in giving Notice, than that it was his intention to comment on the changes which had been made in the Bill elsewhere.

THE EARL GRANVILLE thought it would have been much more convenient if the noble and learned Lord had given some indication that he intended to raise the question of Privilege. Such a course would, in his opinion, have tended more to the edification of the House and the public.

GAS AND WATER WORKS FACILITIES ACT, 1870, AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to extend and amend the provisions of the Gas and Water Works Facilities Act, 1870—Was presented by The Earl Cowper; read 1st. (No. 201.)

House adjourned at half past Eight o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,
Tuesday, 8th July, 1873.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE — Report — Noxious Businesses [No. 284]; Game Laws [No. 285].
 PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Local Government Board (Ireland) Provisional Order Confirmation (No. 2) * [229].
 Committee—Supreme Court of Judicature [154] —R.P.; Military Manoeuvres * [215]—R.P.; Public Health [113]—R.P.
 Considered as amended—Militia (Service, &c.) * [216]; Tramways Provisional Orders Confirmation * [218].
 Third Reading—Highland Schools (Scotland) * [202].
 Withdrawn—Habitual Drunkards [11].

The House met at Two of the clock.

INDIA—THE FOREST DEPARTMENT—COMPETITIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. RAIKES asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is the fact that the offer of five or more posts in the service of the Forest Department in India for public competition in November next, which was contained in the prospectuses issued in July 1872 and March 1873, has been cancelled since the terms were publicly announced, and the number of such posts reduced to two; whether it is not the fact that, after the next appointments are made, the maximum of age in candidates competing for such posts is to be reduced from twenty-three to twenty-two years; whether the Secretary of State for India has considered the great hardship inflicted on those who have devoted some months to qualify themselves for an examination from which they will probably be excluded; and, whether he will not take steps to remedy the injury thus inflicted on young men desirous of entering the public service by reverting to the offer of a number of posts, not less than four and perhaps six, contained in the prospectus of March last?

MR. GRANT DUFF: In answer, Sir, to the hon. Gentleman's first Question, I have to say that it would appear that some of the prospectuses alluded to, but only a few, were issued without the lines specifying the number of appointments having been struck out. In reply to his second Question, I have to answer "Yes;" and to add that, eventually, the maximum age will be reduced to 20.

In reply to his third Question, I have to say that I do not see that there is any hardship, notice having been given so long beforehand, and every candidate having been warned in the published paper of particulars that the regulations were liable to alteration in future years. In reply to his fourth Question, I have to say that the Government of India has informed us that only two Forest officers for 1873 are wanted, and I am sure the hon. Gentleman will agree that it would be quite outrageous deliberately to create two or four useless appointments merely for the convenience of young men. It ought to be remembered that this Forest service is quite a new service, and that, till we have more experience of its working, changes with regard to the age and qualifications of candidates are, I fear, inevitable.

THE TICHBORNE CASE—
 THE QUEEN v. CASTRO.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the Tichborne prosecution, Whether he has taken any steps with a view to detect and punish the author of the letters which, in the course of the pending trial, have been recognized by the Court as forgeries; and, whether it is the fact that witnesses have been brought to London to identify the defendant as not being Roger Tichborne, and that on such witnesses declining to give evidence to that effect, they have been sent away and their expenses paid? The hon. Gentleman added that so far as the question contained a statement of fact, that statement was made upon the very best information that the case admitted of, and he believed it to be true.

MR. BRUCE: I trust, Sir, that my hon. Friend will acquit me of any intentional disrespect to him when I say that I decline answering his Questions. I do not presume to scrutinize the intention of my hon. Friend in asking these Questions; but their effect is obviously to throw doubt and suspicion on the manner in which this prosecution is conducted, and so to influence the pending trial, and I altogether decline to contribute to any such result.

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the First Commissioner of Works, with reference to the Ordnance Survey. To state the reasons why the progress of this work is stopped at the borders of Montgomeryshire and the staff transferred to Staffordshire; and, what are the claims of Staffordshire to precedence under the circumstances?

Mr. AYRTON, in reply, said, he had more than once explained to the House that this Survey was being conducted upon certain principles which were easily understood—namely, that it should first be completed in those parts of the country where industry was most active and where there was the greatest necessity for it. This was the reason why Staffordshire was preferred to Montgomeryshire, Staffordshire being a mining district, where it was of importance that the Survey should be soon finished?

PARLIAMENT—QUESTIONS—RULES OF THE HOUSE.
THE WAR DEPARTMENT BUILDINGS.
QUESTION.

Mr. BAILLIE COCHRANE: I beg, Sir, to ask your opinion upon a question of Order. I placed a Notice of a Question upon the Paper which I find has been so altered by the Clerk as to remove all meaning and justification of the interrogation I desire to put. As it is printed, the Question stands thus—To ask the Secretary of State for War, If it is in contemplation to purchase additional accommodation for the War Department in Pall Mall, or if it is intended to erect a suitable edifice for the concentration of the War Department? Now, as I wrote out the Question, I distinctly stated that I wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government to perpetuate a state of things, in the shape of office accommodation, which the War Secretary himself had acknowledged to be most inconvenient. I wish, Sir, to know whether it is in accordance with precedent that Notices of Questions should be thus altered?

Mr. SPEAKER: One of the established Rules of the House with reference to Questions is that no argumentative matter should be introduced; and, if such matter appears, it is always by my authority struck out of the Question. It is on this ground, and on this ground only, that the Question of the hon. Member has been altered.

Mr. BAILLIE COCHRANE: In that case, Sir, I beg to put the Question in the shape in which it appears on the Notice Paper.

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, in reply, said, that a Bill providing for the erection of buildings suitable for the concentration of the various branches of the War Office was introduced early this Session, but that it had not been proceeded with. It was still the intention of the Government to erect such a building as that specified in the Bill; but in the meantime, any additional accommodation which might be required would be obtained by hiring, and it was not intended to purchase any additional accommodation in Pall Mall.

PARLIAMENT—RULES AND ORDERS OF THE HOUSE.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT,
1871.—QUESTION.

Mr. MONCKTON wished to put a Question to the Speaker on a point of Order. The hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Auberon Herbert) had a Notice on the Paper for that night to call attention to the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1871, and to move a Resolution declaring the desirability of repealing that Act. But there was a Bill upon the same subject put down for a second reading to-morrow, and, that being so, he wished to ask if the Motion of the hon. Member for Nottingham was in conformity with the Rules of the House?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Nottingham has given a Notice of Motion for this evening in the following terms:—

“To call attention to the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1871, and to move, That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable to repeal this Act.”

There is now before this House a Bill to repeal the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1871, which the House has ordered to be taken into consideration on the second reading to-morrow. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the hon. Member for Nottingham will be out of Order in moving his Resolution this evening, seeing that the matter is already before the House.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE
BILL—(Lords.)—[BILL 154].
(Mr. Attorney General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 7th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

PART III.

Sittings and Distribution of Business.

Clause 31 (Assignment of certain business to particular Divisions of High Court subject to Rules).

Amendment proposed, in page 20, line 34, to leave out the words “and the London Court of Bankruptcy respectively.”—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he found by consultation with the highest authority that by withdrawing the Amendment — should the Committee assent to it—the clause might be postponed. He was willing, with the assent of hon. Gentleman, that that course should be adopted.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause postponed.

Clause 32 (Option for any Plaintiff (subject to Rules) to choose in what Division he will sue) agreed to.

Clause 33 (Power of transfer) agreed to.

Clause 34 (Sittings in London and Middlesex and on Circuits) agreed to.

Clause 35 (Rota of Judges for election petitions) agreed to.

Clause 36 (Powers of one or more Judges not constituting a Divisional Court).

MR. VERNON HARCOURT moved, at end of clause, to add—

“And within twelve months after the passing of this Act rules of court shall be made defining what proceeding, causes, or matters shall be deemed proper to be heard by a single judge.”

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL agreed in the spirit of the proposal; but he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed, as it was quite intended such rules should be made.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 37 (Divisional Courts of the High Court of Justice) agreed to.

Clause 38 (Divisional Courts for business of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer Divisions) agreed to.

Clause 39 (Distribution of business among the Judges of the Chancery and Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Divisions of the High Court).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL moved in page 24, line 35, to leave out “the London Court of Bankruptcy.”

Amendment agreed to.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, this clause raised precisely the same question as had been raised last night. He asked that it be postponed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL explained that it did not raise precisely the same question.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 40 (Divisional Courts for business of the Chancery Division) agreed to.

Clause 41 (Divisional Courts for business belonging to the Division) agreed to.

Clause 42 (Appeals from Inferior Courts to be determined by Divisional Courts).

MR. HENLEY expressed a doubt whether “cases” sent up from Quarter Sessions would come under the term “appeals” provided for in this clause.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, both “cases” and “appeals” would come under the 13th section.

MR. STAVELEY HILL regretted that provision had not been made in the clause for cheap and easy appeals from the County Courts. An appeal might be provided to the Court of Assize.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS thought that such an appeal would be very inconvenient, as the Judges of Assize had already plenty to do.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT joined in the regret expressed by the hon. and learned Member (Mr. S. Hill.) It was quite clear that the present Bill must be followed by another measure localizing jurisdiction and improving the local administration of justice.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 43 (Cases and points may be reserved for or directed to be argued before Divisional Courts) agreed to.

Clause 44 (Provision for Crown Cases reserved).

MR. VERNON HAROURT moved, in page 26, at end to add, as fresh paragraphs—

"Where a petition is presented to a principal Secretary of State praying for a remission, commutation, or alteration of a sentence passed upon a person upon conviction for any treason felony or misdemeanor, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty, if Her Majesty in Her discretion think fit, with the advice of a principal Secretary of State, to refer the matter of the petition to Her Majesty's Court of Appeal for their consideration and advice in the matter of the petition.

"The Court to whom a petition or the case of any person is referred as aforesaid may in their discretion and with the consent of such person direct a new trial, either upon the same or upon a different indictment or information, and either for the same or for a different offence of which the person appears to the court to have been guilty, in such manner and upon such conditions (if any) as they think fit, and may order the person to be detained in custody pending such new trial or to be discharged upon such terms as to bail or otherwise as they think fit; and any new trial so ordered may be had in all respects as if the person had not been convicted upon the former trial, and no plea of autrefois convict shall be allowed in respect of his conviction upon such former trial.

"Subject to any rules of court, petitions referred to the court under the provisions of this section shall be considered in such manner as the court may from time to time determine, either with or without hearing witnesses or arguments, and either in open court or otherwise."

The hon. and learned Gentleman said, this Bill had dealt largely and he hoped efficiently with civil procedure; but it was remarkable that the Bill left our criminal procedure very much where it was. In questions of law affecting criminal trials it did not meet the justice of the case. Cases were constantly occurring of capital offences and sentences in which the public mind was so dissatisfied with the judgment given by the Judge and jury that in the absence of anything like a regular jurisdiction of appeal a most irregular appellate jurisdiction was created in the Home Secretary. Nobody was satisfied with the manner in which that appellate jurisdiction had arisen. A man was tried for his life and condemned to death. A Petition was sent to the Home Secretary, who had to review the sentence, not on any miscarriage of law, but on some allegation either that the facts at the trial were not accurately decided upon, or that the sentence was extreme. The Home Secretary had cast on him a most responsible and painful duty which he had very little means of adequately discharging. He had to receive the statements of parties and come to a decision, which, in many cases, reversed the sentence of a responsible Judge and jury on what, after all, must be unsworn and only ex parte evidence. He had been strongly impressed with the mischief of this state of things by what had occurred in the case of Smethurst, which came under the consideration of his right hon. Friend the late Sir George Lewis. It was a case which depended on medical testimony, and the Judge and jury had come to the conclusion that the man was guilty, and he was sentenced to death. That sentence, however, was reversed on medical testimony tendered to the Home Secretary by other doctors of perhaps equal eminence, but whose evidence was unsworn. He did not propose to interfere in any way with the Prerogative of mercy; but in many cases where the Prerogative of the Crown was concerned, the Crown did not desire to be inops consilii. A great part of the jurisdiction of the Privy Council rested on the prerogative of advice from the Judicial Committee; and it was quite possible, without departing from the doctrine of Prerogative, for the Crown to obtain responsible advice in a manner more satisfactory than that of seeking it from the Executive Government. What he proposed was that Her Majesty might, at her discretion—it was not to be compulsory—refer the Petition of a person convicted of treason or felony to the Court of Appeal for consideration and advice. He believed that this course would relieve the Home Secretary from a painful responsibility by handing over to persons conversant with questions of this character the authority to recommend to the Crown the exercise of the Prerogative of mercy. His object was, not to limit the Prerogative of the Crown, but merely to secure that it should have competent advice. He knew that some of the most eminent of the Judges were favourable to a change of this character. For the present, he would be satisfied with an assurance that the matter would be considered between this time and the Report on the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by formally moving the first paragraph of his Amendment to carry out his views.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the question was a most important one—indeed, one of the most serious that could be raised; but it was not germane, and ought not to be raised at this stage of the Bill. He would give to it the attention which its importance called for. As his hon. and learned Friend had mentioned Sir George Lewis, he would recommend him to read a speech by that distinguished man, made when he was Home Secretary, which was an exhaustive argument against the principle of the Amendment. He hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not at present press the matter further on the attention of the Committee.

DR. BALL called attention to the State trials of O'Connell, Smith O'Brien, and Mills, and to the procedure in cases of the writ of error, as sued out in Ireland. In that country the initiative in State prosecutions was taken by the Attorney General; and he (Dr. Ball) was desirous to know whether, under this Supreme Court of Judicature Bill, the practice with regard to the writ of error in Ireland would continue as at present?

MR. STAVELEY HILL considered the question, relating as it did to cases of criminal appeal, was a most important one, and thought that a clear explanation ought to be given to the question put to the Attorney General on the subject by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley). He was prepared to vote for the Amendment if his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) went to a division.

MR. BRISTOWE was of opinion that in Crown Cases Reserved the questions in issue might be brought under the consideration of, and adjudicated upon by a smaller number of Judges than under the existing system was required to constitute the Tribunal of Appeal.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he could not agree with the Attorney General that this question was not germane to the case now under consideration. With regard to the question put by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), in reference to cases of criminal appeal, he considered it a most serious one, and hoped it would receive all the attention due to it.

MR. BUTT referred to the state of the law governing questions of appeal in cases of conspiracy, felony, and misdemeanour prior to Lord Campbell's Bill, and said, looking at the clause in the present Supreme Court of Judicature Bill, it was identical in its provisions and objects with Lord Campbell's Bill, which was a great improvement in the law on the question of appeal.

DR. BALL considered the case a most important one, and suggested that a clause might be introduced on the Report to amend the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL again intimated that the matter should receive consideration.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, that, although he would not press the Amendment, he would take the opinion of the House upon it on the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 45 (Motions for new trials to be heard by Divisional Courts).

MR. MATTHEWS called the attention of the Committee to the importance of the clause, and moved, in page 26, line 33, after "divisional court," to leave out to end of clause.

MR. GREGORY said, from the clause, as it now stood, there was no appeal whatever. In his opinion, the words "and no appeal shall lie from any judgment," &c., ought to be struck out.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would carefully consider the question raised.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 46 (What orders shall not be subject to appeal).

MR. LOPES said, the word "procedure" admitted of very wide interpretation, such as discovery, interrogatories, &c., and suggested that it should be struck out.

MR. MATTHEWS said, the word "practice" also admitted of wide and various interpretations, involving questions of costs, &c., and submitted that it, too, ought to be struck out.

DR. BALL said, he would be contented with the clause if it were confined to a Divisional Court.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said, that as the law now stood a plaintiff making affidavit might swear before a Judge in a private room that the defendant had no defence, and the Judge might issue execution and debar the defendant from adopting proceedings in his defence. If this clause passed with the words "practice" and "procedure" in it, there would be no appeal.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL intimated that the view taken of the clause was correct, and agreed to confine the application of the section to "costs" only.

Amendment accordingly made.

MR. WHALLEY moved that the word "costs" should also be struck out.

MR. LOPES observed that as the Committee had already left out the words "practice" and "procedure" the clause would become altogether useless were the hon. Member's Amendment agreed to.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 47 (As to discharging orders made in Chambers) agreed to.

Clause 48 (Provision for absence or vacancy in the office of a Judge).

MR. AMPHLETT moved, in page 27, line 13, leave out from "during" to "of any such judge," in line 16; in line 19, leave out "the judge so absent," and insert "any judge absent from illness or any other cause;" in same line, leave out "the" before "judge," at the end, and insert "any."

Amendments agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 49 (Power of a single Judge in Court of Appeal) agreed to.

Clause 50 (Divisional Courts of Court of Appeal).

MR. GREGORY moved, in page 27, line 32, after "either" leave out "by the whole Court or."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL protested against having to repeat all the arguments with which he had combated the Amendments on Clause 6. The Committee having passed Clause 6 had virtually passed this clause, which was its natural consequence.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said, the clause gave an intermediate appeal in cases of magnitude and difficulty, without giving an absolute right of appeal in frivolous cases for the purposes of delay or of defeating justice. If an absolute right of an intermediate appeal was given all the inconveniences of the present system would be reproduced.

MR. AMPHLETT complained that no answer had yet been given by the Law Officers of the Crown to the objections which had been urged as to the great evil that must arise from having several Final Courts of Appeal. What he should have liked to see established would be a Court of five of the first men that could be obtained as a Final Court of Appeal, and then to have an Intermediate Court of Appeal, consisting, say, of three Judges, with this restriction—that there should be no appeal from that Intermediate Court if it should agree with the Court below, at least in interlocutory matters. In the event of there not being an agreement with the Court below, the case in dispute might be heard by the full Court.

MR. VERNON HARROD denied that hon. Members by accepting the 6th clause were precluded from objecting to this one. On the contrary, he had agreed to Clause 6, with the avowed intention of raising the question of the judicial strength of the Court of Appeal on Clause 50. The proposal of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Amphlett) that a minimum of seven Judges should sit at the hearing of appeals might meet the difficulty, but then it would set up an Intermediate Court of Appeal, to which he objected. They had abolished the House of Lords, the Exchequer Chamber, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and they were now going to substitute for them a tribunal of three Puisane Judges. The thing was ridiculous. Under the clause, those three Judges, of whom they knew nothing, would have power to set aside a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, presided over by the Lord Chief Justice, and by such Judges as Mr. Justice Blackburn. It would be most unwise and rash to sanction any such thing. He would not allow of there being more than two Divisions in the Court, and he would make the attendance of five Judges the minimum.

MR. LOPES said, he was surprised to hear the Attorney General say that the Intermediate Court of Appeal had been conceded; because at an earlier stage of test articulate he should vote for the Amendment.

MR. C. E. LEWIS said, that under the clause as it stood, if an inheritance to a great estate in Ireland were in question, the decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench and the Exchequer Chamber in that country might be upset by three Judges in the Appellate Court of this country, or, indeed, by the decision of two out of three. Could such a state of things give satisfaction to the suitor? In the case of the Amendment proposed by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Amphlett), it was possible that the Court might sometimes be weak, but under the Bill the probability was that it would always be weak.

MR. WHITWELL opposed the Amendment, which he thought to imply not a very high compliment to the Judges and the hon. and learned Gentlemen he saw around him, all of whom would one day adorn the judicial Bench.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 161; Noes 129: Majority 32.

MR. PIM moved, in page 27, line 38, at end of clause to add—

"The court of appeal shall sit in Edinburgh for the hearing of appeals against the judgments or orders of any court in Scotland, and shall sit in Dublin for the hearing of appeals against the judgments or orders of any court in Ireland."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, this was a matter to be dealt with in the clauses relating to Scotland and Ireland, to be brought up on the Report, if the understanding to that effect could be carried out.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 51 (Judges not to sit on appeal from their own judgments) agreed to.

Clause 52 (Arrangements for business of Court of Appeal, and for hearing Appeals transferred from the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council).

SIR RICHARD BAGGALLAY moved in page 28, line 6, to leave out from the word "appeal" to the end of the clause. He objected to the clause, because it provided that a particular class of appeals should be heard in a particular Divisional Court, one of the two into which the Appeal Court would be practically divided, and that the time of that Court should be exclusively occupied with the hearing of those appeals. He also objected to the constitution of the Court.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was of importance that Indian and Colonial Appeals should come in form, not before the Court of Appeal, but, as heretofore, before the Queen in Council, whose judgment the decision of the Court would be. The clause gave to the Queen the power of taking the advice of the Court of Appeal, and of referring appeals to one Division of Judges, being Privy Councillors, who would sit throughout the year so far as was necessary, disposing of the business which the Judicial Committee now transacted. This was what might be called a political clause, and its object was to show respect to our great colonial dependencies, and take away none of the advantages which they now enjoyed with regard to appeals. As to ecclesiastical appeals, it had already been decided that they should be heard only by Judges, not by ecclesiastics, and this clause would provide that they should be heard by the same Judges who before heard them, excepting the Bishops.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he did not desire to see retired Indian Judges stereotyped into lay Archbishops. There was nothing peculiar in the climate of India to make men good ecclesiastical lawyers.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

PART IV.

Trial and Procedure.

Clause 53 (References and Assessors) agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

The House suspended its Sitting at ten minutes to Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its sitting at Nine of the clock.

INTERNATIONAL LAW—ARBITRATION.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. H. RICHARD, in rising to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to instruct Her Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to enter into communication with Foreign Powers with a view to further improvement in International Law and the establishment of a general and permanent system of International Arbitration."

Mr. W. Fowler

said: *Mr. Speaker, I venture to bespeak the kind indulgence of the House while I attempt to bring before its attention a subject which all, I think, will acknowledge to be one of great importance, and which no one feels more deeply than myself to be one of great difficulty. It is no affectation of modesty, but a very unaffected sense of my own incompetency, which prompts me to say that I cordially wish the treatment of this question had fallen into hands more qualified to do it justice than I can pretend to be. Twenty-four years ago the late Mr. Cobden submitted to this House a Motion in some respects similar to the one I am about to submit this evening. Would that he had been spared to us to bring forward the subject again with the authority of his great name and illustrious services, and under what I venture to believe are rather more favourable auspices than existed at the time to which I refer. My only title for dealing with this matter arises from the fact that I have spent some 25 of the best years of my life in humble endeavours to promote this cause—the cause of peace on earth and goodwill among men, if not with much success, at least, I hope, with entire sincerity. It is a great satisfaction to me to feel that the question is one which stands quite apart from—may I not say that is raised far above—all considerations and interests of party. It appeals to great principles of justice, humanity, and religion, in which all parties are equally interested, and to which all parties are equally prepared to do willing homage. Indeed, I am strongly encouraged by the consciousness that I am sustained on this occasion by a large amount of public opinion not only in this country, but in all countries of the civilized world. Since I gave Notice of my Motion, I have received many communications from excellent and distinguished persons on the continent of Europe and in America, expressing their warmest sympathy with the object of my Motion, and the earnest hope that it may find acceptance with the British Parliament. The Petitions that have been presented to this House indicate in some degree the interest excited out-of-doors in our own country in reference to my proposal. But numerous as those Petitions have been, I believe that they afford but an imperfect representation of the depth and extent of that feeling. Many—I think I may say most—of the large religious bodies in this country at their annual assemblies or conferences have passed resolutions or adopted Petitions to this House in support of the Motion. It gives me very sincere pleasure to add, that some of the most distinguished Prelates of the Church of England and many of its clergy, have declared with no less earnestness and emphasis, in favour of the general principle of arbitration. But above all, the working men have thrown themselves into the movement with an ardour and unanimity that are quite remarkable. At Trades Union Councils and Congresses, at conferences of different trades, and at all sorts of representative meetings of the working men that have been held in various parts of the kingdom for the last two years, this question has been brought forward, and resolutions in support of the movement have been carried with scarcely a dissentient voice. From a Paper that has been circulated among the Members, it appears that the number of working men who have petitioned for the proposition, either directly or through the representative bodies to which I have referred, amounts to upwards of 1,038,000 persons. And I feel bound to say that this agitation has been perfectly spontaneous on their part. It originated with themselves, it has been organized by themselves, and conducted by themselves, and conducted, I am happy to add, for I have had ample opportunity of watching its course, with a good sense and moderation, as well as an earnestness and energy very honourable to the working classes themselves, and full of encouragement and hope to those who are engaged in promoting this object. I must premise one other remark. It will not be necessary for me this evening to put forward any of what are called extreme peace views. It is the pleasure of some persons to describe the party with which I have the honour to be associated as the "peace-at-any-price party." I do not know exactly what that means. No doubt it is intended to mean something very bad and opprobrious. If what is charged against us be that we hate war too much and love peace too well, I must own that the accusation lies lightly enough on my conscience. But be that as it may, I need not on this occasion affront anyone's prejudices by maintaining or assuming anything, which all reasonable and humane men are not prepared frankly to admit. I presume all will admit that war is an infinite evil inflicting such manifold mischiefs, material and moral, upon mankind—and its moral mischiefs are in my opinion deeper and greater even than the material—that it is our duty to do everything we possibly can to avert its recurrence. Most of those who hear me will, I believe, also admit that the present state of things under which so-called civilized and Christian nations, when differences arise between them, and those often differences of very trivial import, are ready to plunge into wholesale and mutual slaughter and rapine, is deplorable and disgraceful, an affront to reason, an outrage on justice, a scandal to civilization, and especially a reproach to that religion of peace and charity and brotherly love which these nations profess to receive and reverence. Why is this? It is owing largely, I think, to the fact that no precautions are taken, no provisions made to meet those contingencies which occur, and must occur in the relations of States. Differences will arise between nations as between individuals, and they may arise, and I believe often do arise, without any unfair or unjust intentions on either side, from imperfect acquaintance with facts, from simple misunderstandings, from differences of opinion as to the nature and extent of international obligations, all no doubt somewhat aggravated by that obliquity of vision which affects us all, individuals or communities, where our own interests are concerned. But unhappily no means, no regular and recognized means exist, no stated tribunal to which such differences can be referred for an honourable and pacific settlement. The only acknowledged solvent of international disputes in the last resort is the sword. The consequence is that Governments are driven, or imagine themselves driven, to that fatal system of rivalry in armaments which, in my opinion, is at this moment the greatest curse and calamity of Europe. They argue thus—that if there are no other means but force by which nations can defend their rights or redress their wrongs, then each nation must provide itself with the largest possible amount of force, and when one Power adds to its armaments, all the others with headlong haste rush to a proportionate augmentation of theirs. This has at last culminated in the state of things which we now witness, under which it is calculated that there are, some say 4,000,000, some say 5,000,000 of men in the armies of Europe—men in the prime and vigour of life, for war will accept as its servants and victims only the picked men of society. The result is that the nations are weighed down by burdens of taxation that are so enormous as to be almost intolerable. It is not very easy to estimate what is the cost of these armaments. But a very respectable French writer, M. Larroque, who has written an able and elaborate work on The Standing Armaments of Europe, and has taken great pains to procure authentic data for his calculations, estimates the cost at £400,000,000 sterling. This sum he divides under three items. First, the naval and military budgets—the sums directly extracted from the pockets of the people for maintaining these armaments he estimates—and I believe considerably under-estimates—at £120,000,000. Then he takes the interest on capital invested in various military property, such as fortifications, barracks, ships of war, arms and munitions, capital wholly unproductive, and this item amounts to £30,000,000. The third, and the most important item, which is very apt to be overlooked, is the loss to society by the withdrawal of such a host of able-bodied men from all the occupations of productive industry—for a soldier produces nothing, only helps to consume the productions of other men—and M. Larroque estimates this at £250,000,000. If to this be added the interest, and the cost of management of the National Debts of Europe, nearly the whole of which has been contracted for war or warlike purposes, and which may be taken at £150,000,000, we have a grand total of £550,000,000 annually taken from the capital and industry of nations for the cost of past wars, and the preparations for future wars. And what is the condition of the people in the various countries from which this prodigious sum is annually extracted for war purposes? That they are a wonderfully ingenious, energetic, industrious population is proved by the fact that they are not absolutely crushed beneath these burdens laid upon them by their Governments. But it is rather a melancholy reflection that, admirable as are the enterprise, invention, skill, and laborious industry of the producing classes in Europe, they are deprived of so large a proportion of the fruits of their labours by the perpetual drain made upon them to sustain this armed rivalry kept up by their rulers. Let us picture to ourselves these toiling millions over the whole face of Europe, from the Rock of Gibraltar to the Oural Mountains, and from the Shetland Islands to the Caucasus, swarming forth day by day to their labour, working ceaselessly from early morn to dewy eve, in the cultivation of the soil, in the production of fabrics, in the exchange of commodities, in mines, factories, forges, docks, workshops, warehouses; on railways, rivers, lakes, oceans penetrating the bowels of the earth, subduing the stubbornness of brute matter, mastering the elements of nature, and making them subservient to human convenience and weal, and creating by all this a mass of wealth which might carry abundance and comfort to every one of their myriad homes. And then imagine the hand of power coming in and every year sweeping some five hundred millions of the money so laboriously earned, into the bottomless abyss of military expenditure. But there is something worse than even this pressure on the means of life, I mean compulsory military service. The House, of course, is aware that in every country in Europe but our own, the naval and military services are recruited, not by voluntary enlistment, but by the conscription. Now this is becoming a tyranny so terrible as almost to provoke an insurrection in some countries. Even in Germany, which has given the example—in my opinion, the evil example—of sweeping the whole male population into the Army, there is a strong reaction setting in against the system. Some months ago, I read this in one of our journals—

"The German Government continues to be much disquieted by the large dimensions of the emigration to America. It is stated that according to authentic advice from Berlin, the numbers are growing in such proportions that by the 1st of January the figures will be double what they were in the years preceding the late war. As usual, the bulk of the emigrants are young men anxious to avoid military service. It was in reference to this movement that the Circular from the War Minister, by the Emperor's order, was issued last July. As it has seemingly had no appreciable effect in checking the ever-widening stream, a second Circular, couched in more threatening terms than the first, has just been issued. At the same time, a special service is being instituted for the more effective surveillance and supervision of the districts from which the emigrants mainly come. But in spite of all this, the emigration to America has been only slightly affected."

And, indeed, those who profess to be acquainted with the feelings of the working classes on the Continent, assure us that there is a general and growing feeling of discontent among them on this subject, of which the Governments will do well to take account. They feel that in past times their lives have been used as mere pawns, with which Princes and Governments have been wont to play their own selfish games of ambition and intrigue. And there is an angry muttering among them that they will not submit to this much longer. But there is another view of this subject which those in authority ought to take to heart. In spite of the enormous sums I have described constantly extracted from the pockets of the people, the finances of many European States are in a normal condition of embarrassment and deficit. In Austria there has not been a year since 1789 in which revenue has come up to expenditure. The accumulated deficits of that State from 1851 to 1866 amounted to £130,000,000. France, even before the last terrible war, was sinking rapidly into debt; her debt increased from £213,000,000 in 1851 to £550,000,000 in 1870. The new kingdom of Italy is absolutely reeling and staggering beneath the burdens of her military expenditure. The annual deficit from 1861 to 1869 was £22,000,000. Spain, I need not say, is in a still worse financial condition. Turkey, we are told, was brought into the European family of nations by the Russian War, but the only privilege she has seemed to derive from that is the privilege of borrowing money and sinking into debt. From 1854 there has been a continued series of deficits at the rate of about £5,000,000 a-year, covered with loans in two years out of three. Even the condition of Russian finance is one of chronic deficit. The revenue has increased £14,000,000 in four years, and yet the deficit continues. Mr. Dudley Baxter, in his valuable work on National

Debts, has shown that the national indebtedness of the world has increased within 22 years to the prodigious amount of £2,218,000,000. Europe's part in this increase is £1,500,000,000. What is the cause of this alarming condition of things? The cause is mainly war and warlike armaments. Mr. Baxter has calculated that only 12 per cent, or one-eighth of the National Debts of the world have been raised for productive purposes; 88 per cent has been for war, warlike preparations, and other unproductive purposes. And what aggravates the absurdity is, that while all this is going on, the nations of the world are being constantly drawn into closer relation of mutual dependence and friendly intercourse. Railways and steamships, to employ the bold image of the Prime Minister, are like gigantic shuttles rushing to and fro over the earth and weaving the nations into one. Men of different races are being combined in common enterprises, not only of trade, but of art and science and philanthropy. Men will always seek some justification for their conduct, however absurd. They seek their justification on this matter in an old Latin proverb—Si vis pacem para bellum. Now, I venture to say that an axiom more absurd than this, more at variance with common sense, with all our experience of human nature, and with the testimony of history never was palmed on the credulity of mankind. You may just as well say, that if you wish to preserve your house from fire, the best thing you can do is to accumulate any amount of gunpowder and petroleum and lucifer matches in your cellars, and let a number of mischievous boys go to play at hide-and-seek among them; for these boys may well represent the Princes and diplomatists of Europe, who do play the strangest pranks in the midst of the inflammable materials they have heaped around them, and which yet they say are the only true security against a conflagration. Now, Sir, the state of things I have thus described seems to me utterly deplorable and humiliating in the heart of what calls itself Christendom in the 19th century. Every Government in Europe is spending beyond all comparison the largest proportion of its resources upon the art of destruction, while myriads of its subjects are sunk in pauperism, ignorance, and degradation. The people ask for bread, and the Government offer them bullets; they ask for a useful education, and they offer them the military drill; they ask for better dwellings, in which they may lead a decent domestic life, and they offer them barracks and fortifications. Science, which ought to be the hand-maid of civilization, has sold herself to the devil and exhausts her skill and invention in devising infernal machines of more and more destructive power, which have no other result than to exhaust the wealth of nations, since in two or three years they are superseded by other inventions still more infernal and destructive. And let the House observe that there is absolutely no limit to this process—that not only it may, but it must go on repeating itself at an accumulating ratio. I believe it is no exaggeration to say that the military expenditure of Europe has doubled within the last 30 years, and there is no reason in the world why it should not, but every reason according to the system now in vogue why it should, double itself again within the next 30 years; and so through every 30 years to the end of time. Now, is there no remedy for this? Cannot the human reason be brought to bear upon this monstrous system of mutual waste and ruin? Is the combined statesmanship of Europe equal to nothing better, as international policy, than playing on a more and more gigantic scale this miserable game of "beggar my neighbour," by which they exhaust their resources, embarrass their finances, and oppress their peoples, while they leave themselves at the end of the process comparatively and proportionally just where they were at the beginning? While spending so much of time, thought, skill, and money in organizing war, is it not worth while to bestow some forethought and care in trying to organize peace, by making some provision beforehand for solving by peaceable means those difficulties and complications that arise to disturb the relations of States, instead of leaving them to the excited passions and hazardous accidents of the moment? No doubt something has been done, and something very considerable has been done—which I gladly and gratefully recognize—in the way of settling disputes by arbitration, after those disputes have arisen. Quite enough has been done in this direction to prove that such a method is practicable, and that there is no necessity for mankind to cut each other's throats by way of trying to decide questions of disputed right. It is an entire mistake to imagine that the recent instances of arbitration between this country and the United States are the first and only, though no doubt they are the most significant and conspicuous, examples of the successful application of this principle. There have been many other cases within the last 50 or 60 years. Indeed, I am not sure, if using the word arbitration in its broadest and most generic sense as expressing every kind of reference for settling differences without having recourse to the sword, that within the period I have mentioned arbitration has not been the rule and war the exception. But there is this difference—that whereas war is loud, noisy, demonstrative, making itself seen and heard by the whole world, arbitration is often carried on in a quiet, unostentatious manner that escapes general observation. I will not trespass on the time and patience of the House by enumerating all the instances of that kind that have occurred. But I may be permitted to cite a few cases by way of illustration. There was the question known as the Portendic claims between England and France, arising out of the blockade of the Portendic coast by the French during their wars with the Moors in 1834-5. These claims, after occasioning considerable trouble to the two Governments, were referred to the arbitration of the King of Prussia, and his award was cheerfully accepted by both countries. In 1853, all outstanding claims that had arisen between Great Britain and the United States since the Treaty of Ghent in 1814, were referred to two Commissioners, who were empowered and instructed to choose an umpire or arbitrator when they could not agree. The claims connected with the brig Creole, which had been the subject of long diplomatic discussion, the claims of the Florida bonds, the M'Leod claims, and many others, were included in this reference. Mr. Joshua Bates, of London, was chosen as umpire, and all these claims, after careful consideration, were finally and satisfactorily adjusted. Questions of considerable difficulty between the United States and New Granada, and between the same Power and Costa Rica, as well as Paraguay and Peru, have at different times been settled by arbitration. In 1863, a dispute between this country and the Empire of Brazil, which had previously given occasion to a great deal of angry and irritating diplomatic correspondence, was referred to the arbitration of the King of the Belgians, and disposed of without difficulty. I will mention another case which may be considered as a crucial example of successful arbitration. In 1868-9, as hon. Members will recollect, the relations of Turkey and Greece became full of danger on account of the insurrection in Crete. There was everything in this case to exasperate animosities between the two parties—difference of race, difference of religion, terrible memories and sinister traditions of the past. But at the suggestion of Prussia there was a Conference of the Great Powers at Paris, who agreed to certain resolutions to be submitted to Greece for her acceptance. These, be it borne in mind, were offered merely as recommendations, and not backed up by any threats of force on the part of the mediating Powers; and yet in spite of the forebodings of the prophets of evil, who loudly prognosticated failure, the success was complete. Greece accepted the resolutions, and the danger passed away. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, speaking in the House in reference to that case, spoke of it most justly as "an evidence of real advance in civilization." I have the greatest pleasure in citing the words he used on that occasion—

"Here is a case where two Powers, exasperated by traditional animosities, and with their respective transactions entangled by various sympathies and antipathies of race, were on the point of resorting to the arbitration of force and bloodshed for the settlement of their differences—and where the employment of purely moral interference has been sufficient to avert that calamity. Now, I am quite certain that if there exists one sentiment more unequivocal than another on both sides of this House, and on every bench of it, and throughout the country, it is that, without resorting to arbitrary doctrines or pedantic rules, we may be enabled quietly and steadily to make progress towards establishing in Europe a state of feeling which shall favour and facilitate that common action among the Powers of Europe whereby, becoming the organ of legitimate and strong opinion, they may be able by this kind of influence alone to avert the great calamity of war."—[3 Hansard, cxciv. 76-77.]

Now this is precisely what I want the right hon. Gentleman to help in bringing about—namely, a common action of the Powers to avert the calamity of war.

Perhaps it may be said in reference to the cases of successful arbitration I have cited that they referred to comparatively small matters. My answer is, that they could not possibly refer to smaller matters than those which have often led to long, bloody, and desolating wars between nations. They were not smaller matters, for instance, than the question whether the cupola of a particular church at Jerusalem should be repaired by Greek or Latin monks, and yet that was the quarrel which, through the infinite un-wisdom of some of the Great Powers, led to a war which cost Europe, according to Mr. Kinglake, 1,000,000 of human lives and some four or five hundred millions of money. But, I may be told, in reference to this and similar cases, that the avowed and apparent causes of a war are often not the real ones, that they are mere superficial pretexts, but that there are occult forces at work which impel nations irresistibly into collision with each other. But all this talk is mere fatalism, the elaborate attempts of men to find some justification for their follies and crimes by referring them to the operation of natural or providential laws, instead of their own evil passions. Men love to believe that they are driven into ill-doing by necessity. This is the plea of justification which Milton represents the author of evil as putting forward to extenuate his own revolt—

“Who with necessity,
The tyrant's plea, excused his devilish deeds.”

I do not believe in necessity to do evil, to commit crime. It is a profane, an impious, an atheistic doctrine. And I can quote the authority of the most experienced statesman of his time as respects, at least, all recent wars. Lord Russell has said—

“On looking back at all the wars which have been carried on during the last century, and examining into the causes of them, I do not see one of these wars in which, if there had been proper temper between the parties, the questions in dispute might not have been settled without recourse to arms.”

But I must refer also, as an evidence of progress, and as an indication that even the Great Powers are beginning to recognize that there is some principle in the world besides force for regulating the intercourse of States, to what took place at the Conference of Paris in 1856. England had the honour of taking the initiative on that occasion, through the mouth of her Plenipotentiary, Lord Clarendon, who submitted a proposition to the Conference, which was accepted unanimously, and expressed in the following language:—

“The Plenipotentiaries do not hesitate to express, in the name of their Governments, the wish that States between which any serious misunderstanding may arise should, before appealing to arms, have recourse, as far as circumstances might allow, to the good offices of a friendly Power.”

The Conference instructed its President, Count Walewski, to communicate this declaration to other civilized Governments, and to invite their adhesion; and about 40 other Governments did adhere to it. The right hon. Gentleman the present Prime Minister, speaking in this House soon after, referred to that Protocol in these words—

“As to the proposal to submit international differences to arbitration, I think that it is in itself a great triumph. It is, perhaps, the first time that the assembled representatives of the principal nations of Europe have given an emphatic utterance to sentiments which contain at least a qualified disapproval of a resort to war, and asserted, at least in qualified terms, the supremacy of reason, of justice, of humanity, and religion.”—[3 Hansard, cxlii. 99.]

The late Lord Derby also referred to the principle of arbitration as

“The principle which, to its endless honour, was embodied in the Protocol of the Conference of Paris.”

Unhappily, it has hitherto remained inoperative. But in spite of that I still believe, with the right hon. Gentleman, that it was a great gain to have elicited from the leading Powers of Europe, and to have placed on permanent record such a declaration as that. This is the history of all human progress. Men labour long to get from those in authority the distinct recognition of some great principle. It may be long after that before it is reduced in practice. But the acknowledgment of its justice and importance remains, and may be pleaded against themselves. We have an illustration of this in the condemnation of the slave trade, pronounced at the Congress of Vienna, and repeated in a yet more rigorous form at the Congress of Verona in 1822, principally, I believe, through the influence of the Duke of Wellington. That condemnation did not lead to the immediate abolition of the slave trade; unhappily it is not yet abolished. Still that act of the Great Powers was of the greatest possible value to those who were, and are, engaged in a crusade against the slave trade. It placed the accursed traffic under the ban of the civilized world, and rendered it impossible for any Christian State again openly to defend it, though some of them have continued wickedly to connive at it. So I believe the Declaration of the Protocol of Paris, though not immediately operative, is not without great value. As has been recently said by a distinguished French statesman, M. Drouyn de Lhuys—

"In trying to realize the idea embodied in the Treaty of Paris, we obey a sentiment which, evoked at that epoch, will not cease to manifest itself among civilized nations until it has obtained satisfaction."

I come now to the Geneva Arbitration. I own that my views on that subject are as wide as the poles asunder from those expressed by some hon. Gentlemen in this House, a very small minority, I am happy to believe. I look upon that transaction as one eminently honourable to the spirit of our age, and especially to the two great nations principally concerned in it. And I have no doubt that in spite of the little irritations which have for a moment ruffled the temper of a few of our countrymen, that it will be regarded hereafter as constituting a landmark in the history of civilization. No doubt some mistakes were made in connection with this great work of international peace, and that is no wonder, considering that the proceeding was somewhat an untried and unwonted one. But are there no mistakes made in connection with international war?—unless, indeed, the right thing to say is that the whole of that bloody business is one huge and monstrous mistake. No doubt some portions of the Treaty of Washington might have been expressed in language less ambiguous and more precise. No doubt the Three Rules themselves were somewhat vague, though I question if there is any form of words which human ingenuity could devise upon which clever and practised lawyers could not put two or three different constructions if it suited their purpose to do so. No doubt the interpretation put upon those Rules by some of the distinguished men who acted as adjudicators at Geneva was of rather dangerous latitude. No doubt there were also still graver errors on both sides, which I forbear to refer to lest they revive feelings that had better be let sleep. But after all these deductions are made, the fact, the signal, the glorious fact remains that these two great kindred and Christian nations, each of them with abundance of pride and self-assertion, for John Bull and Jonathan are in that respect as like as two peas—each of them conscious of having almost inexhaustible resources at command wherewith to inflict injury upon each other—that these two nations, in regard to a question that had strongly excited public feeling on both sides of the Atlantic, and notably on the other side, were content to lay aside their prejudices and passions, and allow their case to be referred to the arbitration of reason and justice, instead of running the risk of having to refer it at any future time to the blind and brutal arbitrament of the sword. This fact remains, unaffected by the petty jealousies and passions of the hour, affording a grand and memorable example to the nations, which I have no doubt will be fruitful of beneficent results. The attitude of the two nations has been noble. During many months of irritating suspense while the two Governments were negotiating as to the true meaning of the Treaty of Washington, these 70,000,000 of people maintained their calmness and self-control. This, I believe, was in great part owing to the conduct of the Press. No doubt there were exceptions; but, as a rule, the Press on both sides did itself great honour by the way in which it conducted the controversy. I must especially pay my humble tribute of respect and admiration to what is called the leading journal in this country, for the calm, judicial spirit which it preserved throughout, and by which I have no doubt it contributed largely to the peaceable and satisfactory settlement of the matter. I remember the late Lord Derby some years ago when administering a severe rebuke to the Press for stimulating one of those dishonourable panics of French invasion, by which we have been so often affected in this country, making this remark—

"That journalists in these times exercised something like the influence and power of statesmen, and that therefore they ought to feel something of the responsibility of statesmen."

To my mind one of the most hopeful signs of the times is in the fact that the Press is evidently beginning to recognize this responsibility. For my part, I must say, in reference to this American Arbitration, that I feel more grateful than I can express to Her Majesty's

Government, and especially to Lord Granville, for the combined firmness, patience, temper, and tact with which he persevered, in the face of great difficulties and some provocations, in seeking to extricate the two countries from embarrassments, which at one time threatened to wreck the arbitration. And I feel no less grateful to the Leaders of the party opposite for their wise and patriotic forbearance during the whole of those difficult and delicate negotiations. I confess that when I saw the Notice of Motion placed on the Paper some weeks ago by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy), I had some apprehension lest in the discussion that would ensue, something might have been said to rekindle animosities happily allayed, or to discredit the principle of arbitration, or to bring into question the judgment at Geneva. But nothing of the sort took place. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman, which gave a tone to the debate, appeared to me as admirable in temper as it was in ability, and proved, as did that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), which followed in the same discussion, that they at least were determined not to convert this great international question into an arena for party strife. If they should ever come into office again—and I suppose that is a contingency that is on the cards, and have to deal with any difficult question of foreign policy, I hope the course they have taken on this question will not be forgotten by those who now sit on this side of the House. But some people say the judgment has gone against us. Well, I suppose judgment must go against somebody in every suit or trial at law. I hope the House will not misinterpret my meaning when I say that I am almost glad that it did go against us, because it afforded the people of this country a noble opportunity, which I believe they have nobly embraced, of showing their respect for law and their readiness to submit to a judicial decision even when it is against their own interests. By this dignified acquiescence in the judgment of Geneva—and I contend that the great bulk of the people of this country have so acquiesced—they have done more to consecrate the principle of arbitration than if the verdict had been ever so much in their favour. But we are sometimes told that only

England would have the sense of justice and dignity to submit to such a decision. Well, it is a very pleasant thing to have a high opinion of ourselves, and if it soothes our vanity and helps us the better to bear our defeat to think so, I have no objection. But I am bound to express my own belief that if the judgment had gone against the United States the great body of the people of that country would have done the same. Let me ask the attention of the House to the noble words uttered by Mr. Colfax, the Vice President of the United States, at the time when difficulties had arisen between the two Governments owing to conflicting interpretations of the Treaty of Washington, and before the tribunal had been opened at Geneva—

“ Though the arbitration were to adjudge to us not a single dollar, I will stand up before my fellow-citizens, and will cry to them, ‘Accept the resolution and renounce all indemnity rather than recede one hair’s-breadth from that high moral position in which you have placed yourselves along with England before the face of the other nations of the world.’ ”

All this is, no doubt, highly encouraging. But the disadvantages of leaving the arbitration to be provided for after the quarrel has arisen are obvious. The original difference often becomes greatly complicated and aggravated by angry diplomatic reciprocations, and the clamorous outcries of popular passions; whereas if there were some stated means of reference, these disturbing influences need not at all come into operation. And undoubtedly the mere existence of such stated means would prevent many quarrels from coming to a head. “ The great end of law,” it has been truly said, “ is not to decide, but to prevent disputes; for every dispute which British civil law, for instance, decides, there are thousands of cases in which disputes are prevented from arising by its certainty and clearness.” What is wanted is that the Great Powers of the world should take some steps towards the establishment of something like a regular and permanent system of international jurisdiction. That I may not be charged with indulging in mere chimerical visions beyond the range of practical statesmanship in saying this, let me cite the words of the present Lord Derby. Speaking in this House in the year 1867, apropos of the question with Spain about the ship Mermaid, he said—

“ Unhappily there is nothing in the nature of an international tribunal to which all cases of this kind might be referred, and there is no International Law by which parties can be required to submit such cases to arbitration. I do not hesitate to say that it would be one of the greatest benefits to the civilized world if such a tribunal existed."—[3 Hansard, clxxxviii. 1752.]

No statesman living is less likely than Lord Derby to indulge in longings after what is impracticable and Utopian. And yet such are his views as to the importance and value of an International Court. It is well known that such a Supreme Court does exist in the United States to adjudicate between different States of the Union and between States and the Federal Government. A great man who has recently passed from among us, Mr. John Stuart Mill, referring to that institution says—

"The Supreme Court of the Federation dispenses International Law, and is the first example of what is now one of the most prominent wants of civilized society—a real international tribunal."

I do not say that the world is ripe for such an institution in its completeness at the present moment. But surely we may take some steps in that direction. I ask the Government to communicate with the other Powers with a view to the appointment of an International Commission to examine into the present state of International Law, and to reduce it into something like a clear and coherent system. This is a great necessity of civilization. Perhaps, indeed, if we use the word law in its rigid sense, we may say that there hardly exists such a thing at present as International Law. What passes under that name consists of custom and consent, provisions in Treaties between nations, judgments of Prize Courts, and the opinions of eminent jurists from Grotius downwards. I am very far from saying that even in its present imperfect form all this has not been of the greatest possible service in regulating the relations and intercourse of States, in diminishing the frequency and mitigating the ferocity of war. And it is impossible not to admire the noble enthusiasm of humanity by which Grotius was inspired in the composition of his great work—a work, as Mr. Hallam says, the publication of which is acknowledged to have made an epoch in the philosophical and almost in the political history of Europe. Still what now exists can hardly be called law in the strict sense of that term, seeing there is no enacting authority to give it force, and no recognized tribunal by which it can be administered. At any rate, it will not be doubted that the present state of International Law is far from satisfactory; that there are many important points connected with the relations and intercourse of States, which are unsettled, ill-defined, or unprovided for; and that the whole system of International Law requires to be revised and digested and brought into something like consistency and harmony. There is an almost entire consensus of opinion among authorities on this matter. An American gentleman recently visited Europe expressly to put himself into communication with the leading jurists and publicists of the Continent and of this country on this very subject, and he found among them an almost universal concurrence of opinion on this—that there exists urgent necessity for further mutual understanding and consent among nations as to the principles and rules of International Law. Now we have a precedent for what I want to be done as the first step, in what took place at the Congress of Paris in 1856. When the Great Powers came to negotiate terms of peace, they did not restrict themselves to matters arising out of the war just concluded. But they found certain points of international maritime law in such a condition as urgently to require consideration and decision. Accordingly, they adopted a Declaration, to which they attached the following Preamble, which I especially command to the attention of the House:—

"That maritime law in time of war has long been the subject of deplorable disputes. That the uncertainty of the law in such a matter gives rise to differences of opinion, which may occasion serious difficulties, and even conflicts. That it is consequently advantageous to establish a uniform doctrine on so important a point."

Therefore, as Lord Russell said, the Governments, in order

"to prove the sincerity of their wish to give permanence and fixity to this part of the Law of Nations," adopted the Declaration abolishing privateering, defining the rights of neutrals in maritime warfare, and settling the law of blockades. Other Governments were invited to accept the Declaration, and some 39 Governments did send in their adhesion, so that now, as between these 46 Governments, and as respects the matters treated of in the Declaration, there is something like positive and

Government, and especially to Lord Granville, for the combined firmness, patience, temper, and tact with which he persevered, in the face of great difficulties and some provocations, in seeking to extricate the two countries from embarrassments, which at one time threatened to wreck the arbitration. And I feel no less grateful to the Leaders of the party opposite for their wise and patriotic forbearance during the whole of those difficult and delicate negotiations. I confess that when I saw the Notice of Motion placed on the Paper some weeks ago by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy), I had some apprehension lest in the discussion that would ensue, something might have been said to rekindle animosities happily allayed, or to discredit the principle of arbitration, or to bring into question the judgment at Geneva. But nothing of the sort took place. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman, which gave a tone to the debate, appeared to me as admirable in temper as it was in ability, and proved, as did that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), which followed in the same discussion, that they at least were determined not to convert this great international question into an arena for party strife. If they should ever come into office again—and I suppose that is a contingency that is on the cards, and have to deal with any difficult question of foreign policy, I hope the course they have taken on this question will not be forgotten by those who now sit on this side of the House. But some people say the judgment has gone against us. Well, I suppose judgment must go against somebody in every suit or trial at law. I hope the House will not misinterpret my meaning when I say that I am almost glad that it did go against us, because it afforded the people of this country a noble opportunity, which I believe they have nobly embraced, of showing their respect for law and their readiness to submit to a judicial decision even when it is against their own interests. By this dignified acquiescence in the judgment of Geneva—and I contend that the great bulk of the people of this country have so acquiesced—they have done more to consecrate the principle of arbitration than if the verdict had been over so much in their favour. But we are sometimes told that only

Mr. H. Richard

England would have the sense of justice and dignity to submit to such a decision. Well, it is a very pleasant thing to have a high opinion of ourselves, as if it soothes our vanity and helps us to better to bear our defeat to think we have no objection. But I am bound express my own belief that if the judgment had gone against the United States the great body of the people of this country would have done the same. I now call the attention of the House to the noble words uttered by Mr. Collier, the Vice President of the United States at the time when difficulties had arisen between the two Governments owing to conflicting interpretations of the Treaty of Washington, and before the trial had been opened at Geneva—

"Though the arbitration were to adjudge us not a single dollar, I will stand up before fellow-citizens, and will cry to them, 'The resolution and renounce all indemnity than recede one hair's-breadth from the moral position in which you have placed yourselves along with England before the other nations of the world.'"

All this is, no doubt, highly encouraging. But the disadvantages of leaving arbitration to be provided for a quarrel has arisen are obvious. A trivial difference often becomes complicated and aggravated by diplomatic reciprocations, and venomous outcries of popular opinion; whereas if there were some state of reference, these disturbing influences need not at all come into operation. Undoubtedly the mere existence of stated means would prevent malcontents from coming to a head. "I am in favour of law," it has been truly said, "not to decide, but to prevent disputes; for every dispute which Britain, for instance, decides, there are others of cases in which disputes are likely to arise by its certainty and definiteness." What is wanted is that Powers of the world should take steps towards the establishment of something like a regular and permanent international jurisdiction. I may not be charged with indulging in chimerical visions beyond the range of practical statesmanship in saying that let me cite the words of the late Mr. Derby. Speaking in this House in the year 1867, apropos of the question of Spain about the ship Mercurio, he said—

"Unhappily there is nothing in the world to which an international tribunal to which this kind might be referred, and there is no International Law by which parties can be required to submit such cases to arbitration. I do not hesitate to say that it would be one of the greatest benefits to the civilized world if such a tribunal existed."—[3 Hassard, clxxxvii. 1752.]

No statesman living is less likely than Lord Derby to indulge in longings after what is impracticable and Utopian. And yet such are his views as to the importance and value of an International Court. It is well known that such a Supreme Court does exist in the United States to adjudicate between different States of the Union and between States and the Federal Government. A great man who has recently passed from among us, Mr. John Stuart Mill, referring to that institution says—

"The Supreme Court of the Federation dispenses International Law, and is the first example of what is now one of the most prominent wants of civilized society—a real international tribunal."

I do not say that the world is ripe for such an institution in its completeness at the present moment. But surely we may take some steps in that direction. I ask the Government to communicate with the other Powers with a view to the appointment of an International Commission to examine into the present state of International Law, and to reduce it into something like a clear and coherent system. This is a great necessity of civilization. Perhaps, indeed, if we use the word law in its rigid sense, we may say that there hardly exists such a thing at present as International Law. What passes under that name consists of custom and consent, provisions in Treaties between nations, judgments of Prize Courts, and the opinions of eminent jurists from Grotius downwards. I am very far from saying that even in its present imperfect form all this has not been of the greatest possible service in regulating the relations and intercourse of States, in <sup>shing the fr-</sup> and mitigati<sup>society of</sup> it is imy<sup>y by</sup> enthous<sup>e cr</sup> tius w<sup>hi</sup> h; os; St; re; in; g; nothing in; al to whic;

no recognized tribunal by which it can be administered. At any rate, it will not be doubted that the present state of International Law is far from satisfactory; that there are many important points connected with the relations and intercourse of States, which are unsettled, ill-defined, or unprovided for; and that the whole system of International Law requires to be revised and digested and brought into something like consistency and harmony. There is an almost entire consensus of opinion among authorities on this matter. An American gentleman recently visited Europe expressly to put himself into communication with the leading jurists and publicists of the Continent and of this country on this very subject, and he found among them an almost universal concurrence of opinion on this—that there exists urgent necessity for further mutual understanding and consent among nations as to the principles and rules of International Law. Now we have a precedent for what I want to be done as the first step, in what took place at the Congress of Paris in 1856. When the Great Powers came to negotiate terms of peace, they did not restrict themselves to matters arising out of the war just concluded. But they found certain points of international maritime law in such a condition as urgently to require consideration and decision. Accordingly, they adopted a Declaration, to which they attached the following Preamble, which I especially commend to the attention of the House:—

"That maritime law in time of war has long been the subject of deplorable disputes. That the uncertainty of the law in such a matter gives rise to differences of opinion, which may occasion serious difficulties, and even conflicts. That it is consequently advantageous to establish a uniform doctrine on so important a point."

Therefore, as Lord Russell said, the Governments, in order

<sup>* to prove the sincerity of their wish to give mence and fixity to this part of the Law</sup> in abolishing prirights of neutrals nd settling the er Government he Declarants did send now, as betw and as ref in the D

g like p<sup>o</sup> highly advanced ages of law vided for the are obvious. It en become pa-gravated by reations, and the f popular press

re some stated as disturbing index into operation. The ere existence of a prevent many a head. "There been truly said to prevent dispe-rich British civil
, there are thousand spites are pre-certainty and cerited is that the Gov-ld should take up establishment of su-and permanent sel jurisdiction. In ed with indulging in ons beyond the range ship in saying that s of the present Lord n this House in the of the question with ship. Merton

nothing in al to whic

authoritative International Law. Now, is there any reason why the work thus begun in Paris in 1856 should not be continued? No one denies that there are other points of International Law in a condition as unsettled and unsatisfactory, and as likely to give rise to differences of opinion, leading to difficulties and conflicts, as those dealt with in the Declaration of 1856? Is it well to wait until those difficulties and conflicts arise? or, would it not be wise to avail ourselves of the present lucid interval of peace to try to come to a common understanding as to some of the principles and rules of International Law, and so, by gradually preparing a system of law, to lay the foundation for a general and permanent system of international jurisdiction? There is a remarkable experiment now in progress in Egypt, which, if it succeeds—as I cordially hope it may—will furnish a practical illustration on a limited scale of the kind of International Tribunal for which I contend. The subject was brought forward in the early part of the Session by the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane). It is admitted on all hands that the present mode of administering justice in that country, especially as between natives and foreigners, is utterly unsatisfactory. This has been long felt by the European Powers. With a view to remedy this an International Commission was appointed, and has been sitting at Constantinople, the object of which was to draw up a code of laws, and to prepare the constitution of an International Court, to administer justice both in civil and criminal cases. The Powers represented on that Commission, as stated by the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for the Foreign Department, were—Great Britain, France, Austria, Germany, Italy, Russia, Belgium, the United States, Holland, Sweden, Norway, and Turkey. The Commission has completed its labours and presented its Report, and is only waiting for the approval of the Governments to come into operation, when we shall have a real International Court, administering an international code of laws. Now, all I ask the Government to do at present is to enter into communication with foreign Governments, with a view of doing something for Europe and the civilized world like what they are actually doing for Egypt. It seems to me that each of the two great parties in this country are at the present moment groping—and not very successfully groping—for a policy. Would that one of them had the courage to aspire to become the leader of a real peace party in Europe, to take the first steps towards establishing peace on sure and firm foundations—the foundations of law and jurisprudence. They would meet with a response of which they have little conception. The world is growing weary of war. The nations are groaning under the burden of military expenditure and military servitude, and are longing to be delivered. I believe even that the Governments, and especially the minor Governments of Europe, would most gladly and gratefully follow the leadership of England. A distinguished Member of a foreign Legislature wrote to me some time ago in reference to my Motion—

"I believe you are hitting the right nail on the head. It will be impossible for the nations to enter upon the process of mutual disarmament until first of all they shall find some means presented to them by which they can settle their disputes without arms, and I feel convinced that England, of all nations in the world, is the right country to take the initiative in this matter." I also, Sir, have the ambition to secure the honour of this great initiative for my own country. There are people who charge us of the peace party with being careless of, or indifferent to, the honour of England. I repudiate and repel the imputation. What possible reason can those who make the imputation, and who arrogate to themselves the credit of an exclusive patriotism to love England and her dignity and glory, have, that we have not in an equal degree with themselves? Is not England also our country, the home of our childhood's joys, the place of our fathers' sepulchres? Are not her name and character and greatness closely intertwined with our dearest earthly affections in the mémories of the past and in the anticipations of the future? Do we not also feel that we rise with her renown and sink in her degradation? Of course, there may be differences of opinion as to what constitutes honour for a great country. I do not believe that the honour of a Christian nation consists in being conspicuous for deeds of violence and blood, though even if it were so, we have had enough of that in past times to glut the most insatiable appetite for military glory. But to my mind the honour of England consists in this—that she is the birth-place and home of freedom; that she has been able to teach the nations by her own example how to combine order and liberty in her political life; that she is the mother of free communities which perpetuate her ideas and institutions in all parts of the globe; that she was the first to strike the fetters off the slave and bid the oppressed go free, and that she is stretching forth her hand to scatter the blessings of civilization and Christianity among the nations to the uttermost ends of the earth. These are the things which, in my opinion, honour England, and it will be a still greater honour if possible—a signal, a crowning honour if she becomes the harbinger of peace to the world, if she takes the first step towards the organization of that peace on solid and lasting foundations, so as to do something to realize the glorious vision of our poet Laureate—

“When the war-drum throbs no longer and the battle-flag is furled, In the Parliament of man, the Federation of the world.
When the common sense of most shall hold a fretful realm in awe,
And the kindly earth shall slumber lapt in universal law.”

The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. MUNDELLA seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to instruct Her Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to enter into communication with Foreign Powers with a view to further improvement in International Law and the establishment of a general and permanent system of International Arbitration.” — (Mr. Henry Richard.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, his hon. Friend was right when he stated that this was not the first time that the present subject, which was one of profound interest, was introduced to the notice of the House. In 1849, Mr. Cobden first formally drew attention to it, and made a Motion not very different from that of his hon. Friend. The Motion of Mr. Cobden differed mainly from that of his hon. Friend in this respect—that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was to enter into communication with foreign Powers, and invite them to make treaties binding the respective parties, in case they should have any future misunderstanding which could not be arranged by amicable negotiation, to refer the matter in dispute to the decision of arbitrators. His hon. Friend invited them in the same manner to communicate with foreign Powers with the same object in view. The communication was to be general, and it was to contemplate a further improvement in International Law, and the establishment of a permanent system of International Arbitration. In truth, his hon. Friend had very considerably widened the scope of Mr. Cobden’s Motion as to the means he prescribed. He could not say, however, that the change made by his hon. Friend was an improvement. If progress was to be made in this direction, it was more likely to be made in ordinary times and under ordinary circumstances, by beginning in particular cases with particular countries in regard to particular subjects, as occasion arose, rather than by an ambitious attempt to draw all the civilized nations of the globe into general communications on a matter involving changes so great in their extent, and so very difficult, of necessity, in the mode of their operation. His hon. Friend had referred to a great variety of cases in which, as he said, the principle of amicable arrangement, in one shape or another, whether by formal arbitration or not, had been usefully employed. All the cases he had enumerated were just and true. But his hon. Friend might have added other instances. He might have cited the case of the King of Holland, who undertook to effect an arrangement with respect to the San Juan Boundary which had recently been settled by the good offices of the Emperor of Germany. He might have referred to an analogous instance—namely, the arrangements with respect to the navigation and international rights at the mouths of the Danube. He might likewise have quoted the case of the unfortunate difference which arose between this country and Greece in 1849-50, when our neighbour France offered, not a formal arbitration, but her good offices to this country, and those good offices were beneficially employed. In fact, so far as this country was concerned, and to a great extent other countries, there was gradually growing up a series of precedents which we might hope—but it must be by degrees—would harden into rule. But the real duty which could fairly be imposed, and the performance of which could reasonably be expected from any Government of this country was that it should avail itself of every opportunity as it arose, and of all the means which it possessed, to bring to a peaceful issue differences between other States, or between this country and some other State, which if not peacefully settled might threaten great international evil and calamity. If he went on to examine minutely the history of the last few years and the transactions of the Foreign Office, with which he had necessarily been closely conversant, he could add very considerably to the instances mentioned by his hon. Friend. His noble Friend the late Lord Clarendon had not for many weeks assumed the seals of the Foreign Office at the end of 1868 when he was enabled to intervene, with the utmost tact, good feeling, and ability, in a question, apparently of a paltry and trumpery character, with respect to the railways between France and Belgium, and by his intervention not only a most perplexing and prolonged, but possibly a very dangerous, controversy was got rid of. In the case of Luxembourg, also, the exertions of Lord Derby would be justly remembered to the credit of the preceding Government. In truth, speaking without reference to any one Government, it was the practice of the Foreign Office, and would be a duty which Parliament would exact, that it should accept as a principle that very rule the adoption of which by every nation in the world his hon. Friend sought to procure. At the same time, it was important to consider not only what we preached, but also what we practised, not only that we should recommend with zeal to other countries to resort to arbitration, but still more was it a matter of consequence that we should examine whether our own proceedings were in all cases wise, and before they had assumed the form of menace, quarrel, or controversy, whether they were governed by the rules of good sense and moderation. Because, if the settlement of disputes was good, the prevention of disputes was better; and the best mode of prevention was the careful observance of that rule which was enjoined for the government of our private and personal conduct, to do unto others as we would be done by, and to expect from them no more than we were prepared to give. When we had acted in this way we should have laid the foundations of the most important parts of a good and sound foreign policy. There was, indeed, another part, and that was a vigilant defence of the honour and interests of the nation, whenever circumstances might call for it; but that was a point on which it was less necessary to insist, because it was a portion of our duty with respect to which this country never had failed, nor did he think it was likely to fail in the future. When Mr. Cobden made the Motion to which he had referred, Lord Palmerston said he entirely agreed with the hon. Gentleman in attributing the utmost possible value to the Motion, and in feeling the greatest dislike and he might say horror of war in any shape. He need in this case only substitute for Mr. Cobden's the name of his hon. Friend on whom the mantle of Mr. Cobden had fallen, and he fully adopted the words of Lord Palmerston. But Lord Palmerston was not prepared to adopt the Motion of Mr. Cobden. He did not think it would practically contribute to the object in view, and he moved the Previous Question; but so satisfied was Mr. Cobden with the tone of his declaration that he said in his reply the noble Lord had led him to suppose there was not much difference in their views. Mr. Cobden, however, pressed his Motion to a division. It was seldom that he looked upon any proceeding of Mr. Cobden otherwise than with warm approval not only of its purpose, but of its judgment; but he ventured to doubt whether Mr. Cobden exercised a wise discretion in this instance. A division was taken, and the result was—Ayes, 79; Noes, 176; so that a very large majority of the House of Commons was announced to the world as repelling and refusing the Motion of Mr. Cobden at a time when the person who had spoken as the organ of the Government was declared by Mr. Cobden himself to have delivered sentiments which differed but little from those he had himself expressed. He was not prepared to ask the House to join in the adoption of his hon. Friend's Resolution. At the same time, he now stood in some respects in a position of greater advantage than Lord Palmerston did when he addressed the House; because while Lord Palmerston was compelled to rely principally on a perfectly frank, sincere, but still somewhat abstract, declaration of concurrence of opinion, it was now in their power to point to a course of facts and events which gave strength to those declarations, and enabled him to found himself on a solid basis when he pointed out that he had but one motive for declining to request the House to adopt that Motion—namely, that its adoption would tend to put in jeopardy the progress of the very cause his hon. Friend had at heart. For, while they had much gratifying progress to refer to, they had also many painful circumstances to recall. It was true that in our relations with the United States of America we had been enabled, in a case of primary importance and moment, to adopt and carry through to its conclusion the principle of preferring a settlement by arbitration to a settlement by war, or to what was practically much the same thing—that of leaving unsettled a controversy which in the long run must eventually lead to war. But did the state of facts they perceived on the Continent indicate such a progress in the general mind of Europe as would justify us in departing from the course we had hitherto pursued—namely, of seizing every opportunity of recommending, where we had the title to do so, that method of peaceful procedure, and also of resolving to give the most marked instances we could of our own practical adoption of the principle? For himself, he did not think so. He saw opinion growing in some quarters in favour of that principle; but as yet it was sectional opinion rather than national sentiment. It had not extensively found its way into the Cabinets of statesmen, or into the popular mind of Europe. They must not conceal from themselves the state of facts which characterized the times in which we lived. His hon. Friend himself had described the monstrous and portentous development of armaments they had seen of late years in Europe, and had justly referred to the natural consequences of that development in that vast growth of National Debt and that anticipation of future resources which, when they reached a certain magnitude, became themselves among the most formidable menaces, both to internal tranquillity and the general peace. He held in his hand the work of that eminent Belgian author, M. Laveleye, on the existing causes of war in Europe, written manifestly in the sense and with the object of his hon. Friend. M. Laveleye recognized the obstacles in his way. He alluded almost with exultation to the Treaty of Washington and its results, and spoke of the Arbitration of Geneva as having re-animated the hopes of the friends of peace throughout the world. But such was the sense that gentleman entertained of the dangers of Europe that, towards the close of his most able and luminous disquisition, he urged, with his usual earnestness, that, for the sake of liberty itself, considerable armaments must be maintained, and that the people both of England and Belgium would do well to submit to the law of compulsory and universal military service. He was not able to follow M. Laveleye in that opinion; but it showed what must be the pressure of the motives which led such a man to a conclusion that must be so painful to him. M. Laveleye, however, in discussing the methods of giving effect to pacific views, looked in the first place to a gradual formation of a code of International Law, and then eventually to the formation of a High International Court. That Court was to be one entirely devoid of any command over physical force. It was to trust to moral force alone. That presupposed a condition of nations in which moral force, they must assume, would be strong enough to induce each of them to give up the prepossessions and predilections connected with its own particular interests and passions, and to adopt a judgment proceeding from some impartial source. Well, we might fairly say with respect to ourselves, and in an equal degree to the United States, that in a matter of the utmost difficulty and delicacy, touching most intimately both the honour and the pride of two great nations, we had fearlessly applied the principle of arbitration. His hon. Friend was glad the Award had gone against us, because it gave us a better opportunity of showing the value we attached to the principle; and he (Mr. Gladstone) thought there was great force in that declaration. If it was a gain to mankind that the people of this country, in conjunction with those of the United States, should resort to the process of Arbitration adopted both at Geneva and Berlin, it was still more important, now when the whole question at Berlin had been given against us, and likewise a modified judgment at Geneva, that the world should see that our attachment to the principle of arbitration was not a vulgar and sordid attachment founded on a confident expectation of success; that we valued it for its own sake; that we valued it far more than either the territory or the money involved in the dispute; and the opportunity of testing that value by the unhesitating acquiescence—nay by the cheerful and uncomplaining acquiescence—which we had endeavoured to show in those Awards, was that something might go forth to the world as a proof that there must be some real vital force in the principle that indicated and prompted conduct such as that. But let them look at another case. He did not wish to speak in tones of Pharisaic superiority, moral or intellectual, over the civilized nations of Europe. Providence had endowed England and America also with immense advantages and facilities for the propagation of the principle of arbitration, and rendered it far easier for them to apply them than in the case of Continental nations. There was really an enormous difference in all those questions of international conflict between insular and Continental Powers. It was probably owing to the great difficulties arising out of their close contact with their neighbours, and all the historic associations connected with it, that it had been found much less practicable for the nations of the Continent to give effect to Arbitration than for England and America to do so. But let him call to mind one remarkable instance of the failure of that principle which, although it came and went like a flash of lightning, was yet deserving of historical record. He referred to the outbreak of the war of 1870. What was its immediate occasion? The Hohenzollern candidature for the Crown of Spain, followed by an allegation, and with that allegation an undoubted belief prevailing in France of something in the nature of a slight or an insult personally offered. If those questions were judged in the abstract, it would be impossible to conceive questions better qualified to be disposed of by arbitration, because it was in those matters of feeling that a sensible man in private life would endeavour, when he could not settle his difficulty, to obtain the intervention of a friend. That was the view which the British Government took in reference to the relations between Germany and France. Even upon the spur of the moment they did not scruple to press upon the two Powers concerned the objects of the Treaty of Paris. Reminding them that they had given in their adhesion to arbitration as a principle, and that it was impossible there could be a more suitable occasion for the application of that principle than that which unfortunately had arisen. They were all aware of the result. However earnest and well meant the efforts of Her Majesty's Government were, they entirely failed, and the result had been written in blood upon the history of Europe. What he wanted to point out to his hon. Friend was this, that there was a practical duty connected with the Treaty of Washington that still remained unfulfilled, namely—that which related to what were called the Three Rules. In consequence of the controversies which arose last year, the proceedings connected with those Rules had been suspended. Nor was there, so far as he was able to judge, an immediate likelihood of their being resumed. He could not but think there was some advantage in bringing to a close the proceedings more immediately connected with the Arbitration before they considered the steps to be taken in relation to the Three Rules. The adoption of those Rules if they were sufficiently clear—with amendment if they were not—was a step in the direction in which his hon. Friend desired to go. But there was the utmost apprehension and danger of engendering jealousies and producing re-action by anything like precipitate proceedings in matters of this kind. He was sure that there was even now more or less of an opinion afloat among the various countries of Europe that the Three Rules were meant to give selfish expression to that which was for the interest of Great Britain and America, and not for the benefit of the States of Europe generally. The House would see the great risk we ran if, while a question of that kind was pending, we set about so extensive—he might say so ambitious—a matter as inviting the Powers of the world to adopt an arrangement for the construction of a Code of International Law and a general and permanent system of International Arbitration. Lord Palmerston saw great value in the Motion of Mr. Cobden; he (Mr. Gladstone) saw great value in the Motion of his hon. Friend; but he was convinced that this question for a long time to come would only make practical progress by a steady adherence on the part of those Powers who were rightly inclined and convinced and persuaded on the subject to the principles—first, of governing themselves by justice and moderation, and next by losing no opportunity of recommending the peaceful settlement of disputes between nations. He did not wish to damp or chill generous aspirations like those of his hon. Friend. There was, he knew, something invidious in endeavouring to rein him in in his career of benevolence and philanthropy. It might seem that they were jealous of his voluntary aid; but he trusted to his hon. Friend's sense of justice to attribute the course they adopted to a better motive and truer conviction. They felt the duty that was incumbent on them of doing all in their power, when the occasion arose, to recommend the principle and practice to which he had referred. But, on the other hand, there was the apprehension that the recommending even of the soundest proposition under circumstances which might give rise to a suggestion of selfish motives—however unfounded the suggestion might be—would not advance the object which they all had in view. He hoped therefore his hon. Friend would not invoke the judgment of the House on his Motion. The sentiment his hon. Friend had expressed was, he believed, the sentiment of all who heard him; but there must of necessity be great difference of opinion as to the policy and expediency of endeavouring to give effect and formal expression to that sentiment in a manner which might tend to force the Government to act and make itself responsible for submitting recommendations at an inopportune time having regard to the existing state of the circumstances of nations. Having used so many expressions tending perhaps to damp the expectations of his hon. Friend, he wished to add one cheerful word. He felt convinced, with a sentiment to which he might almost give the elevated name of faith, for all the hope he had for humanity was so closely associated with it—he felt convinced that there was reserved for this country a great and honourable destiny in connection with this subject. They must be content to proceed step by step. They must by degrees make a character. It was to be recollect ed that they had not always been in the history of their foreign policy distinguished for remarkable forbearance or sedulous regard for the rights of others. If they were to become effective missionaries of those principles they could only derive authority by making them their own, and by giving to them practical effect by acting on the principles of moderation, good will, and justice. If they did so, then every year would add more and more weight to the abstract doctrines they preached. It would be in this case as it was in that of Free Trade. At first it was suspected that they were Free-traders only so far as it was for their advantage to be so, but they persevered, and soon it became known that the microscope could not discover the smallest remnant or fragment of exclusive privilege in their Commercial Code, and progress in the principles of Free Trade was consequently made in other countries. So also would it be here. It might not be given to those who were engaged in that discussion; it might not be given to those who then sat within the walls of the House to witness the ultimate fruit of such a course. Great and desirable results in the mixed and chequered world in which they lived were only to be achieved by the patient and persevering use of rational and appropriate means. There was not much which excited or appealed to the imagination in preaching lessons of that kind. Still, they were lessons of practical wisdom, and if happily they adhered to them, sooner or later they would not lose their reward, and nations who would profit from walking in the same path would not lose the benefit of our example.

Mr. Gladstone

SIR WILFRID LAWSON * said, that as the speech of the Prime Minister seemed to be so much in favour of the Motion, he was surprised to hear him say he should vote against it.

MR. GLADSTONE explained that what he had recommended his hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr to do was to withdraw it.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, he did not think there was a prospect of their doing very much more; but he believed that if they could carry this Resolution, it would be one good done. He supposed that nobody would dispute the evil which was so ably depicted by the hon. Member who had brought forward this Motion; but the worst of it was that the system of keeping up enormous hosts of armed men for the purpose of settling international disputes appeared to be getting worse instead of better. It seemed to him, moreover, that it had become the settled policy of this country, for when during last Session they challenged the large number of men kept up by the present Government, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War told them it was absolutely necessary to maintain this large body of men in the presence of the enormous military forces of the Continental nations. That meant that this country and the other nations of Europe had as yet no better way of settling their disputes than by finding out which was the strongest—which had the greatest number and the best body of fighting men. He thought such a state of things was utterly deplorable and miserable. Why, he wondered what the Shah thought of them? They had him over in this country the other day, and he supposed that his Majesty was brought over that they might civilize him and send him back to do good to Persia. They had taught him a number of things. They taught him to drink champagne. They carried him about and showed him all that they thought most noble. They showed him guns at Woolwich, ironclads at Portsmouth, warriors at Windsor, boxers at Buckingham Palace. In fact, they took him all round, and showed him their power and might. But there was one place they did not take him to—they did not take him to church where he might have heard a sermon proclaiming that the national religion taught them to love their enemies. He did not believe that if the Shah had been taken there, he would have believed the interpreter who told him that that was the principle of their religion. International Law was in what might be truly called a state of international anarchy. Every nation had now a law of its own. There was no overruling law to decide who was right and who was wrong and they knew what would happen if every man in every case which affected himself should be his own judge, his own jury, and his own executioner. That was the case at the present moment with regard to International Law. He ventured to differ from the Prime Minister in thinking that the Motion brought forward by Mr. Cobden 24 years ago was practically the same as that which they were now considering. That instructed the Minister to make treaties, whereas this Motion left him virtually free to act on the policy which he might think the best. He dared say hon. Gentlemen had read the debate which took place in 1849. On that occasion the present Lord Russell said he could not himself believe that, connected as the nations of Europe now were, we were destined to have a revival of those wars which, he thought, had been a disgrace to civilization, a disgrace to humanity, and a disgrace to that Christianity which the nations of Europe professed. There was no more far-seeing statesman in that day than Lord John Russell, but how had his prophecy been fulfilled? Why, since 1849 every one of the great European Powers had been engaged in one kind of war or another, and he did not suppose that they were near the end of them yet. They seemed to be on the brink of a mine. Look at Prussia, look at France, and they saw them ready to explode on the shortest possible notice. The main objection to any system of International Arbitration was to be found in the question, where is the power to enforce the decrees of the arbitrators? No doubt that was the great objection—he thought he should be justified in saying the only valid objection, to a measure of this kind. But if they looked to their own country, what did they find had brought about all the great changes which they had seen during the past two generations? Why, public opinion. And although the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government said he did not find that public opinion was growing on this subject, he (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) ventured to think that passing such a Resolution as his hon. Friend had proposed in that House would be the way to stimulate and increase the growth of that public opinion. What they wanted in this matter was to create an international opinion. No doubt opinion in international matters, as in other matters, ultimately was supreme. It might be said that the Foreign Secretary would be repulsed in making overtures to other Powers respecting an agreement of this kind. He should say that it was better to try and fail than never to have tried at all. The dis-honour would not be with those who made a rational proposition; it would remain with those who refused to accede to it. It could not lead to any more expenditure than they were carrying on at present for warlike purposes. He regretted to say that the current of opinion in this country had prevented those who would be anxious to check great expenditure on warlike forces from doing so. Nobody supposed that the Prime Minister really was satisfied with the expenditure of this country. Nor did anybody suppose that the leader of the Opposition really approved of it. They had heard the sentiments of both on the subject. They had heard the Prime Minister's sentiment before he came into power at the last election; and they had heard the leader of the Opposition condemn, in eloquent language, the bloated armaments which were so extravagantly kept up. Now, they could not, he imagined, raise up any hostility on the part of, or give affront to, other nations by adopting a course of action which was so manifestly dictated by feelings of peace and goodwill. It might be said that they should give up the honour of the country. He did not understand that any honour was to be gained by entering into wars when they might settle matters in any other way. The honour and the true statesmanship consisted in keeping out of war. He had heard what was called the "Manchester School" described as mercenary—that they did not care about the honour of the country. His hon. Friend had ably vindicated them that night. They were not mercenary, they were not blood-thirsty, and he believed that school would rather give up large sums of money than they would shed one drop of the blood of the people of this country. They did not say this country was not to be defended. They only said that there was a more excellent way of defending it than by keeping up enormous hosts of men for the settlement of any international disputes which might arise. But the greatest reason of all for attempting something of the kind proposed that night was that the present system had avowedly failed. All these preparations for settling disputes by war had not given a sense of safety and security to the people of this country. Although now and then they were told that they had everything necessary to meet any emergency which might arise, yet ever and anon they were rudely awoken by some authority stating the contrary. Why, the other day, when that great fleet appeared at Portsmouth, it was felt that now, at any rate, they had a perfect fleet, equal to all the fleets of Europe, and that they might be satisfied. But two or three days after came a letter from Sir Spencer Robinson saying it was all sham—it could not fight. He did not say he believed Sir Spencer Robinson—but nothing satisfied them—nothing of this sort in the way of armament kept them at peace. Why, as regarded their Navy, they kept a constructor and a re-constructor of the Navy, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich. He did think that the precedent which had been alluded to already for the settlement of the Alabama Claims by means of arbitration, was in favour of the House accepting this Motion at the present time. ["No."] Somebody said "No," but why should they say "No?" That was a long-standing, a bitter, and an envenomed dispute, and it was settled, as they knew, by arbitration; and he was ready to concur that nothing which the present Government had done had been really more widely popular with the people than the settlement of that question in the way in which it was settled. And he was entitled to say so. Who was there in that House who had dared to impugn the principles upon which that question was settled? They had had Notices given about passing votes of money for the purchase of pieces of plate for the arbitrators, and paltry things of that kind; but nobody had got up, and nobody, he believed, would get up, to make a Motion condemning the system of arbitration which was carried on on that occasion, and which would be the most honourable duty to be hereafter commemorated in connection with the present Ministry, and honourable also to hon. Gentlemen opposite and the party to whom they belonged, for they could not forget that Lord Stanley was the first to propose that arbitration. If that were so, and having gone into that arbitration and come out of it, as he freely confessed, second best, having been to a certain extent done in the matter, but having nevertheless freely and fully accepted the Award, did they not go with clean hands before other nations and say—"Now we support this system of arbitration, not that we can gain more than we have lost, but we believe the saving of blood and bad feeling and international hatred is so great that we are ready to press it upon other nations also?" He believed that Lord Granville would be willing to accept this Motion. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman was justified in saying that his hon. Friend advocated any precipitate action in the matter. He simply wished to strengthen the hands of the Government in trying to get other nations to agree to this plan. If it would meet the views of the Prime Minister, and prevent a division on the question, he would venture to suggest that it might be well to let the Motion stand thus—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She would be graciously pleased to instruct Her Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to enter into communication with Foreign Powers with a view to further improvement in International Law,"—omitting that part which said—"and the establishment of a general and permanent system of International Arbitration."

He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman would agree to that. If he would, he thought the House would agree to it also. All he had to say, in conclusion, was that he did trust that the Government would not oppose this Motion, but would agree to it, so that they might do something to get rid of the present evil system, and hasten the time when the settlement of international disputes should no longer be carried on by brute force, violence, and bloodshed, but conducted in accordance with the dictates of justice and the principles of common sense.

MR. H. RICHARD* said, that after the kind and patient attention with which the House had listened to him at the opening of this debate, he should feel that he was wanting in courtesy to the House if he were to detain it by commenting at any length upon matters of reply. He had to express his gratification with the whole tone of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. He thought the sentiments which the right hon. Gentleman had expressed would produce a salutary effect throughout Europe and the civilized world. At the same time he thought the right hon. Gentleman misinterpreted the scope of his Motion. He seemed to think that he (Mr. Richard) wanted to do something suddenly, and violently, and extreme. But he (Mr. Richard) took pains to explain in the course of his remarks that he did not expect that what was the ultimate aim of this Resolution could be attained at once. He said they looked forward to the time when there should be something like a Code of International Law agreed upon by the nations, and a tribunal or High Court of Nations established to administer that law. But he said at the same time that he had no expectation of realizing the hope at once, and all that he wanted was that the Government should make one step in advance by entering into communication with other Governments, with a view further to define, and settle, and adjust disputed rules of International Law, and upon that ground he felt he was bound to ask the judgment of the House upon his Motion. It could hardly, perhaps, be expected that the Government should accept at once the Resolution he had placed before the House; but it would be a great stimulus and encouragement to them if the House should affirm the Resolution, and hand it over to them as an Instruction.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD moved the Previous Question.

Previous Question put, "That that Question be now put."—(Viscount Enfield.)

The House divided:—Ayes 88; Noes 98: Majority 10.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to instruct Her Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to enter into communication with Foreign Powers with a view to further improvement in International Law and the establishment of a general and permanent system of International Arbitration.

To be presented by Privy Councillors.

AYES.

Allen, W. S.	Colman, J. J.
Anderson, G.	Cowen, Sir J.
Balfour, Sir G.	Cunliffe, Sir R. A.
Bass, A.	Dalrymple, D.
Bassett, F.	Davies, R.
Bazley, Sir T.	Dent, J. D.
Brewer, Dr.	Dickinson, S. S.
Bright, rt. hon. J.	Digby, K. T.
Bright, J. (Manchester)	Dimsdale, R.
Brinckman, Captain	Dixon, G.
Brogdon, A.	Dodson, rt. hon. J. G.
Buckley, N.	Ewing, H. E. Crum.
Burrell, Sir P.	Eykyn, R.
Cadogan, hon. F. W.	Fawcett, H.
Candler, J.	Forster, C.
Carter, R. M.	Fowler, R. N.
Cave, T.	Fowler, W.
Chadwick, D.	Gilpin, C.
Cholmeley, Captain	Goldsmith, Sir F.
Clifford, C. C.	Gower, hon. E. F. L.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

Gower, Lord R. Morrison, W.
 Gravé, J. J. Onslow, G.
 Hardy, J. Palmer, J. H.
 Headlam, rt. hon. T. E. Parry, L. Jones.
 Herbert, hon. A. E. W. Pell, A.
 Hermon, E. Pim, J.
 Hodgson, K. D. Potter, E.
 Holland, S. Roaayne, J. P.
 Holmes, J. Rylands, P.
 Hoskyns, C. Wren- Samuelson, B.
 Illingworth, A. Sartoris, E. J.
 James, H. Seely, C. (Nottingham)
 Johnston, A. Shaw, R.
 Lawson, Sir W. Sheridan, H. B.
 Lea, T. Simon, Mr. Serjeant
 Leatham, E. A. Smith, E.
 Leeman, G. Stevenson, J. C.
 Leith, J. F. Stuart, Colonel
 Lloyd, Sir T. D. Taylor, P. A.
 Lubbock, Sir J. Tollermache, hon. F. J.
 Lush, Dr. Torr, J.
 M'Arthur, W. Tracy, hon. C. R. D.
 M'Clure, T. Hanbury.
 Marchant, S. S. West, H. W.
 Melly, G. White, J.
 Miall, E. Whitwell, J.
 Milbank, F. A. Wingfield, Sir C.
 Miller, J.
 Mitchell, T. A. TELLERS.
 Morgan, G. O. Mundella, A. J.
 Morgan, hon. Major Richard, H.
 Morley, S.

Samuda, J. D'A. Wheelhouse, W. S. J.
 Simonds, W. B. Whitbread, S.
 Smith, F. C. Wilmot, Sir H.
 Smith, R. Winn, R.
 Stanhope, W. T. W. S. Winterbotham, H. S. P.
 Stansfeld, rt. hon. J. Wynn, C. W. W.
 Starke, J. P. C. Yorke, J. R.
 Tipping, W.
 Wallace, Sir R. TELLERS.
 Walter, J. Adam, W. P.
 Whalley, G. H. Glyn, hon. G. G.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.—[BILL 99.]

(Sir Charles Adderley, Mr. Francis Sharp Powell,
 Mr. Whitbread, Lord Robert Montagu, Mr.
 Stephen Cave, Mr. Richards.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in moving that the House do go into Committee on this Bill, stated that its main object was a preparation to consolidate the law relating to the public health, and with this view to make certain amendments in various parts of the existing law which the Commissioners in their Report had declared to require alteration. It was desirable to complete amending before consolidating. The Acts of the last two Sessions had completed the machinery of local Government, and the digests of Sanitary Law made by the Department had enabled that machinery to work. This Bill proposed to fill up all that digest showed wanting in the law, so as to put it in condition for consolidation. The Amendments of which Notice had been given were not numerous or hostile to the Bill. If the House went into Committee he should not press any portion of the measure against what he found to be the sense of the Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Sir Charles Adderley.)

MR. CORRANCE, as a sanitary reformer, opposed the Motion with great reluctance. He had formerly stated his reasons for opposing this Bill, and he would not repeat them at that late hour. The Bill was injudicious, especially in its machinery and the extraordinary powers which it gave to those who were to administer its provisions. The Bill would add to the burdens of the rate-payers, and, what was more objectionable, to the power of the Central Government. It gave the Central Govern-

NOES.

Adderley, rt. hon. Sir C. Forster, rt. hon. W. E.
 Agnew, R. V. Foster, W. H.
 Akroyd, E. Galway, Viscount Amphlett, R. P. Garnier, J. C.
 Ayton, rt. hon. A. S. Gladstone, rt. hon. W. E.
 Baker, R. B. W. Gore, J. R. O.
 Barrington, Viscount Grant, Colonel hon. J.
 Barttelot, Colonel Grosvenor, hon. N.
 Bates, E. Guest, M. J.
 Bateson, Sir T. Hambro, C.
 Beresford, Colonel M. Henley, rt. hon. J. W.
 Bourne, Colonel Hick, J.
 Brassey, T. Holt, J. M.
 Brise, Colonel R. Hutton, J.
 Bruce, rt. hon. H. A. Jardine, R.
 Bruen, H.
 Campbell-Bannerman, Jones, J.
 H.
 Cardwell, rt. hon. E. Kavanagh, A. MacM.
 Carington, hon. Col. W. Kay - Shuttleworth,
 U. J.
 Cartwright, W. C. Kinnaird, hon. A. F.
 Cavendish, Lord F. O. Laird, J.
 Cavendish, Lord G. Liddell, hon. H. G.
 Chidlers, rt. hon. H. Lowther, J.
 Corrance, F. S. Lyttelton, hon. C. G.
 Corrigan, Sir D. MacCle, R. A.
 Cowper, hon. H. F. M'Lagan, P.
 Delway, M. R. Maxwell, W. H.
 Dillwyn, L. L. Mellor, T. W.
 Duff, M. E. G. Miller, W.
 Dyott, Colonel R. Monckton, hon. G.
 Egerton, Adml. hon. F. Newport, Viscount
 Enfield, Viscount Parker, Lt.-Col. W.
 Ewing, A. Orr. Powell, W.
 Fielden, J. Read, C. S.
 Fitzmaurice, Lord E. Russell, Lord A.

ment a dangerous power—a power to override the authority and liberties of the local Government. The right hon. Gentleman was trying to thrust this Bill down their throats against the feeling of the people out-of-doors. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman would withdraw those clauses of the Bill which conferred additional powers on local boards. There was not the smallest chance of the passing of the measure this Session in the face of the fact that the Government felt themselves obliged at that late period of the Session to withdraw many of their own important measures. He would therefore ask the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw it. He would at once do so, he believed; but he was supported by the President of the Local Government Board. But it was that right hon. Gentleman's duty to bring forward a Bill on so important a subject, and not leave it in the hands of a private Member. He moved that the Order for Committee be discharged.

MR. F. S. POWELL reminded the House that the Bill was introduced at an early period of the Session, and was delayed to this comparatively late period by the opposition of a single Member under the operation of a well-known Rule of the House. He would remind those country Gentlemen who opposed the Bill that this was not the time to oppose themselves to proposals which went to improve the social condition of the agricultural classes of this country. They had three powerful diseases to contend with—namely, consumption, rheumatism, and typhoid fever, and this Bill was intended to deal with them effectually by measures carefully devised, with a view to their prevention. The country Gentlemen of England desired to improve the health and the wealth of the people, and particularly of the agricultural labourers, and he did hope they would not refuse the boon which they were asked to grant. He was old enough to remember the time when the cry of "foreign competition" was raised in answer to arguments in favour of a free trade policy. That cry degenerated into a panic and in the end was derided as a mere hobgoblin argument. Taught by this experience he hoped the local taxation hobby-horse would not be ridden too hard. Hon. Members might depend upon it that if they did not take heed this cry likewise would become a mere hobgoblin. They did not desire to increase the taxation of the people, and no increase, he thought, would be necessary under this Bill, which did not create one new office, or render necessary the appointment of one additional officer; but even if it were, then, he said, let them consider whether the game was not worth the candle. He desired to increase the physical energies of the people, being well assured that there was no resource more productive of wealth than the energies of a vigorous and stalwart race.

MR. PELL said, that as yet the rural sanitary authorities of the country had not had time to master the digest of the sanitary laws which had been sent to them; and he hoped there would not be an undue disposition to rely too much upon legislation on the matter, but that greater attention to cleanliness would be paid. He would allow that legislation, so far as it had gone on this subject, had not been altogether satisfactory, and it was almost trifling with it to attempt at this period of the Session to proceed further with the Bill. There were provisions in it of which he could not approve, especially those which depended upon chemical analyses. He would advise that the Bill should not be carried further, and would therefore support the Amendment.

MR. D. DALRYMPLE said, that though he did not approve of the Bill, he did not take upon himself the responsibility of opposing it, as it was a measure that at least went in the right direction, and any delay in passing it it would be, so far, a circumstance to be regretted.

COLONEL BARTTELOT considered that at the present advanced period of the Session it was utterly impossible to discuss with any practical result a measure of this extensive scope and magnitude. The question was one to be introduced by the Government, and not by a private Member.

MR. STANSFIELD said, that his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Adderley) was the Chairman of the Sanitary Commission which sat for two years, and whose invaluable Report was the basis of the measure which the Local Government Board passed last year. The rest of the Report of the Commission was embodied in the clauses of the present Bill. He had fully explained, when asked whether he intended to bring forward a measure on this subject, that the pressure of other business did not leave him sufficient time for undertaking the task. He had always declined to make this a party question, and held himself as free to give his support to a measure brought forward by a hon. Member on the opposite side of the House as to one emanating from the party to which he had the honour to belong. Considering the position of his right hon. Friend opposite on this question, it was due to him in point of courtesy and fairness to allow him to take his Bill into Committee. One objection to the Bill was that it would add to local burdens. But let them go into Committee and test that objection. He maintained that there was no clause in the Bill which would add one farthing to local rates in respect of the appointment of any new sanitary officers, and he hoped hon. Gentlemen would withdraw their opposition, and allow it to go into Committee.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, great credit was due to the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Charles Adderley) for the services he had rendered to the country on this question; but, inasmuch as the Bill of last year was working well, and looking at the advanced period of the Session, he should support his hon. Friend's Motion against the House going into Committee on the Bill.

DR. LUSH supported the Motion for going into Committee.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he appealed to the hon. Member for East Suffolk (Mr. Corrance) not to press his Motion to a division, and suggested that the object of the hon. Member and his Friends might be attained upon the clauses in Committee. With regard to the country and town districts, in his opinion the towns were much more in need of sanitary reform than the country. He should be sorry if it were to appear to the country that any section of the Members of that House was opposed to sanitary reform; and he therefore hoped his hon. Friend would not divide the House on the question.

MR. CLARE READ concurred with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Charles Adderley), that this question of sanitary reform should not be made a "party" question; but he must remind the right hon. Gentleman that he opposed the Birmingham Sewage Bill, the object of which was sanitary reform. It was only last year that an Act was passed repealing 25 or 26 Acts of Parliament. Instead of tinkering with this matter, the House ought to have a thorough reconstruction of the Acts of Parliament upon this subject, and the Government might advantageously turn their attention to the subject in the Recess.

MR. HIBBERT suggested a compromise—namely, to allow the Bill to go now into Committee, and merely to pass the Preamble of the Bill on the present occasion.

MR. HENLEY said, it was most unfortunate that these sanitary systems were being patched, and he did not think the right hon. Gentleman would like to have another patch next year. He was not responsible for this Bill, which referred to clauses in another Bill, and the result of that kind of legislation was to produce a fresh batch of Bills to amend other Bills. Many of the clauses imposed conditions which were utterly impracticable, and he very much doubted whether at that period of the Session it was prudent to press such a measure.

MR. DIMSDALE said, he thought it was impossible to consider the clauses of a Bill of this importance at so late an hour. He should therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Dinedale.)

The House divided:—Ayes 36; Noes 92: Majority 56.

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. KNIGHT, believing that the Local Government Bill of last year had proved a curse instead of a blessing to the country, and that the present Bill would only make matters worse, begged to move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion made, and Question, "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Knight,)—put, and negatived.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEAUCH appealed to his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Adderley) not to press the Bill further. It was ridiculous to go into Committee at 1 o'clock, especially as every clause of it would be objected to.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he would consent to reporting Progress so soon as the Preamble was postponed.

Original Question put, and agreed to: Bill considered in Committee.

Committee report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will, upon Friday next, again resolve itself into the said Committee."

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "Friday," in order to insert the words "Tuesday the 12th day of August,"—(Mr. James Lowther,)—instead thereof.

Question put, "That the word 'Friday' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 24: Majority 50.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That this House will, upon Friday next, again resolve itself into the said Committee.

HABITUAL DRUNKARDS BILL.—[BILL 11.]

(Mr. Donald Dalrymple, Mr. Gordon, Mr. Akroyd, Mr. Clare Read, Mr. Miller, Mr. Downing.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. D. DALRYMPLE, in moving that the Order for the Second Reading be discharged, said, he hoped that when he brought forward the measure next Session he might obtain some assistance from the Government.

MR. BRUCE regretted that his hon. Friend was unable to proceed with the Bill this Session, but was pleased to find that it was his intention to re-introduce it next Session. All the evidence proved there was a real want to be supplied; but of the machinery for supplying it he could not as yet express an opinion.

Order discharged; Bill withdrawn.

House adjourned at half after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 9th July, 1873.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Exchequer Bonds (£1,800,000) * [280].

Second Reading—Sale of Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) [52], put off; Municipal Boroughs Extension [48], negatived; General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Acts Amendment* [200]; Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland)* [187]; Revising Barristers* [221].

Committee—Burials [9] debate adjourned.

Committee—Report—Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (Nos. 4, 5, and 6)* [208, 209, 210]; Local Government Provisional Orders (Nos. 4 and 5) * [211, 212]; Married Women's Property Act (1870) Amendment (No. 2)* [24].

Third Reading—Tramways Provisional Orders Confirmation* [218], and passed.

Withdrawn—Land Rights and Conveyancing (Scotland)* [112].

SALE OF LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (IRELAND BILL).—[BILL 52.]

(Sir Dominic Corrigan, Mr. Pim, Mr. O'Neill, Viscount Crichton, Mr. McClure, Mr. William Johnston, Lord Claud Hamilton, Mr. Beest.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR DOMINIC CORRIGAN, in rising to move That the Bill be now read the second time, said: I do so with every hope of success, for we have advanced so far that in the Licensing Bill of last year the principle has been recognized that the drinking of intoxicating liquors on Sunday is attended with more injury to the people than on week days, and therefore the hours allowed for drinking on Sundays were curtailed under that Bill. This is a great point for us who advocate the complete closing of public-houses during the whole, not a part of the Sunday. It is admitted on all sides that much good has been done by the partial closing of public-houses on Sunday; let us now complete the good work by closing them through the whole of the day. I know it is argued that as we have done so much good we ought to be content with it; we ought to "leave well enough alone;" but I cannot, Sir, assent to that principle; we do not apply it to the commonest affairs of life; we do not apply it to mechanics; we are never content that in mechanics we have attained a certain amount of efficiency, and that we should then be content with the progress we have already made. Are we to be content with the progress we have made in morals, and not try to better ourselves or our people? Surely there is no need to answer the question. Much good has been achieved by the partial closing of houses for the sale of whisky throughout all Ireland on Sunday; much greater good will be done by their total closing; and let us now do it. If we have now only 75 drunkards by the partial closing of the public-houses, where we had previously 100, let us go on in the same course, and we shall have only 25 drunkards, where we had previously 100. I think we can attain that if we adopt this Bill. I do not expect that we can altogether obliterate drunkenness by it, but we can, I think, obliterate it, or nearly so, on Sundays in Ireland. On other days men in Ireland are scattered through the country at their farm, and other labours. They cannot and will not leave them to go half a mile into a town for whisky. But Sunday comes round. It is their <sup>only</sup> day of recreation. They assemble at the public-houses; they are exposed to all the temptations and bad example around them. They drink in rounds—that is, each of the party treats his companions in turn. Then comes waste of wages, the madness of drunkenness, the awaking of bad passions, assaults, and murder. In the last sessions in an Irish county—Clare—only last month—June—the Chairman said the calendar was a disgrace to Ireland. “It contained a larger amount of savage assaults than on any previous occasion,” and these assaults he attributed in nine cases out of ten to drink, and Sunday is the day in Ireland when these terrible temptations most abound. Mr. Blake, J.P., County Kilkenny, writes this month—July, 1873—

“Nearly all the cases before us at petty sessions are drunkenness or fighting therefrom, and the greater number are from drinking on Sunday.”

Twelve months have elapsed since I last brought this question before the House. I was then beaten by a majority of 33. For the sake of our people give me a majority the other way to-night. I do not want to interfere with England—give us what they have in Scotland. For 20 years the public-houses have been closed by law in Scotland. During that whole time there has not been—I am told by a Scottish Member who sits on my right—a single Petition to repeal the law, to re-open the public-houses in Scotland. We were once similarly circumstanced in Ireland. Up to the year 1833 our public-houses were all closed in Ireland, as they are now closed in Scotland. I appeal now to English Members. If drunkenness—and particularly Sunday drunkenness, with its train of vice, fighting, and murder—has become a national disgrace in Ireland, who inflicted it on us? Not an Irish, but an English Parliament. A year had not elapsed after 1833 when the Corporation of Dublin prayed that you would repeal the law and again close the public-houses on Sunday. Retrace your steps now, and give us the boon you have given to Scotland. A year has passed over since I last addressed the House on this subject, and how does public opinion now speak? The first Petition on my list to day for the total closing of public-houses on Sunday is from 215 deputy lieutenants and magistrates. The second is from eight Archbishops and Bishops, and from other dignitaries of the Catholic Church. The third is from the clergymen of the Catholic Church in Dublin and its vicinity, headed by Cardinal Cullen, whose name stands first on the list. The fourth is from eight Bishops and other dignitaries of the Protestant Church of Ireland, and the fifth is from the clergy of the Protestant Church in Dublin and its vicinity. Yesterday I presented several Petitions from the Presbyterian and other denominations from various parts of Ireland, all praying for the same—close up public-houses on Sundays. As nearly as I can calculate, in addition to the multitude of Petitions presented in the last Session, there have been presented this Session, up to the present, not less than 60 Petitions with at least 3,000 or 4,000 signatures, exclusive of many officially signed, each of which has, of course, only one signature. And now let me turn to tell the House after another year’s trial and consideration of the question, how many Petitions from Ireland have been presented to keep open public-houses on Sunday—not one. I inspected the Report of the Committee of this House on Petitions yesterday, and on its Paper not a single Petition is recorded against the Bill. You will perhaps hear something in the course of this debate as to the hardships inflicted on the working men of their going to their houses of worship and coming from them not being able to get whisky to “keep their devotion warm on their return home.” But have the working men of Ireland appealed to this House to keep open public-houses on Sunday? Not a single

Petition has been presented from them; not a single meeting of them has been held to object to this Bill. Workmen's clubs are now established in Dublin and are being established in other towns through Ireland. Most warmly do I wish them success. They are conducted by most intelligent men. Has a single Petition emanated from any one of those clubs? Not one. Who are to be benefited, I may here ask, by keeping public-houses open on Sunday? Not those who drink whisky, for they ruin their health and beggar their families, and fall into crime. Not the licensed vintners and spirit grocers who keep their houses open, for the Sunday drinker soon becomes incapable of earning wages, and the profit of the sale is gone, and the licensed retailer of spirit and grocery who would hope to continue in receipt of money from the Sunday drunkard will be as much disappointed as the man in the fable who killed the goose to get all the golden eggs at once. There is only one Department of the State that can derive benefit from the continuance of selling whisky in Ireland on Sunday, and that is the "Excise," but of that I will only say that there exists not, and never will exist, in any Government or in the United Kingdom a single individual who would ever allow such a thought—a consideration to enter his mind. I will not take up the time of the House with the nonsense that is occasionally put forward on the subject that persons going on country excursions on Sunday cannot take recreation without the opportunity of purchasing whisky as refreshment. Those who are led into drinking on Sunday in Ireland are not those who go into the country for fresh air and exercise, but those who turn their steps from fresh air and country walks into unhealthy towns to fall into bad company and intoxication and crime. One word more as to the supposed necessity of whisky drinking on Sunday as refreshment. In the Bay of Dublin there are from 50 to 60 trawlers, each with a crew of five men and a boy, and 200 or 300 herring boats with similar crews. And what is their rule? They do not allow any intoxicating liquor on board, although they are out for several days or a week each time, at hard labour and exposed to rough weather, and if they can bear so many days continuously without whisky, surely the well-fed excursionist may pass one day without the opportunity of buying whisky; and, moreover, the Bill now before us does not prevent excursionists carrying with them as much whisky as they like. Some who call themselves philosophers, and deal with abstract platitudes, would denounce the Bill and its provisions as interfering with the liberty of the subject. Every law is an interference with individual liberty, and so we need not, I think, dwell on that objection. It is again objected to as "class legislation," and the rich man's private club has been denounced and contrasted with the poor man's public-house. I went so fully into an exposure of the fallacy of comparing "club-house" and "public-house" together in my observations on the Bill of last year, that I do not think it necessary to repeat them now. Another objection made to the Bill is that if it pass into law, and that the ordinary houses for the sale of whisky be shut up, it will increase "illicit drinking." The reply to that may be very short. There are several districts in Ireland in which voluntary closing for the whole of Sunday has taken place, and the evidence of the Catholic Bishops and clergy is that this result has not occurred; indeed, it is manifest that it has not occurred, for the towns in which the voluntary closing has taken place are described as most orderly in the evenings, whereas before they were scenes of riot and disorder. This improved order could not exist if illicit drinking had increased. Its bad fruits could not be concealed in the shades of night. Moreover, if this Bill pass, the honest trader, the police, and the constabulary will all be combined against the illicit dealer, and he must cease his mischievous trade. I will only trespass now on the House with a few short extracts from authorities who command our respect on the question, and they are all written within the last month or two months. The Most Rev. Dr. Furlong, Bishop of Ferns, writes this month from Wexford—

"I am happy to inform you that the Sunday closing observance, inaugurated in the Diocese of Ferns 17 years ago, has been productive of the happiest results. We have no longer to deplore those frequent scenes of riot and disorder, which formerly it was so painful to witness. The County Wexford presents on Sundays those features of quiet and repose, and exemption from all disturbance, so well suited to a day specially devoted to the divine worship."

Sir Dominic Corrigan

G. J. Barry, Esq., J.P., Kilmallock, County Tipperary, writes as follows last month:—

"A portion of this 'petty sessions' district being in the diocese of Emily, the 'Sunday temperance law' is in force. No drink can be had on Sundays, consequently there is a complete absence of fighting and drunkenness; but from that portion of the district where the Sunday closing is not observed, drunken cases, riots, fighting, &c., crop up pretty abundantly at petty sessions. I find a pretty general feeling in favour of Sunday closing, even among the publicans. The latter don't complain of any hardship where this 'Sunday temperance law' is in force, and decidedly the public have no reason to complain, as the gain is altogether on their side."

R. J. Hamilton, Esq., J.P., County Tyrone, writes thus, also last month—

"It would be a great blessing to this country if the public-houses were closed. I cannot tell you the amount of drink that is sold in Dromore, near me, on Sundays; and it is a disgrace to this neighbourhood to see so many people coming home scarcely able to walk from the effects of intoxicating drink. Most of the drunken cases brought to Firlick Bench by the constabulary happen on Sundays."

Mr. Fitzmaurice, J.P., says—

"Having been nearly 30 years in the Commission of the Peace, I can confidently state that most of the crime committed in our district has arisen from Sunday drunkenness and intoxication."

Mr. Rolleston, D.L., J.P., County Tipperary, writes as follows:—

"I was opposed to this (closing public-houses on Sundays) movement, but I have heard so much of the beneficial effects of Sunday closing in the Roman Catholic archdiocese of Cashel, promoted by the Archbishop, I am now as much in favour of it as I was opposed to it."

Mr. Hale, J.P., County Sligo, writes that he

"Believe that a great deal of crime is caused, and a great many poor families driven to ruin and the poor-house by Sunday drinking. By all means let us have public-houses closed on Sunday. It will be a blessing to Ireland."

Mr. Disney, J.P., Curragh Camp, writes that—

"The restrictions of the hours for the sale of intoxicating drinks has materially improved the morals of the people in this locality; nevertheless, nothing but the entire cessation of the liquor traffic on Sundays will obtain the requisite decorum."

I will now leave the matter in the hands of the House. I wish it had fallen into the hands of an abler advocate. That could have easily happened, but it could not have fallen into the hands of one who has seen more of the sad effects of intemperance than I have, and who well knows that among the agencies that perpetuate the vice of intemperance, there is not one that is more fruitful in all the evils that follow habits of intemperance with all their bad consequences than "Sunday drinking in Ireland."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Dominic Corrigan.)

MR. CALLAN, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, said, he did so neither as an advocate of the licensed vintners nor because he was in favour of the unrestricted sale of intoxicating liquors on Sundays. He opposed the Bill on principle, because he disliked all such compulsory prohibitive legislation, and believed that the passing of such a Bill would lead to the creation of evils of much greater magnitude—in the shape of "shebeens" and irregular houses—than those which the promoters of the Bill professed it was intended to remedy. He hoped that the House would deal summarily with the Bill, and that by its prompt rejection they would show that Parliament disapproved of those irritating discussions, which could not by any possibility have any practical or beneficial result. He denied, from his own personal knowledge, that there was that unanimity in favour of the measure which the hon. Baronet alleged, and asserted that it was only a small and active minority who were in favour of Sunday closing. He pointed out that a Bill for regulating the sale of fermented and distilled liquors by retail on Sundays in Ireland, which was prepared and brought in by the hon. and gallant Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly), the noble Lord the Member for Monaghan (Lord Cremorne), and the senior Member for Dublin (Mr. Pim), read a first time and ordered to be printed on the 18th of February 1868, extended the prohibition of the sale of liquors to be consumed on the premises to the entire of Sunday, but permitted their sale for consumption off the premises from 2 o'clock to 4 o'clock, and from 8 o'clock to 9 o'clock, and by eating-house keepers to their customers at meals. After considerable discussion that Bill was referred to a Select Committee consisting of 15

Members—1 English, 1 Scotch, and 13 Irish Members, all still Members of the House, with the exception of Mr. Pollard-Urquhart, Mr. Leader, and the noble Lord the late Governor-General of India, the then Chief Secretary for Ireland. The Committee sat 13 days, extending over a period of more than two months, examined 22 witnesses, representing almost every class and district in Ireland, and their unanimous Report and recommendations appeared in the shape of the Bill "as amended by the Select Committee," brought in by the same hon. Members, on the 26th of May of the same year, which merely restricted the hours for sale of liquors, whether drunk on or off the premises, from 2 o'clock to 7 o'clock in rural districts, and from 2 to 9 o'clock in cities and towns of over 5,000 inhabitants, giving power to the magistrates in petty sessions to licence hotels in rural districts to remain open to 9 o'clock, and power to local boards to restrict the hours in towns of over 5,000 inhabitants to the hours fixed for rural districts. The Bill was not persevered with, but was re-introduced in 1869, and withdrawn on the representation that the subject would be dealt with by the Government Bill when introduced; that promise was fully redeemed last Session when those restrictions, recommended by and embodied in the Bill of the Select Committee, were adopted and enacted by the Bill of last Session. He asked what case had been made out to justify an interference with the existing Act, which he asserted had been found to work satisfactorily, or what evidence had been brought forward to displace that given before the Select Committee? The hon. Baronet had produced no evidence as to the necessity of the Bill. He had quoted the opinions of private individuals in favour of the movement, but he had produced no Report or statement in support of his views from the magistrates or the police, who were responsible for the good order and government of the country, and the accuracy of which could be tested. On referring to the evidence taken by the Select Committee of 1868, he found that all those who had the largest experience of the working of the Acts regulating the liquor traffic were opposed to the total closing of public-houses on Sundays. What said Mr. O'Ferrall, the Chief Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, Dublin, speaking from large experience?—that "total closing on Sundays would not be desirable." Inspector Corr—well known, he was sure, to the junior Member for Dublin, as he was to many hon. Members of the House, as one of the ablest and most experienced officers in the force—gave strong evidence against total closing or absolute prohibition; as did also probably the best known police magistrate in Ireland, Mr. Frank Thorpe Porter, for upwards of 20 years the chief divisional magistrate in Dublin. The Mayor of Cork considered that "it would be utterly impossible to stop the sale of intoxicating drink on Sundays," and considered that "the people, while in favour of increased restriction, were totally opposed to entire prohibition;" and Canon McCabe, one of the most able and eminent dignitaries of the Catholic Church in Dublin, while most favourable to temperance and increased restrictions, "could not recommend total closing on Sundays." The hon. Baronet referred to Scotland, and to the encouraging results there of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act. He (Mr. Callan) knew very little of Scotland, but if there was no drunkenness and gross immorality in the lower quarters of the large towns of Scotland on Sundays, then all he could say was that they were the most maligned and calumniated people on the face of the earth. If the feeling in favour of closing public-houses on Sunday in Ireland was so universal as alleged, why not leave the matter to the spontaneous action of the people and lend their aid to the clergy in their effort to promote amongst and by the people a voluntary temperance law, which they would observe with fidelity? He objected to the Bill as "class legislation" which would press vexatiously on the artizan and labourer, and leave untouched the "club of the rich man," where the hon. Baronet and other supporters of the Bill could indulge in their "sherry and seltzer," whilst the poor man who came out for a breath of fresh air after working all the week could not get a "drop of drink"—even a glass of beer. He had often wondered at the remarkable absence of the name of the hon. Baronet from the division lists on the many Coercion Bills for Ireland; but perhaps the present Bill afforded the explanation that the hon. Baronet was in favour of restrictive and coercive measures for his country. If his recollection did not fail him, the hon. Baronet in one of his canvassing harangues, spoke pathetically of the injustice and hardship of a law which would restrict the people of Ireland from being allowed to have and enjoy their glass of whisky or beer on the Sunday. Yet the hon. Baronet now wished the House of Commons to pass a Bill which would impose restrictions on the people, and debar them from obtaining on the Sunday that which was necessary for them. He (Mr. Callan) thought they had quite enough of restrictions in Ireland, without the hon. Baronet coming forward to aid in imposing further restrictions on its people. He recollects that one of the most eloquent speeches that had been made against closing public-houses on Sundays was made by the hon. Baronet. [Sir DOMINIC CORRIGAN: No, no; that is quite a mistake.] He thought, as he said before, in referring to it, that he remembered the hon. Baronet saying that if he landed at Kingstown on a Sunday from his yacht, he might go to his club or to an hotel and have a glass of sherry and seltzer-water, or a "brandy and soda," and that it would be a hardship that his boatmen, who might be wet through and exhausted by their exertions, could not get even a glass of "grog" at a public-house. The hon. Baronet seemed to sneer at those Members who had expressed their sympathy for the working men, and said they were a class of persons whom he did not trust. Very probably the mistrust was mutual, and he (Mr. Callan) should be surprised if the working men of Dublin did not at the coming General Election show in a very marked manner their mistrust of the hon. Member. The hon. Baronet had asked by what authority the opponents of his Bill spoke on behalf of the working men of Ireland, and called upon them to show their "credentials." Well, he (Mr. Callan) required no credentials of the kind. In every movement having for its object the advancement of, or the interest of, the working man, he had, in the county to which he belonged, taken his part, and on their behalf and in their name he objected to this most vexatious Bill. He could not understand why the hon. Baronet persisted with it unless, indeed, he wished to leave it as a parting bequest to his constituents on his leave-taking, now on the eve of a dissolution. If the hon. Baronet introduced a Bill of a permissive nature, giving the power of closing public-houses on the Sunday to a substantial majority of the inhabitants of the district, say three-fourths or four-fifths, he would support it on principle, as a logical sequence to the demand of the people for Home Rule, and also because such a power, whilst it would never be exercised against respectable and properly conducted houses, would act as a salutary check and deterrent on parties otherwise disposed. The reason why Sunday closing had succeeded so well in the dioceses of Cashel and Ferns was because it was done with the concurrence of the people. And he could confidently assert that such an arbitrary Bill as the one before the House would never meet with the concurrence of the people, but on the contrary would act as a repellent and seriously injure, rather than serve, the voluntary movement in those districts. Before sitting down, he must express his surprise at the character given to the people of Dublin and suburbs by their Representative. If he (Mr. Callan) were a stranger, he would, after hearing the hon. Baronet, leave the House under the impression that the principal Sunday characteristics of the hon. Baronet's constituents was drunkenness and disorderly "rowdyism." Well, he could, from personal knowledge, assure the House that the people of Dublin, the artizans and working classes, were most exemplary—creditable alike to themselves and their country. Such a Bill as this could not work without the consent of the people, and no evidence had been produced to the House by the hon. Baronet to show that the people of Ireland had consented to accept the measure, therefore he felt justified in moving its rejection.

MR. J. LOWTHER ventured to second the Amendment at the risk of incurring the censure of the hon. Baronet, who said he could not approve the gratuitous champions of the working men in this matter. He (Mr. Lowther) strongly objected to the view of some supporters of the measure, that it should be passed because bodies of persons outside were loud in their advocacy of it; and he could not understand why in a matter of that nature, the working classes of Ireland should be legislated for in an exceptional manner. He regarded the individual opinion of Members of Parliament, as opposed to the moving impulse of the mere delegate, as an element of Parliamentary government which should be jealously guarded. Nothing could be more harmful to the influence of the House than the propagation of an opinion, that no one should be listened to unless he could prove for the occasion that he was the delegate of others outside. That would be destructive of the very essence of Parliamentary government. But after all, what was the hon. Baronet but a gratuitous champion in this matter—the amicus curiae of those whose views he advocated? He could not, however, but recollect that the hon. Baronet had been a party to the Licensing Act of last Session, and therefore he could not understand why he should come down to that House, in the second week in July, and ask them to disturb that arrangement, which, whatever might be its defects, or whatever might be its merits, had been generally accepted as no unfair settlement of the question. The hon. Baronet, who had very much overstated his case, must be fully aware that that was a question on which considerable difference of opinion existed. He was, he was bound to confess, much struck at the success of the hon. Baronet in getting a House together; but, at the same time, he would venture to observe that if a vote of the House were now taken on the Bill, it would represent rather the opinion of Irish Members than the pronounced decision of the Imperial Legislature. Great stress had been laid upon the fact that Petitions numerously signed had been presented in favour of the Bill; but they all knew how Petitions of that kind were got up, and therefore he attached no importance to them. The hon. Baronet had, however, urged another and a better argument in favour of his Bill. He had told the House that all the rows and riots in Ireland, nay, he went further and included sedition, were to be traced to the use of whisky-punch in public-houses on Sundays. Now, if the hon. Baronet could assure the House that Ireland would become quiet, peaceful, and loyal, if the Bill were passed, he (Mr. Lowther), although he differed from it in principle, would be inclined to support it. That, indeed, would be a strong case made out in its favour, and the measure itself would be an agreeable substitute for Coercion Acts and Arms Acts and for Acts suspending the constitutional privileges of the subject. Still the Bill would only provide an immunity from outrage and disloyalty on one day out of seven, so that his statistics and facts went beyond the scope of his Bill. Then as regarded the settlement of last year, he (Mr. Lowther) was not going to say that it was to be considered a final one; but he would say that the hon. Baronet had not made out any case for disturbing that settlement in a way which would only apply to Ireland. He objected to such piecemeal dealing with a particular subject, and thought it better than have three Acts dealing with the same subject, they should be all consolidated in a sense which would render the application of the combined Act universal throughout the United Kingdom. He hoped that when they did come to amend the Licensing Act, the measure would be framed in a considerate spirit, and made capable of universal application.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Callan.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON supported the Bill. There was, he said, a growing feeling in favour of it throughout the county which he had represented for the last thirty-eight years, and his experience led him to believe that it would be acceptable to the working classes of Ireland. That feeling was evident from the number of Petitions presented in favour of the Bill signed by the clergy and laity of all denominations. They bore testimony that drunkenness was the curse of the Irish peasantry,—and that by preventing it, they would go far to alleviate the evils of Ireland. There was no question whatever, that the greater the facilities for obtaining drink, the more the prisons were filled. Anyone who doubted what would be the result of passing this measure, he would refer to the evidence taken before Mr. O'Reilly's Committee, where he would see how wide-spread had been the blessing attending the Christian and pa-trictive efforts of one Roman Catholic Prelate, who had got the publicans within his diocese to close their houses upon the Sabbath day. Again, he would mention that in the first year after Forbes-Mackenzie's Act came into operation in Scotland, crime and outrage abated; and that in the City of Glasgow a vote of £12,000 for the enlargement of the prison, made by the municipality the year before, was declared unnecessary. It had, however, been stated that the closing of the public-houses drove the people into illicit houses, and that there was a great deal of clandestine drunkenness. So persistently had that been stated that a Royal Commission, presided over by Sir George Clerk, had been appointed to inquire into it, and their Report gave it a full contradiction.

MR. BRUEN said, the Bill proposed that there should be a total stoppage of the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sundays. Now, he did not deny the extreme value to society of checking intemperance, but there was some danger in attempting to do so—they would deprive some men of their fair and just rights. The human frame was so constituted that men got hungry and thirsty on Sundays as well as other days, and he therefore thought it extremely unfair to tell the labouring man who took one glass of beer upon Sunday, that he would no longer be permitted to do so because his neighbour took ten. Again, under this Bill a bond fide traveller was defined to be a man five miles away from home. Now that was too short a distance where they had a railway, and it was too long a distance where a man was making a journey on foot. The effect of it in Dublin would be to turn all the Sunday drunkenness of that city loose upon Kingstown, which was more than five miles distant. He could not deny the great evils that arose in Ireland from habits of intemperance, particularly as regarded Sunday drinking; but he did not think that such an extreme measure as that proposed was necessary to meet those evils, whilst it was likely to interfere with the convenience and legitimate wants of many persons. They ought, if possible, to prevent the intemperance of those who indulged in excesses in such a way as not to interfere with the moderate and perhaps necessary use of certain refreshments to the thirsty or weary traveller. The great majority of people believed that the moderate use of spirituous and fermented drinks was both healthful and beneficial, and it was an opinion founded upon common sense, and therefore he did not see the necessity for bringing in a Bill to prevent men supplying what was a natural want. If they wished to be consistent they would have to extend the prohibition to all classes of the community, and then they would have in Ireland an agitation as extreme as that which took place in this country some years ago on the occasion of Lord Robert Grosvenor's Bill. These were reasons which induced him to hesitate before giving his support to this Bill. As to the opinions of the working classes on the subject, he was bound to say that although he presented a Petition from a large number of his constituents last year in favour of the Bill he had not been asked to present one either for or against the measure in the present Session. Under such circumstances, he thought he was justified in supposing that his constituents were still favourable to the object of the Bill. He should therefore vote for the second reading, being willing to give the Bill a trial as an experiment, and believing that a large number of the working classes desired it. At the same time, in case it should prove to be inconvenient to a majority of the people, he reserved to himself the right to move for its repeal on some future occasion.

MR. PIM said, he advocated this measure in the interests of the large number of persons—men, women and children—who were employed in the public-houses in Ireland. He had obtained a Return last Session, which showed that there were in Ireland more than 18,000 houses licensed for the retail sale of spirits or beer, and he thought it was not too high an estimate if he assumed that the attendants and servants in these 18,000 houses were at least 50,000. These persons, many of whom were under 18 years of age, were employed in Dublin from 7 o'clock in the morning until 11 o'clock at night, during six days of the week, and from 2 o'clock to 9 o'clock on Sundays, making in all 103 hours of weekly toil, while factory hands worked for only 60 hours, and were now seeking a reduction to 54 hours a-week. Parliament had legislated as respected factories and mines and workshops, and he (Mr. Pim) thought of that nature, the working classes of Ireland should be legislated for in an exceptional manner. He regarded the individual opinion of Members of Parliament, as opposed to the moving impulse of the mere delegate, as an element of Parliamentary government which should be jealously guarded. Nothing could be more harmful to the influence of the House than the propagation of an opinion, that no one should be listened to unless he could prove for the occasion that he was the delegate of others outside. That would be destructive of the very essence of Parliamentary government. But after all, what was the hon. Baronet but a gratuitous champion in this matter—the amious curis of those whose views he advocated? He could not, however, but recollect that the hon. Baronet had been a party to the Licensing Act of last Session, and therefore he could not understand why he should come down to that House, in the second week in July, and ask them to disturb that arrangement, which, whatever might be its defects, or whatever might be its merits, had been generally accepted as no unfair settlement of the question. The hon. Baronet, who had very much overstated his case, must be fully aware that that was a question on which considerable difference of opinion existed. He was, he was bound to confess, much struck at the success of the hon. Baronet in getting a House together; but, at the same time, he would venture to observe that if a vote of the House were now taken on the Bill, it would represent rather the opinion of Irish Members than the pronounced decision of the Imperial Legislature. Great stress had been laid upon the fact that Petitions numerously signed had been presented in favour of the Bill; but they all knew how Petitions of that kind were got up, and therefore he attached no importance to them. The hon. Baronet had, however, urged another and a better argument in favour of his Bill. He had told the House that all the rows and riots in Ireland, nay, he went further and included sedition, were to be traced to the use of whisky-punch in public-houses on Sundays. Now, if the hon. Baronet could assure the House that Ireland would become quiet, peaceful, and loyal, if the Bill were passed, he (Mr. Lowther), although he differed from it in principle, would be inclined to support it. That, indeed, would be a strong case made out in its favour, and the measure itself would be an agreeable substitute for Coercion Acts and Arms Acts and for Acts suspending the constitutional privileges of the subject. Still the Bill would only provide an immunity from outrage and disloyalty on one day out of seven, so that his statistics and facts went beyond the scope of his Bill. Then as regarded the settlement of last year, he (Mr. Lowther) was not going to say that it was to be considered a final one; but he would say that the hon. Baronet had not made out any case for disturbing that settlement in a way which would only apply to Ireland. He objected to such piecemeal dealing with a particular subject, and thought it better than have three Acts dealing with the same subject, they should be all consolidated in a sense which would render the application of the combined Act universal throughout the United Kingdom. He hoped that when they did come to amend the Licensing Act, the measure would be framed in a considerate spirit, and made capable of universal application.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Cullan.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON supported the Bill. There was, he said, a growing feeling in favour of it throughout the county which he had represented for the last thirty-eight years, and his experience led him to believe that it would be acceptable to the working classes of Ireland. That feeling was evident from the number of Petitions presented in favour of the Bill signed by the clergy and laity of all denominations. They bore testimony that drunkenness was the curse of the Irish peasantry,—and that by preventing it, they would go far to alleviate the evils of Ireland. There was no question whatever, that the greater the facilities for obtaining drink, the more the prisons were filled. Anyone who doubted what would be the result of passing this measure, he would refer to the evidence taken before Mr. O'Reilly's Committee, where he would see how wide-spread had been the blessing attending the Christian and pa-strict efforts of one Roman Catholic Prelate, who had got the publicans within his diocese to close their houses upon the Sabbath day. Again, he would mention that in the first year after Forbes-Mackenzie's Act came into operation in Scotland, crime and outrage abated, and that in the City of Glasgow a vote of £12,000 for the enlargement of the prison, made by the municipality the year before, was declared unnecessary. It had, however, been stated that the closing of the public-houses drove the people into illicit houses, and that there was a great deal of clandestine drunkenness. So persistently had that been stated that a Royal Commission, presided over by Sir George Clerk, had been appointed to inquire into it, and their Report gave it a full contradiction.

MR. BRUEN said, the Bill proposed that there should be a total stoppage of the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sundays. Now, he did not deny the extreme value to society of checking intemperance, but there was some danger in attempting to do so—they would deprive some men of their fair and just rights. The human frame was so constituted that men got hungry and thirsty on Sundays as well as other days, and he therefore thought it extremely unfair to tell the labouring man who took one glass of beer upon Sunday, that he would no longer be permitted to do so because his neighbour took ten. Again, under this Bill a bond fide traveller was defined to be a man five miles away from home. Now that was too short a distance where they had a railway, and it was too long a distance where a man was making a journey on foot. The effect of it in Dublin would be to turn all the Sunday drunkenness of that city loose upon Kingstown, which was more than five miles distant. He could not deny the great evils that arose in Ireland from habits of intemperance, particularly as regarded Sunday drinking; but he did not think that such an extreme measure as that proposed was necessary to meet those evils, whilst it was likely to interfere with the convenience and legitimate wants of many persons. They ought, if possible, to prevent the intemperance of those who indulged in excesses in such a way as not to interfere with the moderate and perhaps necessary use of certain refreshments to the thirsty or weary traveller. The great majority of people believed that the moderate use of spirituous and fermented drinks was both healthful and beneficial, and it was an opinion founded upon common sense, and therefore he did not see the necessity for bringing in a Bill to prevent men supplying what was a natural want. If they wished to be consistent they would have to extend the prohibition to all classes of the community, and then they would have in Ireland an agitation as extreme as that which took place in this country some years ago on the occasion of Lord Robert Grosvenor's Bill. These were reasons which induced him to hesitate before giving his support to this Bill. As to the opinions of the working classes on the subject, he was bound to say that although he presented a Petition from a large number of his constituents last year in favour of the Bill he had not been asked to present one either for or against the measure in the present Session. Under such circumstances, he thought he was justified in supposing that his constituents were still favourable to the object of the Bill. He should therefore vote for the second reading, being willing to give the Bill a trial as an experiment, and believing that a large number of the working classes desired it. At the same time, in case it should prove to be inconvenient to a majority of the people, he reserved to himself the right to move for its repeal on some future occasion.

MR. PIM said, he advocated this measure in the interests of the large number of persons—men, women and children—who were employed in the public-houses in Ireland. He had obtained a Return last Session, which showed that there were in Ireland more than 18,000 houses licensed for the retail sale of spirits or beer, and he thought it was not too high an estimate if he assumed that the attendants and servants in these 18,000 houses were at least 50,000. These persons, many of whom were under 18 years of age, were employed in Dublin from 7 o'clock in the morning until 11 o'clock at night, during six days of the week, and from 2 o'clock to 9 o'clock on Sundays, making in all 103 hours of weekly toil, while factory hands worked for only 60 hours, and were now seeking a reduction to 54 hours a-week. Parliament had legislated as respected factories and mines and workshops, and he (Mr. Pim) thought that similar care ought to be given to the case of those who were employed in public-houses. These young men and young women and boys were kept for 103 hours in Dublin and other large towns, and for 95 hours in country places, serving out beer and whisky, and on their account he asked for at least one day in the week as a holiday—a day of rest from toil, of religious observance and of rational and healthful recreation. The employment might not be very laborious, but it was continuous, and the time occupied was long. They were, moreover, exposed to the handling, and sight, and smell of that which was a strong temptation, and their very fatigue increased the inducement to indulge in it. He would himself wish to go farther, and to prevent anyone under 21 years of age from being employed in a public-house for more than 10 hours on any day; but the closing of public-houses on Sundays would do something in this direction. The loss of the Sunday trade would have important compensations for the owners of public-houses. They would save the Sunday expenses, which were considerable, and they and their families would enjoy a weekly holiday, which many of them never had now. He knew that many of the most respectable vintners would gladly close their shops on Sundays, if their neighbours in the same trade would close their shops also; but while others kept open they thought they must do the same or that they would lose their week-day customers. In the year 1867 he had presented a Petition to the House signed by 285 spirit grocers and vintners, praying for the closing of public-houses on Sundays, and he had no doubt that very many others would support closing on Sundays but that they feared that illicit trade would be carried on, and that drink would be sold notwithstanding the legal prohibition. No doubt it was impossible wholly to prevent the illicit sale of strong drink. Our laws and punishments did not wholly prevent robbery and other crimes. But he thought the police ought to be able to secure the practical observance of the law, and the Act of last year had given them much greater facilities for doing so. If the shutting up of the public houses lessened drunkenness, the police would have more time to devote to this object.

For whose benefit, he would ask, were the public-houses to be kept open on Sundays? It was said to be for the benefit of the working classes; but if this were so, it was strange that there were no Petitions from the working classes against the present Bill. Almost all the Petitions forwarded to the House were in its favour. He maintained that the working classes in Ireland were favourable to Sunday closing; and he would refer to one fact in proof of his assertion. In the spring of last year a meeting was held in the City of Dublin—he was not sure whether in favour of the Permissive Bill or of Sunday closing—at which a person presented himself, claiming to speak for the artizans and tradesmen of Dublin, and stating that it would be unfair to them to close the public-houses on Sunday. The result of the declaration so made was that a meeting of the artizans and working men was held in the large room at the Mechanics' Institute. He (Mr. Pim) was informed that the room was crowded—more than 1,000 persons being present, and the meeting very enthusiastic. The resolutions were almost unanimously adopted, and a Petition signed by the chairman was presented to this House, praying that the Bill for closing public-houses on Sunday might become law. This was the only meeting of working men which he was aware of having been called to express an opinion on the subject; but he challenged the opposers of the measure to get up such meetings in Dublin and elsewhere, and thus ascertain what the wishes of the working men really were. Let meetings of working men be held, not under the influence of those who were opposed to Sunday closing, nor of those who were its advocates, but meetings impartially conducted and free from constraint, and the decision of these meetings, whether for or against the proposed measure, would have great influence, and would go far to decide the course which ought to be pursued. There were difficulties in the way of closing public-houses on Sunday in England which did not exist in Ireland. In England, beer was an article of diet—it was consumed by almost every family at dinner; but it was not so in Ireland. Very few of the artizan class in Ireland used beer at their meals, and therefore they would not be inconvenienced in this respect by the public-houses being closed on Sundays. The trade was a dangerous one for all who were concerned in it. It exposed them to a great, a most seductive temptation, and many fell victims to it. The long hours and continuous work increased the danger. He would appeal to the owners of public-houses themselves whether this was not true. Would any man in the trade bring up his children as attendants in a public-house, if he could possibly avoid it? If the trade must be carried on, we ought to try to reduce its danger to a minimum. He believed it would be a great blessing to those engaged in the trade, as well as to their families and servants, to get at least one day in the week free. He would be glad if it were possible to prevent any young persons from being employed in a public-house. Men might withstand the temptation, even with the constant sight and smell and taste, but it must act fearfully on the young. Pass this Bill, give them one day of freedom in each week—one day for innocent and healthful enjoyment in common with the other classes of the community, and they would have done something to strengthen them against the temptations of the other six. He was convinced that the proposed measure was fully justified by public opinion in Ireland, and he had no doubt that if it could be submitted to an Irish Parliament it would be adopted without much hesitation. He should therefore give his cordial support to the second reading.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, there was one argument used by the hon. Baronet who moved the second reading, and repeated by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, against which he must enter his humble protest. Both hon. Gentlemen referred to the circumstance that a great number of Petitions had been presented in favour of the Bill, while none were sent in against it; and they alleged that that was a conclusive proof that the people of Ireland were in its favour. Now, so far as the Petitions in its favour went he had nothing to say; but he must protest against the conclusion arrived at that because no Petitions were sent in against it, the people of Ireland were in favour of a measure of this description. For his own part, he was personally opposed to legislation like that, and against being put down as a supporter of such restrictive regulations. Whenever the people of Ireland saw there was a probability of a Bill of the kind becoming law, then he had no doubt they would exhibit their feelings in a manner not to be mistaken. The fact was, that in conjunction with the people of England, the Irish nation were very careful in seeing that the privileges they already possessed should not be interfered with or curtailed, but, however, they could not always be petitioning in favour of what they had already obtained. It was not his intention to go into the arguments for or against the Bill, for he could add nothing to them; but he must object to the suggestion thrown out by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen). The hon. Gentleman said that it was meant as an experiment; but that was not the way to deal with important interests that would be seriously affected by its provisions. They ought to make up their minds as to what was right, and if Parliament thought the people of Ireland were in favour of some such measure, it would no doubt adopt the same course it did in the case of Scotland. In that case, it was represented that great advantage followed the adoption of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act as regarded that country; but he was informed that great differences of opinion existed as to the working of that Act in Scotland. Although the majority of Scotch Members in the House were in its favour, there was, he repeated, a great difference of opinion even among Scotchmen themselves, as to whether it promoted the cause of morality and sobriety. The circumstances of the two countries were, however, extremely different, for it was not the custom in Ireland to observe the Sunday with that degree of strictness with which it was kept by the Scotch people, who were Presbyterians; and he was by no means satisfied that any attempt to enforce the closing of public-houses on Sunday would be received in Ireland with anything like that unanimity which should justify the House in adopting such a measure. Moreover, that was not the time to proceed with the trial of another experiment of that nature. If it were to be done at all, it ought to have been proposed when the Government introduced a Bill dealing with the whole system of licensing. The opinions of the Government were clearly expressed; the Bill was debated fully in the House, and it was not then considered that public opinion in Ireland was in favour of prohibiting the sale of liquors on Sundays. If the House on that occasion differed from the promoters of the Bill, they ought to have said so. The opinion of the House was not that public-houses should be closed on Sundays, but that the hours of sale should be more restricted on Sundays than on other days both in England and in Ireland. Under that Act the trade had been regulated; much more severe penalties had been enacted for every violation of the licensing laws; the hours of sale were restricted, and the distinction between Sundays and other days of the week was rendered more marked by shortening the hours of sale on Sundays, and if the subject was again to be opened up, it must necessarily be attended with very serious evils. He knew there were hon. Members in that House who looked upon publicans as enemies of the human race, to be crushed and put down as soon as possible. He for one did not look upon them in any such light. They were a respectable class of tradesmen who supplied one of the necessities of the community; whose business that House had a right to regulate in the interests of law and order; but, giving their trade the sanction of that law, they were not at liberty to interfere with them by continual attacks like the proposing of a Bill of this description. He believed that such a course went far to justify them in assuming the aggressive attitude they had assumed. The House must be aware that their character and respectability was a matter of great public interest, and they ought not to be continually exposed to attacks on their trade and the large vested interests which were involved in it. On the part of the Government, therefore, he could not give his sanction to this Bill. His own opinion was entirely adverse to such legislation as class legislation, and as a most unnecessary interference with trade, and especially one in which a large capital was vested. If it were the prevailing opinion that public-houses should be closed on Sundays, the duty of the Legislature would be clear and distinct, and such a course ought to have been insisted upon last Session when the Licensing Bill was before the House; but until that time came and a stronger feeling prevailed in its favour than now existed, he should, on the part of the Government, give his vote against such a proceeding.

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE differed entirely from the conclusions arrived at by the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He knew that in his own district in the North of Ireland the strongest possible feeling existed in favour of closing public-houses on Sundays, and in that part of the country, the people of whatever religious denomination joined in strongly advocating every possible restriction on the consumption of spirituous liquors and the temptation to indulge in them. He did not see why something like the Forbes-Mackenzie Act should not be applied to Ireland. As an Englishman, however, he thought it was impossible to enact such a law for England, the tastes and habits of the people being so different. It must be remembered that in England beer was what might be generally termed the national beverage, but in Ireland spirits were generally drunk, and he need hardly say that in many cases, the worst consequences followed, even among otherwise well-conducted persons. No one could be better adapted for bringing forward such a Bill than the hon. Gentleman who moved the second reading, inasmuch as, belonging to the medical profession, he knew the fatal effects produced by the consumption of intoxicating liquors. Perhaps the best result of the present debate might be that some measure of a tentative nature would be introduced. The Committee of 1868 suggested a reduction of the hours during which public-houses should be permitted to remain open on Sundays, and he thought it would be well to carry out their recommendations. To close public-houses entirely was a serious step to take, as it would certainly lead to great agitation, and would have to be followed a year or so later by the modification or the repeal of the Act by which the change had been effected. He did not wish to detain the House with longer observations on the subject, which involved important questions of a philosophical nature. He was as anxious as were any of the advocates of the Bill, but he hoped his advice would be taken. If the Motion went to a division, he should support the second reading, but only in the hope that the measure would eventually take a purely remedial form.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK observed that the hon. Baronet who had just spoken founded his argument on the fact that beer was the common drink in England, while whisky was the common drink in Ireland; but the Act prohibited also the sale of beer in Ireland within the specified limits. In his opinion, legislation against the drunkard, and not against the victualler, should be the principle upon which Parliament should act. He was opposed to all coercive legislation to enforce abstinence, for if they proceeded upon that ground with what consistency could they allow their clubs to remain open? In Switzerland it was against the drunkard that they legislated; and he had seen in a tavern in that country a notice that a particular individual, therein named, was not to be served for two years, under penalties which, for a third offence, involved imprisonment. It was true that in some districts of Ireland public-houses were closed on Sundays in consequence of the influence exerted by the clergy, and there could be no objection to such a proceeding, because it was perfectly voluntary; but he was unwilling to bring about such a result by coercion, and therefore he should record his vote against the second reading of the Bill.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, he should certainly oppose the Bill unless he received the assurance that it would receive a considerable modification in Committee. He could see no reason why a man, because he happened to be poor, should not be entitled to the refreshment on a Sunday which he was accustomed to have on a week-day. He should only support the second reading of the Bill if that privilege were reserved to the poor man. As to clubs, they were very different from public-houses kept by persons whose interest it was to sell as much drink as they possibly could. In clubs, whether frequented by the rich or the poor, it was quite different, because there the interest of the persons concerned was that the place should be quietly and respectably conducted.

MR. J. MARTIN said, that in his opinion the people of Ireland were decidedly in favour of this Bill. He did not pretend to say what would be its fate in any English Parliament; but of this he was certain, that an Irish Parliament sitting at College Green would undoubtedly give effect to the public wishes by passing it into law. It was, he thought, a good measure, and had his cordial support.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, that in the year 1856 he had been a Member of the Committee of the late Mr. Berkeley, when feeling ran high in this metropolis and when a Gentleman, then a Member of the House (Mr. Dundas), had stated that such expressions of opinion could best be arrested by the "trail of a six-pounder." At that time public opinion was against the then legislation, and he had in consequence supported Mr. Berkeley. It might appear strange that he should take a different course upon that occasion, but circumstances were changed. Now, however it arose, he had no expression of opinion from his constituents against this Bill, on the contrary, many Petitions were forwarded to him in its favour, many, strange to say, from spirit dealers. Under such circumstances he did not feel justified—no matter what was his own opinion—in going against the opinion thus expressed by a section of his constituents, and finding no movement on the opposite side, he therefore should not vote on that occasion.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he was a promoter of the Permissive Bill, but nevertheless deemed it his duty to vote against the present measure. In the course of the debate on the Licensing Act a proposal was made to give two-thirds of the magistrates power to close public-houses on Sundays, but only 25 hon. Members voted in favour of it. If all the clergy of the different denominations were united in the desire to carry out the object of this Bill they could easily do so without any legislation whatever. That had actually been done by an Irish Prelate in the county of Tipperary, through his own individual exertions, and what had been done there might be done elsewhere. It was, however, found that that did not prevent drinking, and the small number of publicans who had taken six-day licences showed that the trade was not in favour of Sunday closing. He was entirely opposed to the principle of the Bill.

He thought it a cruel thing to attempt to harass persons in a humble sphere with restrictions that could not affect those who were well off. How was the publican to know whether a man was five miles from his home; and what sort of evidence was to be deemed sufficient to satisfy him? And if a man were to be allowed a glass of beer or of spirits after walking five miles, could it be refused to one who had walked only four and a half? Persons coming from their places of worship in the mountains should certainly be allowed that privilege; and he hoped the hon. Member for Dublin would see the matter in the same light. He contended that Irishmen drank much less than Scotchmen or Englishmen, and denied that there was anything like unanimity of opinion in Ireland in favour of the Bill.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, he took great interest in the success of the measure, and therefore could not but express his regret at the slight interest taken in the matter by the Members of Her Majesty's Government. He was sorry to hear the speech of the noble Lord the Chief Secretary, the more so as the noble Marquess's share in the Government of Ireland during the last three years had given great satisfaction. Fenians, Home Rulers, and other rebels assembled in public-houses on Sundays to plot against the country, and that was a reason why the Home Secretary and the noble Marquess should have urged on the House the importance of passing the Bill.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, that was not a question affecting Ireland only; but even if it were, he denied that there was any such unanimity in Ireland on this subject as had been represented. Many of, indeed, nearly all, the magistrates or persons exercising jurisdiction in the larger towns and centres of Ireland, who were examined before the Committee, stated that it would be a bad thing if public-houses were wholly closed on Sundays. It was unfair to the publicans of both countries to assume that they desired to carry on their business—subject of course to their own reasonable profits—from any other motive than that of affording a legitimate public convenience. It was all very well to say that the cases of public-houses and of clubs were entirely different; but no view that could be held on that point could justify the proposition contained in the Bill. He could not see how they could legislate for particular individuals by depriving others, who committed no offence, of what was their right. The principle of the Bill was applicable not only to Ireland, but to England also; and he believed that it would be a bad thing absolutely to close all public-houses on Sundays, because it would be monstrously unfair to do so, as it would work much hardship in individual cases. How often, for instance, did it happen—as the hon. Member for Dublin must know full well—that spirits were wanted on Sundays for medical purposes; and had he no regard for what might happen when, by the legislation he proposed, it would be denied? He should oppose the Bill.

SIR DOMINIC CORRIGAN, in reply, said, he had no desire to stand by the traveller's clause or by the limit of five miles; but to leave those and other details to be determined by the Committee, preserving, however, the principle of the Bill as one for closing on Sundays...

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 83; Noes 140: Majority 57.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for three months.

MUNICIPAL BOROUGHS EXTENSION BILL—[BILL 48].

(*Mr. Henry Samuelson, Mr. Wykeham Martin,
Mr. Staveley Hill.*)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HENRY SAMUELSON said, that at the present period of the Session it was quite impossible to go on with the Bill with any chance of success. He had, however, reason to hope from a statement made to the House by the Secretary to the Local Government Board during the debate on the question of appointing the Select Committee on Boundaries, that the Government were in favour of the principle of the measure, and he hoped that they would bring in a Bill embodying the main principle of his Bill. If not he should certainly re-introduce his Bill next Session. He therefore moved that the Order be discharged.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Order be discharged."—(Mr. Henry Samuelson.)

MR. GOLDNEY wished to know, before the Motion was agreed to, whether the Government agreed in the principle of the Bill, which might be introduced again next Session.

MR. BRUCE said, he had not had an opportunity of consulting his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Stansfeld) on the subject, but he might say that, although the question was deserving of attention, the details of the present Bill were faulty, and if it went to a division it would be his duty to vote against the second reading. What the Bill proposed to do, must be done in a different way.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, under the circumstances, objected to the Motion for the discharge of the Order, until the House had an opportunity of discussing and expressing an opinion on its principle. They ought to have some formal statement of the views of the Government on the subject.

MR. R. N. FOWLER moved that in the absence of the President of the Local Government Board, the debate be adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Robert Fowler.)

MR. RAIKES regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board was not in his place, to state whether the principle of the Bill was to become that of the Government measure.

MR. SAMUELSON said, that the statement that the Government would consider the question with a view to legislation arose upon discussion of an Amendment moved by him, that the boundaries of Municipal Boroughs should be considered in the Committee on Boundaries. He could not help thinking that hon. Members on the Opposition Benches found it convenient to discuss the withdrawal of his hon. Relative's modest little Bill in order to prevent the Burials Bill from coming on.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that it might with quite as much reason be said that the Bill was being withdrawn unexpectedly, and without Notice, in order that the Burials Bill might come on. The present measure was brought in at an early period of the Session, and then, when an opportunity was afforded for discussing the Bill and justifying it, the hon. Member proposed its withdrawal.

MR. HENRY SAMUELSON said, that he failed to understand the utility of occupying the time of the House by a discussion of the details of a Bill which there was no chance of passing so late in the Session. He had put the Bill on the Paper for second reading on a Wednesday in the middle of the Session, and had not the House been adjourned over that day in consequence of the Ministerial resignation he would have been quite prepared to discuss and justify the measure. He did not assert that the Secretary to the Local Government Board had promised to legislate in the spirit of the Bill, but that he had expressed his approval of some such method of relieving municipal boroughs from expense in procuring an extension of their boundaries. He would introduce the Bill next Session.

SIR FRANCOIS GOLDSMID said, he did not concur in the Bill, but could not join in the unusual course of refusing to allow the Order to be discharged.

Motion agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be adjourned till this day three months."—(Mr. Henry Samuelson.)

The House divided:—Ayes 185; Noes 91: Majority 94.

BURIALS BILL. [BILL 9].
(Mr. Osborne Morgan, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, Mr. Hadfield, Mr. M'Arthur.)
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, in moving that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, in order that the House might go into Committee on the Bill said, that but for the extraordinary and unprecedented course which had been taken in regard to it, he would have contented himself by merely raising his hat when the Order was read. He found himself confronted by two hostile Amendments which had been put on the Paper by the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) and the hon. and learned Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes). He, however, knew the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge too well. If he once got on his legs to deal with a subject of the kind, no human power would ever bring him down before the time fixed by the rules of the House for closing the debate. Having no wish that the hon. Member should have the whole of the talking that day, he hoped the House would hear him for a few minutes. He desired to explain that as a private Member, he had found it impossible under the rules of the House to bring on his measure on an earlier day, and that he had applied to the Government to help him. Wednesday had been all along his only day. The House had sat 15 Wednesdays, and on those occasions had had 104 Bills to deal with, giving an average of 47 minutes to each Bill. A glance at those figures would show how impossible it had been for him to get on faster. First let him say a word as to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Chester, who desired fuller information on the subject before the passing of a Bill like the present. His thirsty soul yearned for more knowledge and more light; but it so happened the House was in possession of information fuller and more accurate than any ever placed before it in preceding Sessions; while with regard to the one placed on the Paper by his hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge, it had had the effect of preventing his bringing on the Bill, because the Government had been unable to afford him any assistance in the matter. A House of upwards of 500 Members—the fullest that had ever divided on a private Member's Bill—had, after a long and eloquent speech against the measure from the Leader of the Opposition, resolved by a majority of 63 to read the Bill a second time. Did the hon. Member think that his ingenuity and his eloquence would prevail where the ingenuity and eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman had failed? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire was very different in opposition from what he was in power, and when in office he might come to consider the Burials Bill was even a Conservative measure. The object of the hon. Member was evidently to gain time, thinking that that being the last Session of the present Parliament, it would be a gain to his cause to put it off until another Parliament should have been elected. and that strong Ecclesiastical spirit by which, according to the Leader of the Opposition, the artizan classes were penetrated, had had time to come into play. Well, he could assure the hon. Member that the supporters of the measure could afford to wait, though it was desirable in the interests of humanity that the question should be settled once and for ever. But delay which was irksome to them was fatal to their opponents. Every debate on this Bill was another nail knocked into the coffin of the Church of England. It would be truly said that a Church which held that Nonconformists should take their choice between being buried like a Churchman and being buried like a dog was no true national Church. He wished his hon. Friend opposite to learn that if the Church of England—which after all was but a creature of compromise—was to be saved at all, it would be saved by timely concessions, and that the most sweeping revolutions were those which were brought about by obstructing moderate reforms.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Osborne Morgan.)

MR. PELL believed that, as time went on and that question was better understood, that Bill met with less and less acceptance from the country, and it was moreover quite impossible that it could be properly discussed at that period of the Session. He agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite the Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan), that the question should be settled once and for ever, though not exactly in the way the hon. Gentleman himself proposed; but in the way desired by those persons who wished to see peace and quietness reign among the inhabitants of our country villages. Since the debate on the Bill would only be of a perfunctory character he moved that the Order be discharged.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the said Order be discharged,"—(Mr. Pell,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. BERESFORD HOPE : Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge the compliment of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) in saying that when once I am on my legs no power on earth can get me down again. If, however, he thinks that by that sort of indirect compliment he will lead me either to lengthen or to shorten my remarks, he is mistaken. The question of the Burials Bill has, even since the 26th of March—to which my hon. and learned Friend has referred—vitally changed its character. Still more has it gone through many phases from the first time that my hon. and learned Friend obtained a Select Committee upon his original measure in one of the earliest Sessions of this Parliament. At that date the question was in its romantic or Idyllic stage. It professed to relate to a simple isolated grievance, the removal of which, so we were told, was desired by the kindness of the Nonconformists as a means of strengthening the Established Church of England. It is in the recollection of both sides of the House, that the hon. Gentleman for Bristol (Mr. Morley), to whom we may look as the representative of the more moderate and tolerant section of Nonconformity, said that if the removal of this grievance, as he deemed it, were granted, and if the University tests were repealed, Dissenters, as such, would no longer have any grievance left. Well, Sir, University tests have been repealed, so that the only grievance which now remains, according to the statement of the hon. Member for Bristol, is this of dissenters' burials. Now, let me take the words of my hon. and learned Friend. He has argued that these pieces of ground are not properly churchyards but graveyards, and he said that they were the property of the parish, and that every parishioner had a right to be buried in them. Without entering into the verbal controversy, I most cordially agree with his second statement. It is the right of every parishioner to seek burial in these yards, and those on this side of the House who think that this Bill is superfluous, were, nevertheless, prepared during the last Session to support a measure which came down to us from "another place," reaffirming the common-law right of all persons to be buried in the parish graveyard, and, further, giving facilities to those who desired to be buried in some peculiar, sectarian, or exclusive manner, to obtain possession of graveyards, in which they could lie free from the contamination of having the bodies of Churchmen for their neighbours. I believe that on this very evening my hon. and learned Friend will carry through Amendments originated in that "other place," giving effect to the last named remedy. So of the two grievances, then, one has by the voice of Parliament been remedied, and as to the other, if it does exist in face of the Bill so soon to become law, and in face of the common-law right of parishioners, which no statute, I believe, can make really stronger, we are prepared to meet all reasonable claims on the part of our Nonconforming brethren. So much as to the ostensible state of the case in reference to the shape in which it was presented to the Select Committee; but what is the aspect of the matter now? My hon. and learned Friend has great experience in addressing mixed audiences; but with all his ingenuous ability, can he argue that the question stands now in the same position as that in which he himself put it when he brought in the Bill this Session? Still more does it stand in the position the hon. Member for Bristol placed it in that former year. He cannot say that it does. He knows as well as any of us that since that time the whole question of the Church of England Establishment has passed from the platform and the lecture-room, and has become a matter on which parties in this House have been formally asked to vote. The disestablishment question having come to the fore, and been taken up by a certain section of the House as the burning question of the day, it is impossible for us to disentangle this so-called grievance from that transcendent issue. It has, even ostentatiously, become a part of the question of disestablishment. We all know that the Liberation Society is the authorized mouthpiece of the disestablishment party. And what said the Liberation Society on the subject of Church property before the period of Irish disestablishment? I claim particular attention to the passage which I am about to cite, and to its date. Before the Irish crisis, the Liberation Society had put forward its "platform," and in that I find these words—

"The application to secular uses, after an equitable satisfaction of existing interests of all national property, now held in trust by the United Church of England and Ireland, the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, and concurrently with it the liberation of those Churches from all State control."

You will observe, Sir, "the application to secular uses . . . . of all national property"—national property, without doubt, being intended to include not only tithes and other endowments, but the churches and the churchyards of the Established Church, which we contend are the private property of the Church of England, as Church of England; but which, the hon. Mover contends, are national property. Now, by the Irish Church Act, while life interests only were regarded so far as its monied property was concerned, the buildings and the churchyards were allowed to remain the individual property of the community which had hitherto had the use of them for the purposes of worship and of burial. That is the principle which was sanctioned by the Irish Church Act, and the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire is too good a lawyer not to agree with me upon the value of the precedent as to the use of these buildings and grounds remaining in the hands of the body to whom it had heretofore belonged, instead of a concurrent user being created on the part of other denominations. Well, the Liberation party—which has now become the disestablishment party—encouraged by the success of Irish disestablishment, to make a similar raid upon the Church of England, but anxious, at the same time, if it carried its point in England, that it should be carried on terms more unfavourable to the English Church than to its Irish compeer, has constructed reasons why the churchyards, if not the churches, should be removed out of the category of property which might rightfully remain in the hands of the body who now use them, and should be treated in the words of the programme of the Liberation Society as "national property." Under these circumstances, and whether we like it or not, the question has assumed a totally different position by the movement of the disestablishment party on one side, and by the precedent of the disestablishment of the Irish Church on the other. But there is another contingency which has occurred previously to Irish disestablishment, but which must be taken into consideration as immediately affecting the question. I refer to the abolition of the compulsion of church rates, and the transformation of the church rate from a tax recoverable by legal process to a mere free-will offering of the congregations. The church-rate having been thus changed into a free-will offering, the maintenance of the parish churchyard fell to the share of those who cared for it; but, at the same time, the common-law right of every resident parishioner to be buried in it remains just where it was before. For the sake of peace, Churchmen held out the olive-branch to their Nonconformist fellow-citizens by abandoning the compulsory church rate; but, whilst they did so, was any single whisper raised in favour of making the churchyards more exclusive than they were? Was it ever proposed to shut out any man from burial in a churchyard who, as a parishioner, had a right to be interred there? Quite the contrary. In short, the surrender of the compulsory church rate, viewed by the light of fact, and not by the glare of party, was not only the surrender of a claim, but the positive gift of valuable and pre-existent property made in the interests of peace. Churchmen voluntarily took upon themselves to maintain the ground for the joint use of their Nonconformist brethren and themselves, although previously they had a right to call upon those brethren to bear their share of the cost in what was an equal benefit to them; but throughout all the agitation which this burial question has occasioned, and in all the debates which have taken place in this House respecting it, one thing that has struck me as singular is that I have never seen any suggestion on the part of those who are most zealous in their support of my hon. and learned Friend to take upon themselves any portion of the burthen which they shuffled off, and which we willingly consented to their shuffling off in the cause of peace a few years ago when church rates ceased to be compulsory.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN: In my first Bill I introduced a clause throwing the maintenance of the churchyard upon the parish, and my hon. Friend (Mr. Beresford Hope) was instrumental in having it rejected in the Select Committee.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: I accept my hon. and learned Friend's reminder. The fact is, that he is too good for the party he leads. No doubt, it was his natural instinct of equity which led him to make the proposal, but to that proposal I felt objections which I am not ashamed of. If we had accepted it, we should have thrown away our property in the churchyards. We should have seen them, theoretically, slip through our fingers, in case the question of disestablishment ever becomes more than the means of giving us occasional exercise in the lobbies. In that suggestion my hon. and learned Friend judged wisely for those on whose part he was acting, and who, I must observe, have never shown the least inclination to renew the offer. But it also showed the wisdom of Churchmen in rejecting, at an earlier date, the various compromises by which it was once proposed to settle the church rate question by compulsorily rating all the parishioners for the maintenance of the fabric and the ground, and leaving the expenses of worship to be defrayed by voluntary contributions. If a fabric rate had been conceded, or if the clause, of which my hon. and learned Friend once advocated, should ever form part of a settlement, there could be no doubt that the Nonconformist body would have established a reasonable ground for their claims.

But what is the grievance after all? We are all of one mind that every parishioner has a common-law right to be buried in the churchyard of his parish, with a form of words or with no form of words; and the grievance is that, if a form of words is used, it is to be a specified form, and is to be used by a specified man—namely, the parish minister or the chaplain of the cemetery. Well, if there be any grievance in this, it is one that equally affects Churchmen and Nonconformists. If the words contained in the Burial Service of the Church of England were such as could irritate the conscience or pain the feelings of any man, then you would have a grievance; but I do not understand that it is alleged by the most virulent opponents of the present state of things, that there is any conscientious objection to that service. Quite the contrary. It is generally admitted to be a beautiful and scriptural form of words. Then, where is your grievance, I ask? It is simply this—that at a burial taking place in the churchyard, one form of words, and one only, has to be used, and that the persons who use that form of words must be one particular set of officers of the Church of England. Let us take the case of a member of the Church of England who happens to be of an ecstatic, an impulsive, or poetical turn of mind. He thinks that the appointed form of words is not sufficient to express his feelings at the interment of some much loved friend. He covets a funeral oration, or he might desire the cadences of some favourite hymn; or, perhaps, he belongs to a section of the Church which likes to give a more than usual emphasis to the ceremonial arrangements of the service, and would therefore wish to have the funeral service of the Church of England conducted with some unusual pomp and circumstance. That man after death, and his surviving sympathizers, have a grievance identical with that of the Nonconformist. It is as great, if not greater. He cannot be buried in the churchyard in the precise manner which he had directed on his death-bed, or in the way in which his friends, knowing his temperament, might after his death wish to arrange. This is the grievance, such as it is, of the unconventional Churchman not less than of the Dissenter—namely, that if any form of words be used, that form of words is prescribed according to a particular order, and must be recited by a particular man, and at his discretion in the accessories. I confess that I am totally unable to see any conscientious grievance wrapped up in this limitation. Of course, it is always most pleasant to do a thing in one's own way and in nobody else's. That is human nature. No doubt, for example, the forms of this House are often felt to be onerous by hon. Members, who would like, when the Mace is on the Table, to have the privilege of speaking as frequently as they may do when that Mace occupies a less conspicuous position; but their inability to do so can hardly be called a conscientious grievance. In the graveyard everything cannot be said which everyone wants to say, or in the way in which he wants to have it said. Good order and decency require that there should be a limit somewhere; some boundary and some restriction are indispensable; and, by going through one or two points in the clauses of this Bill, I think I shall be able to show that the present system does give the maximum of licence and liberty. The hon. Mover, in the exercise of his rights, spoke ad invidiam, and described a silent burial as "the burial of a dog." A body is gravely, solemnly, and silently placed in the ground. Weeping and uncovered relatives and friends stand around, and gaze with the sadness that must naturally accompany such a ceremony upon the descending coffin. They have already assembled for prayer at the residence of their deceased brother, or in the place in which he formerly worshipped. If you call that the burial of a dog, I assert that you indulge in a licence of speech which no one in this House could with any self-respect attempt to justify. We know that, among Roman Catholics, that form of burial to which my hon. and learned Friend has applied that contumelious expression is the rule. The depositing of the body in the grave with a form of service is a very old and peculiar English custom, that existed long before the Reformation, and so we have inherited it; but in modern churches in communion with the Church of Rome the contrary custom of the Continent has prevailed, and it is now the characteristic practice of Romanists to perform the religious service at the church to which the body is borne, while all that ever occurs at the grave is the occasional utterance of a funeral oration of a secular description. On the other hand, among the Scottish Presbyterians the religious exercises occur at the house of the deceased, and the interment is a silent act. Therefore if putting the body silently into the ground is the burial of a dog, then the burials of those wide sections of Christendom which continue in the communion of the Romish See, or which adhere to the Westminster Confession, are all burials of dogs. I am sure that the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire will not stand by so monstrous an assertion.

Let me now give a view of the question from another side, and call upon my hon. and learned Friend, if he can, to justify that view. Here is a statement of the present system of burials which has been sent forth by a gentleman of great authority and well-earned eminence, whose name I will give when I have read his opinion. This gentleman says—

"Is the priest, with his one communicant"—whatever that means—"for ever to be quartered upon us as an ecclesiastical dragoon, and for his insult to be fed with tithes and offerings? If there be justice amongst our statesmen—"

And I call the particular attention of

Mr. Beresford Hope

Gentlemen on the Treasury bench to this—

"they cannot allow such wrong to be perpetual. Since there is justice with the Most High He will not suffer them to go unpunished."

I must apologize to the House for reading the words that follow. I would not do so, indeed, if they came from an obscure writer; but the name of the writer will be my justification for reading these words, which I assure the House fall unwillingly from my lips—

"To the Eternal God the Nonconformists appeal against the tyranny of that Popish Church which now lords it over us. O Lord, how long! How long!"

That is another view of the case; and that is signed with the initials "C. H. S." They are the words of Mr. Spurgeon, and I take them from a publication of his called The Sword and Trowel, of April, 1872. Well, this inflated language—which I dare not characterize as I should wish—comes from a man who, of all others, I suppose may be regarded as the representative minister of the religion of the party for whom this Bill is intended; from a man who has collected and holds together and rules the largest and most enthusiastic Nonconformist congregation in London or in all the country. And this man, this Mr. Spurgeon, dares to use the great influence of his eloquence, his labours and his work, to put forward a charge like that; to arraign the Eternal Wisdom and Justice—aye, and to denounce the Eternal himself as unjust if He does not punish—what? The Church of England, for having in every parish in the land a man of God to counsel the simple, to preach to the broken-hearted, and to perform the offices of religion in the Church and the churchyard. These are the words of Mr. Spurgeon recently used, and I could have quoted many strong expressions which were indulged in some 20 or 30 years ago by the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall) and other well-known individuals before they had seats in this House; but I will not revert to them. I quote words which were used only last year—several years after this Burial Bill was brought before the House—as they express the feeling at present entertained by a Nonconformist minister of vast influence who has made himself prominent in the ecclesiastico-political arena among the teachers and preachers of disestablishment. The presence of the minister of the parish to perform the burial service is "an insult." It is an "insult" that he should be "fed with tithes and offerings." Does Mr. Spurgeon know what he means? Tithes he may object to, because they are a debt due by the law of the land; but an "offering" I have always thought was a free-will gift. So that actually the Almighty is called upon to pour out his vengeance on a person because Christians out of good will are pleased to make offerings to sustain their own pastor! Again, what is the thunder storm which is gathering in the political atmosphere now? It is the rage of the political Nonconformist body at being called upon to recognize the rights of conscience on the part of the poorest of men when that poorest of men is required to invoke the aid of his richer neighbours in procuring education for his children. Then the rights of conscience are to be as nothing when the power of tyrannizing over a man who is too poor to resist is placed in the hands of the clique who howl at Liberation meetings, and who conspire in the committee rooms of the League.

There is I again most confidently assert no grievance to the conscience since the repeal of the compulsory church rate in calling upon the Churchman out of his own pocket to pay for the maintenance of the churchyard; there is no grievance to the conscience in calling upon us Churchmen to put our hands into our pockets and go on sustaining our graveyards, in order to restrain your Mr. Spurgeons, or whoever else it may be, who use such inflated and almost blasphemous language from entering there, and under the pretence of making extemporeaneous prayer, denouncing the worship of the great majority of his countrymen, and almost arraigning the wisdom of the Almighty. My hon. and learned Friend, early in this Session, said that he had made a great concession to Churchmen by adopting some words which are the only difference between the Bill of this year and that of last year, and which were suggested by an hon. Friend of mine in this House (Mr. J. G. Talbot). My hon. Friend is one with whom I generally agree; but even he is not infallible, and I must point out to him that his words, which were suggested with the best intentions, and have been adopted by my hon. and learned Friend, are very much the reverse of that palliative which they were intended to be. They occur in the 4th clause of the Bill—

"At any burial under this Act any person or persons who shall be thereunto invited, or be authorized by the person or persons having the charge of or being responsible for such burial, may take part in any service or other religious act thereat: Provided always, that no person shall officiate at any such religious service who is not a minister or member of some religious body or congregation, having a registered place for public worship: Provided also, that any service, if not according to a published ritual, shall consist only of prayers, hymns, or extracts from Holy Scripture."

When we do get into Committee on the Bill—which we shall not this year—but, speaking hypothetically, when we do get into Committee—I shall call upon the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire to explain, what he will not be able to do, the difference between taking part in a service and officiating in a service. Surely a man who takes part in a service must open his mouth and utter audible sounds of some kind or other, and that is very like officiating. But I come now to the Proviso, which is in these words—

"Provided always, that any service, if not according to a published ritual, shall consist only of prayers, hymns, or extracts from the Holy Scriptures."

Very well; and in a preceding clause it is laid down that in the summer months these funerals shall be between the hours of 10 and 6, and in the winter months between 10 and 3. Now the names of sects are Legion. There is a sect called the "Particular People." There are sects of Positivists, Bible Christians, Negative religionists, and others constantly turning up. In short, the meaning of the term "religious bodies" is simply bodies who have taken out a licence to meet together and to perform some common act of mutual agreement in faith or scepticism in some particular place, while the provision in the 5th clause "no service, nor any part thereof under this Act, shall be other than of a religious character," is equally futile from the non-existence of any definitions of religions in which all can agree. The first thing to do at a burial is, as the French minister lately told the Assembly, to get your body. The funeral has then to be announced according to certain provisions contained in the Bill; but there is not a word in it to say that only one person shall officiate at any one funeral, or that it shall be a man rather than a woman. In fact, any number of both sexes may officiate. Now, let us take some sect—say the Positivists—who already possess chapels so-called in London, and I believe elsewhere. Some one belonging to that body, or to some other extreme knot of thinkers, dies, and a list is sent to the incumbent of the parish of certain ministers or members of that community who will take part in the funeral. They have no published ritual. And so what happens? The body of the deceased person reaches the tomb, and seven or eight gentlemen or ladies appear there, every one of them prepared to take his or her part in the funeral. The service must consist only of prayers, hymns, or extracts from Holy Scripture. Well, we all know what the power of prayer is. We know how much may be pressed into a prayer. There may be a minatory prayer. There may be a prayer which denounces the Almighty, as Mr. Spurgeon did in the extract which I have read, if He does not act on the eternal laws which Mr. Spurgeon lays down for His guidance and direction. There may be also the compassionate prayer—

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, I rise to Order. The question before the House, I apprehend, is the Motion for going into Committee on the Burials Bill.

MR. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge was in Order, and that what he was saying was relevant to the matter in debate.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: Being permitted by you, Sir, I shall continue my observations. I was engaged, when interrupted by the noble Lord, in analyzing a clause of this Bill, and showing how it was likely to work. The word "prayer" is a word which actually occurs in that clause; and I was pointing out that there may be a minatory prayer, a denunciatory prayer, and a compassionate prayer. A prayer of this last description would be one that the poor sinner, who so unworthily fills the pulpit of the adjacent church, and feeds his benighted flock with husks, may be brought to see the error of his ways, or that his partner in life, and daughters, may no longer set the bad example to the parish of flaunting in ungodly ribbons and silks on the Sabbath day. Then there may be a prayer that Her Majesty's Ministers may see how they are vexing the souls of the righteous by an Education or Endowed Schools Bill, or by voting against some measure proposed by the hon. Member for Bradford, or perhaps, by giving to their Nonconformist supporters that lukewarm support of which my hon. and learned Friend has so pathetically complained this evening, with regard to the present Bill. There may be many things, then, wrapped up in a prayer. But one prayer may not be deemed sufficient. Look how the service may be protracted, when there is no question of time involved, or rather, when the sitting is not from 12 until a quarter to 6, but from 10 to 6, as laid down in the Bill. Number one stands up, rails at the clergyman's doctrine, and prays for his enlightenment; number two prays at the rev. gentleman's wife and family; number three prays at the squire or the patron; number four prays at the Archbishops, Bishops, rural deans, and the Establishment generally; and others will come in their turn to attack Her Majesty's Ministers, the Opposition, and every institution in Church and State—the whole being cheerfully interspersed with extracts from Scripture and appropriate hymns. I believe that an eminent gentleman (Mr. Bradlaugh), who lately went upon a political mission to Spain, has published a hymnal which has had considerable circulation since attention was called to it in high literary quarters, and this little work may possibly be found useful on the occasion. But, then, as I said, there are also extracts from Holy Scripture. What does that mean? Does it mean that there are to be continuous passages selected and read for the edification and consolation of the mourners? There may be such a thing as stringing together a good many incongruous passages of Scripture—passages relating to priests of Baal—passages referring to Eli's neglect of duty, and his sons' misdeeds, or to the Pharisees and Sadducees. There is no doubt that an ingenious collection might be made of short texts of Scripture, which, being brought together, would have a meaning and an import very different from that which they carry with them when taken with their own context. My hon. and learned Friend is too good a scholar not to know what is meant by the word "Cento." He knows how passages may be made to carry a meaning which they were never intended to bear. What then, is there in this Bill to prevent some Positivist minister—I will not speak of a Christian minister, but the minister of some sect not Christian, but still "religious" in the sense of this Bill—from following the learned example of Ausonius, and framing his unpublished Ritual accordingly?

Mr. Beresford Hope

I meant to have said something upon the subject of conducting burials, as the next clause requires, in a "decent and solemn manner;" but the House will, I am sure, feel what an absurd pleonasm it is, when, after the loop-hole which is given in the preceding clause for the introduction of everything that may be most offensive to the conscience and the feelings of right thinking men, you come in with this pompous platitude, that the burial shall be conducted in a decent and solemn manner. I have, however, a very few more minutes at my disposal. I shall devote that time to an invitation, most sincerely offered, and which they had better take to heart, to those Members of the more moderate Liberal party who voted against the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall) some time ago, but who are now prepared to vote with the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire on this Bill. They may think that in so doing they remove a grievance. I grant, Sir, that they might have laid that unction to their souls two or three years ago; but I put it to their common sense—I do not put it to anything else, but simply to their common sense as men of the world—whether, after the disestablishment party has made this question its watchword and ranged itself under this banner, they can as common sense English and working politicians fail for one moment to see that the time has come when they are bound to take one side or the other. I presume that, as moderate Liberals, they do not want the Nonconformists to break up the Liberal party. I suppose they wish that it should continue one of the great historical parties of the State, and I trust it will do so. Although I am a party man, I am not a partisan. I look upon party conflicts, in which there is a tolerable balance of interests, as best for the commonwealth; and I tell hon. Members opposite that, if they yield to the Nonconformists upon the Church question, of which this burials conflict is an integral element, they will break up the Liberal party, and then in face of rampant Radicalism they will have to cross the floor and join us. So far I should not grieve, but the old Liberal party will be a thing of the past.

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

Then the remaining Orders of the Day being gone through, it being Six of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House till To-morrow, without putting the Question.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 10th July, 1873.

MINUTES.—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
Public Schools (Eton College Property)* (204); Highland Schools (Scotland)* (205).
*Second Reading—Petitions of Right (Ireland)** (180); Indian Railways Registration* (164); Blackwater Bridge (Composition of Debt)* (189).
Select Committee—Report—Colonial Church (No. 202).
*Committee—Prison Officers Superannuation (Ireland)* (192); Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 6)* (157).*
*Committee—Report—Tithe Commutation Acts Amendment* (171); Statute Law Revision* (174); Canada Loan Guarantee* (183); National Debt Commissioners (Annuities)* (191).*
*Report—Colonial Church* (118-203).*
*Third Reading—Slave Trade (East African Courts)* (187); Ecclesiastical Commissioners* (200), and passed.*

AFRICA—WEST COAST SETTLEMENTS —THE ASHANTEE INVASION.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON asked whether certain statements published in The Times of this morning as to hostilities on the Gold Coast were correct, and whether the Government had received any despatches containing such information. If the statements were well founded, they tended to confirm the fear he recently expressed that Colonel Harley's estimate of the position was too sanguine, and that we should find ourselves engaged in another long and costly African war.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, no Department of the Government had received any information of the nature described by the noble Earl. He was, therefore, unable from any official source to inform him whether the information contained in the letter which had appeared in The Times was correct; but he was bound to say that he believed it would turn out to be substantially true. The latest information in his possession was dated the 4th of June, and arrived on the 28th. At that time the Ashantee forces were near a place called Donquah, in the Denkera country, and it was expected that a battle would come off between them and the Fante tribes. The statement in The Times corresponded as to the locality, and he feared, therefore, that the battle had resulted in the defeat of the latter as was stated. It was due to Colonel Harley to say that though on one unfortunate occasion he under-estimated the Ashantee force, he had by no means erred in the sense of taking a sanguine view of the position, having always represented it as of a serious kind. The noble Earl had not, apparently, noticed another letter, which stated that two African mail steamers, the Yoruba and the Nigritia, had been lost. He conjectured that this might be the cause of his not receiving correspondence regularly. A considerable quantity of military stores and provisions had been sent to the Gold Coast, and some, but by no means the larger portion, had been lost in those steamers. To remedy this loss a special steamer would be sent out immediately, with provisions and stores; but a considerable quantity had already arrived, and he had no serious apprehensions on that head. Papers giving a complete history of the matter up to a comparatively late date would be in the hands of Members of both Houses on Monday or Tuesday. These Papers would contain much information respecting the state of affairs at these Settlements, and he would communicate further information hereafter.

The Earl of Carnarvon

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE said, he had no doubt that the account in The Times was correct, for by the last account Donquah was closely besieged by the Ashantees, and the King had written to the Administrator that, without immediate assistance he could not hold out. He feared the Administrator was under a delusion or was fettered by instructions, for he had seen a document in which he stated that he had given the protected tribes no assistance, except a small supply of powder. A gentleman also arrived by the last mail who was in the last action, and who said the Fantees were quite able and willing to beat back the Ashantees if they had some assistance. Unfortunately, our protected tribes at Cape Coast Castle and the Settlements had not been adequately supplied with arms and ammunition, and the result was that the whole country was now in a state of disorder, and had been completely devastated by the Ashantees.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY thought the noble Earl should await the despatches before condemning an Administrator placed in a very trying position.

STATUTE LAW REVISION BILL, 1873.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

(NO. 174.) COMMITTEE REPORT.

House in Committee (according to Order).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in reporting the Bill, which had passed through Committee without Amendment, explained that it continued the expurgation of the statutes from the 42nd George III. to the commencement of the reign of William IV. He moved the omission of the reference to the section of the Emancipation Act with reference to the assumption of territorial tithes. The framers of the Bill had construed the Act of 1871, repealing the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, as having repealed that section, but he doubted whether it went quite so far.

LORD CAIRNS also thought that, though the Act of 1871 had very much narrowed the operation of the section, it had not repealed it.

Amendment made accordingly.

Bill to be read 3<sup>d</sup> To-morrow.

NAVY—PEBBLE POWDER—THE REVIEW AT PORTSMOUTH.
QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON asked, Whether in firing a naval salute in honour of the Shah of Persia pebble powder was used; and, if so, to move for the amount now in store, and the price at which it is manufactured for the Government. The reason which had induced him to put this question was that he understood that our stock of pebble powder was small, that its manufacture was very costly, and that ordinary powder answered quite as well for saluting purposes. Moreover, the sad accident which occurred to a yacht on the occasion of the visit of the Shah of Persia to Portsmouth had been attributed to the great force of this powder. He had been informed—though he could scarcely believe it—that each of the three salutes had cost the country £1,000.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, that the noble Earl was quite correct in presuming that pebble powder was used in the salutes on the occasion of the visit of the Shah of Persia to Portsmouth. It was considered by persons best qualified to form an opinion on the subject that the large guns used on board such vessels as our great iron-clads could not be properly fired with the ordinary powder, and the pebble powder was consequently used on the occasion in question with the 18 and 25 ton guns. In ordinary salutes it was customary to fire 12 pounders with ordinary powder. With regard to the other Question of the noble Earl, the quantity of pebble powder in store in the United Kingdom on the 31st March last was 49,411 barrels, 42,578 barrels of which were in loose and 6,833 barrels in cartridge. The cost when manufactured at Waltham Abbey was £3 3s. 5d. per barrel; when obtained from Belgium, £3 9s. per barrel; and when supplied by English manufacturers, £4 15s. per barrel. He was not in a position at present to show the difference between the price of pebble powder and the price of ordinary powder.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON had been given to understand that ordinary powder answered quite as well for saluting purposes for the large guns.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN repeated that the best authorities on the subject, the officers in charge of the naval artillery, regarded pebble powder as the only powder that should be used with the large guns.

LORD VIVIAN remarked that some blame must attach to somebody in connection with the accident to the yacht. He believed it was unprecedented, or nearly so, to fire salutes from gun-boats, and the officers in command should have taken due precautions. Seven persons were injured on board the yacht, one of whom, a connection of his own, was so much injured that he had not been able to leave his bed since then until Wednesday last. He believed that the misfortune was occasioned by the use of pebble powder. In his opinion sufficient precautions had not been taken.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE considered that pebble powder should not be used on such an occasion as that at Portsmouth the other day, as he thought it had been proved beyond doubt that for saluting it was very dangerous. He believed that common grain powder would have answered the purpose quite as well. All that was wanted on saluting occasions was to make as much noise as possible at as little expense as possible—pebble powder when fired without shot was half thrown away, as a large portion was blown out of the gun without being ignited.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN, admitting that firing a salute by gunboats was unusual, replied that it was not usual for Portsmouth to see a Shah every day. The Admiralty regretted the accident to the yacht, but a notice had been issued, and appeared in The Times on the 21st of June, prohibiting yachts and private vessels from passing between the line of iron-clads during the inspection, and from closing round Her Majesty's yacht. These orders were contravened, two or three steamers bumping into Her Majesty's yacht considerably to their own inconvenience. Had those in charge of the yacht in question respected the rules issued by the Admiralty no accident would have befallen them. He protested against the accident being attributed to the officers of the Fleet.

LORD VIVIAN said, the yacht went close to the gunboat on account of the well-known rule that gunboats did not fire salutes.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN repeated that the gentleman had only himself to thank for what occurred.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS (ETON COLLEGE PROPERTY)
BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend section twenty-four of the Public Schools Act, 1868, with respect to the property of Eton College—Was presented by The Lord LYTTELTON; read 1st. (No. 204.)

House adjourned at Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 10th July, 1873.

MINUTES.] — PUBLIC BILLS — Ordered—First Reading—Church Discipline Act Amendment* [234]; Regulation of Railways (Returns)* [232]; Treasury Chest Fund* [233]. Second Reading—Medical Act Amendment (University of London)* [224]. Committee—Supreme Court of Judicature [154] R.P.

Committee — Report — Military Manoeuvres* [216]; Public Records (Ireland) Act (1867) Amendment* [217]. Third Reading—Militia (Service, &c.)* [216]; Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (Nos 4, 5, and 6)* [208, 209, 210]; Local Government Provisional Orders (Nos. 4 and 5)* [211-212], and passed. Withdrawn—Shop Hours Regulation* [128]; Seduction Laws Amendment* [223].

FRANCE—COMMERCIAL TREATY, 1873.
EXPORT DUTY ON COAL.

QUESTION.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether instructions have been given to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris to secure for this Country, in the negotiations now pending between the Governments of France and England, the right of imposing a Duty on the export of coal?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD! Sir, no provision respecting the exportation of coal was included in the Treaty of Commerce signed with the French Government on the 5th of November last, nor is any such provision now in contemplation. I may remind the noble Lord that the British Government is precluded from imposing an export duty upon coal by the 5th Article of the Treaty with the Zollverein of May 30, 1865, which is as follows—

"The contracting parties engage not to prohibit the exportation of coal, and to levy no duty upon such exportation."

This Treaty continues in force until the 30th of June, 1877, and thenceforth unless terminated on twelve months' notice.

ARMY—"ADVANCED CLASS" EXAMINATIONS.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he would have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the last Circular giving notice of the Examination of Candidates for the Advanced Class; why the recommendations of Major General Napier's Committee, in reference to the Advanced Class, were not carried out; when the next examination will be held, and whether ample notice would be given; and, whether it is intended to make Officers supernumerary of their rank while in the Class, as recommended by the Committee before referred to.

MR. CARDWELL: There is no objection, Sir, to the production of the Circular if my hon. Friend will move for it. The recommendations of the Committee have been generally carried into effect, but with the exception of allowing the Officers to be supernumerary. Objection was taken to this arrangement, on the ground that it was doubtful whether the advantages of the class had been proportioned to the expenditure which it occasioned. It is intended, in deference to the strong recommendation of the Committee, to give the class another trial, with ample notice, and to permit the officers above the rank of subaltern to be supernumerary.

ROYAL MILITARY ACADEMY, WOOLWICH—GENTLEMEN CADETS.
QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the system now in force in a considerable portion of the barrack room at the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, of placing together not less than three, and in many instances recently four, gentleman cadets in rooms fifteen feet wide by thirteen feet in length will be continued, or if he intends to provide a separate room for each such cadet, not only for health sake but to insure the system of velumtary study in barracks; and, whether, considering that the amount paid by the parents for the education of the cadets is about £21,000 out of the total cost of £29,000, and about £150 for each cadet, he will be prepared to recommend more satisfactory accommodation?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, among the objects recommended as desirable by the Royal Commission on Military Education was that to which the hon. and gallant Member refers. A considerable expenditure has been incurred in promoting various objects recommended by the Commission which have been considered to have priority over this proposal.

LUNATIC ASYLUM BOARDS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

SIR DOMINIC CORRIGAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, in accordance with the intimation given by the Irish Government to the deputation from the several municipal bodies of Ireland that waited on His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary for Ireland on 30th January last, it is the intention of the right honourable the Chief Secretary for Ireland to bring in a Bill this Session for the introduction of the principle of representation in the constitution of the boards of the Lunatic Asylums of Ireland, and for insuring better financial management in those institutions?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that at the time when this deputation waited upon the Lord Lieutenant it was hoped that he (the Marquess of Hartington) would have been able to re-introduce during the present Session the County Officers Bill of last Session, but there had been no opportunity of doing so with any prospect of its obtaining sufficient discussion. There never was any intention to bring in a separate measure in reference to the boards of Lunatic Asylums. He trusted that during next Session it would be possible to consider and deal with the whole question.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS—THE DERWENTWATER ESTATES.—QUESTION.

MR. T. E. SMITH asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that a portion of the Derwentwater Estates lately advertised for sale by public auction, have been agreed to be sold by private contract to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, without testing their value by public competition?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, no portion of the estates which had been advertised for sale by public auction had been withdrawn or agreed to be sold by private contract. It had been under consideration whether another portion of the estate which had not been advertised for sale by auction, should not be sold to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. If the Admiralty found that better terms could be obtained by private treaty than by public sale, that course would be followed.

INDIA—REGULATIONS FOR EUROPEAN OFFICERS—PRIZE.—QUESTION.

COLONEL STUART KNOX asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the regulations for the European Officers in India are published by the authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council; Whether the Regulation at page 608, of the second edition of that Code, which sets forth that under the Act 3 & 4 Vic. c. 65, s. 22, "the final decision in all disputed questions of prize now rests with the High Court of Admiralty," has been or is to be cancelled; and, whether any of the Public Departments claim the right to supersede the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty, and to adjudicate, without a direct appointment from the Crown, on questions concerning booty of war; and, if so, under what Act of Parliament or what other authority?

MR. GRANT DUFF: In reply, Sir, to the hon. and gallant Member's first and second Questions, I have to say that the words "By authority" appear on the title-page of the book about which he asks, but that book is a mere compilation of official documents, and only authoritative in so far as it cites or renders with precise accuracy the meaning of official documents. The words quoted in the hon. and gallant Member's second Question form no part of any official document, and are a mere introduction prefixed by the compiler to a section of an Act of Parliament which he sets out in full, and the meaning of which is perfectly explicit. In reply to the hon. and gallant Member's third Question, I have to say that I am not aware that any Public Department claims any right to supersede the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty.

MERCANTILE MARINE—LOSS OF LIFE AT SEA.—QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to the following passage in a recent speech of the honourable Member for Derby, at Grimsby, viz.

"On the 24th March a number of vessels that sailed were missing and never more heard of except at Lloyd's. Yes, on the 24th of March, 70 ships—a whole fleet of merchantmen—had gone down to the bottom of the sea with all hands."

and, if so, if he has caused inquiries to be made into the correctness of this allegation as to the great loss of life and property on the day named; and, whether the ships lost were British ships and the seamen lost were British seamen?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: Sir, if the statement in the speech of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll) meant, as the hon. Alderman seems to think it did, that the 70 ships went down on the 24th of March, that is certainly not the case. I have had search made through the records of the Board of Trade and inquired at Lloyd's, and the fact is that on the 24th of March the list posted in Lloyd's room showed that during the period which had elapsed since the commencement of the year, 57 ships had been reported as missing; and this number included foreign vessels—but I am not able to say how many of them were foreign. These losses, or possible losses, took place, not on the shores of these islands only, but all over the world.

ARMY—ABOLITION OF PURCHASE—
MEMORIAL OF OFFICERS.
QUESTIONS.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that more than 2,200 Officers of the Army have memorialised His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief with reference to the effect of the abolition of purchase on their position and prospects, and praying for inquiry; and, whether he will lay upon the Table a Return upon this subject, similar to that for which an Address has been moved in the other House of Parliament, and including Copies of all Letters from the Generals Commanding Districts, forwarding the said memorials?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the number of those who are reported to me as having signed the memorials is 2,245. The Return has already been given to the other House on the Motion of the Duke of Richmond, and if my right hon. Friend will move for it I shall have no objection to lay it on the Table of the House.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the case that the Memorials referred to in the question of the Right Honourable Member for Droitwich, bear the signatures of officers of all grades from that of colonel downwards, comprising the names of officers who bought all their commissions, of others who have bought some but not all, and of others who have paid for none, the latter class including some who received their commissions for meritorious service in the ranks?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, I have no disposition at all to dispute the suggestions contained in the Question. My examination of those voluminous Papers has not been exhaustive, but I shall be quite safe in answering the Question generally in the affirmative.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND—SACRAMENTAL CONFESSION—PETITION TO CONVOCATION.—QUESTIONS.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will lay upon the Table a Copy of the Petition addressed to the Upper House of Convocation by 480 Clergymen of the Church of England, praying for the revival of Sacramental Confession and for the establishment of an Order of Confessors, and of certain rites and ceremonies abolished at the time of the Reformation, with the signatures attached thereto?

MR. BRUCE, in reply, said, he did not receive any Copy of the Petition referred to in the Question, and, as Convocation was not now sitting, it was impossible to make any proper communication to that body on the subject.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Are there no means by which Parliament can obtain a Copy of the Document?

MR. BRUCE: None that I can see, when Convocation is not sitting.

ARMY—FIRST DEVON MILITIA.

QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has received any representations from the agriculturists of North Devon respecting the inconvenience which will result to them in case of the First Devon Militia being called out for so long a period as forty-two days at the present season of the year?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, I have received such a representation. The time was originally fixed because we understood it would be the time most generally convenient to the county. I understand that arrangements have already been made by which a very small proportion of the men called out will be agricultural labourers, and every effort is being made to reduce this number as far as possible.

CASE OF THE IRISH CIVIL SERVANTS.

QUESTIONS.

MR. PLUNKET asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to give effect to the Resolution adopted by this House on Friday last with reference to the case of the Civil Servants of the Crown serving in Ireland?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I said a few words on this subject on Monday last, but, as it was at the close of some observations in regard to the Order of Business, it is quite possible that the words did not attract the attention of the House. I will repeat them as reported, because they express accurately what I said on the part of the Government—

"I have to state, with reference to the vote of the House on Friday night upon the salaries of the Civil Service in Ireland that, in redemption of the pledge we gave, it is our intention to appoint a Departmental Committee, which will examine into the position, emoluments, and conditions of service of the Civil Service in Ireland, and will go through such of the different establishments as may apply for examination into their cases."—[3 Hansard, ccxvi. 1859-60.]

MR. PLUNKET said, the reason why he put the Question was, because it appeared from what the right hon. Gentleman said that the Departmental Committee was to be appointed "in redemption of the pledge given" by the right hon. Gentleman at the time he was resisting the Resolution afterwards adopted by the House. He wished to ask, whether it was with a view to carry out the intention of the House that the Departmental Committee was to be appointed; and, if so, whether it would be exclusively composed of Treasury officials?

MR. GLADSTONE: The Committee to be appointed will be composed of official persons. I do not know that it is decided that they are to consist of Treasury officials. That is the only measure we can take in conformity with the Resolution of the House. Whether it satisfies that Resolution or not is, of course, a matter which asks for the free judgment of the hon. and learned Gentleman. I was not the author of the Resolution, and I am under no responsibility to interpret it.

CUSTOMS—EXTRA TREASURY CLERKS.

QUESTION.

MR. ELCHO asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Government are prepared to establish the Customs extra Treasury clerks, including those excluded from the establishment by the Treasury Order of 1856, or otherwise improve their position; whether the Government have recently established ten extra or temporary clerks at the Local Government Board; and, whether any of these clerks were properly excluded from the establishment by the retrospective action of the Treasury Order issued in 1856?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I understand the word "establishment" to mean the existing establishments, and, understanding it in that sense, I have to say the Government are not prepared to promote these clerks, because the existing establishments are now recruited by competitive examination only. I believe 10 clerks were recently placed on the establishment at the Local Government Board—that is, persons doing the duty of temporary clerks, because it was considered better by the heads of the Department to place them on the establishment. I do not think any of these clerks were excluded by the retrospective action of the Treasury Minute of 1856, because it did not apply to that Department.

LORD ELCHO: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the Question whether he would "otherwise improve their position?"

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have no knowledge of any claim they have for the improvement of their position. ["Oh, oh!"] Any claim they have will be attended to.

ROYAL COMMISSION—MR. PLIMSOLL AND THE BOARD OF TRADE.
QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade with reference to a publication which has appeared in the newspapers on the subject of some evidence given before the Royal Commission by the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll), imputing grave offences to the officers of the Board of Trade. The Question I wish to ask is, Whether his attention has been called to the publication, and whether he is prepared to take any steps with reference to it?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: Sir, my attention was naturally called to the publication of a letter of the hon. Member for Derby in The Times of Saturday. Since then I have addressed a letter to the hon. Member recapitulating what has passed before the Royal Commission, saying that the Royal Commission would judge for themselves what it was their duty to do; but that as he had chosen to publish that letter in the newspapers it was necessary for me, as President of the Board of Trade, to take the matter up. I then called upon the hon. Member to furnish me—as the person bound to look after the pure administration of the Department, and also to protect honest and honourable officers serving in it—with the names of "the many officers" of the Department whom he accused of corruption, and with the grounds and nature of his charges, or, if he still persevered in the refusal to do so which he had addressed to the Royal Commission, that he should then retract absolutely those charges. I have not as yet received an answer to that letter.

NAVY—AGE OF CADETS.—QUESTION.

MR. FITZWILLIAM DICK asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, What is the maximum age at which Boys are admitted as Cadets into Her Majesty's Navy; and what are the regulations which govern their admission?

MR. GOSCHEN: Sir, the maximum age as the regulations stand at present is 13. I will furnish the hon. Member with a copy of the regulations, and will be happy to give him such further information as may be in my power. But I do not pledge myself that no alterations will be made in those regulations before the next examination. I hope before Parliament rises to be able to answer the Question put to me some time ago with respect to the changes in the admission of cadets; but the matter is one of great difficulty, and we have not yet been able to arrange it.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM—
RETIREMENT OF MR. COLE.
QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HOARE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is true that Mr. Cole has retired from the office of Director of the South Kensington Museum, and has been allowed a retiring pension equal to his full salary; whether General Scott has vacated his office of Secretary and Acting Commissioner for the estate purchased out of the surplus funds of the Exhibition of 1851 in order to succeed Mr. Cole; and, whether Mr. Cole has been appointed to succeed General Scott at a salary of £1,000 a-year in addition to his retiring pension?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, said, his hon. Friend persevered in putting a Question to him, not merely with reference to the Exhibition Commission, of which he was an ex officio member, but also to a Department with which he was not connected. He might state, however, that it was quite true that Mr. Cole, after a long and honourable service, had retired, and that he had been awarded the pension to which he was entitled, and which was equal to the salary of the office he had held. With regard to the successor to be appointed, he believed he was correct in stating that the matter was under the consideration of the Department of Education. He was not on the Committee of Council, and was not able to say what their views might be. He had not heard before that General Scott had vacated his office as Secretary and Acting Commissioner of the Exhibition Estates, and as he believed that General Scott had not vacated the office, he could not therefore have succeeded to that lately held by Mr. Cole. It was true that Mr. Cole had since his retirement from the public service been appointed by the Commission to discharge very important and necessary duties — namely, to act as manager of the great International Exhibition which was now carried on from year to year, and for the very important duties he had to discharge he was to receive a salary of £1,000 a-year, which was to be paid not by the Government, but out of the receipts of the Exhibition.

WAYS AND MEANS—POST OFFICE REVENUES.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITE (for Mr. SEELY) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the sum of £480,000, taken from Post Office Revenue to repay moneys taken from Savings Bank balances, will not form part of the General Balances, and increase the Revenue by that amount; whether, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer still considers himself justified in anticipating that the Post Office Revenue will be nearly equal to that of last year, the Post Office Revenue will not be £430,000 in excess of his estimate; whether the effect will not be that next April the right honourable Gentleman will have the sum of £860,000 to deal with in addition to his estimated working surplus of £291,000; and, whether the probability of any increase in the Unfunded Debt being necessary at the end of the year is not thereby greatly diminished?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The hon. Gentleman assumes that this sum has been taken from the Post Office Revenue. I dare say he is right in that assumption, but I have no proof of it, or means of ascertaining at this moment. Before I enter upon the serious matter of correcting in any way the estimate I laid before the House when making the Financial Statement, I should like to be quite sure of the facts. If, therefore, the hon. Gentleman would allow his Question to be postponed for a few days, I will give him correct information.

IRELAND—DRAINAGE OF THE RIVERS SUCK AND SHANNON.—QUESTION.

MAJOR TRENCH: I wish, Sir, to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer a Question of which I have given him private Notice. On the 27th ultimo he acknowledged, in reply to my Question, that the proprietors and occupiers of a very extensive but much inundated district in the West of Ireland, had applied to be permitted to drain their lands under the provisions of the Drainage Act of 1863. He stated that permission had been refused, and that "the proprietors on the Suck must wait until a general measure had been determined upon for the Shannon." They have been waiting for such a measure for the last 25 years, and I now desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether he can hold out any hope that such a general measure as that he spoke of, will be determined upon and introduced next Session?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that he could hold out no such hope.

MAJOR TRENCH: Then, Sir, I beg leave to give Notice that on going into Committee of Supply—I hope on Friday, the 18th inst.—I will call the attention of the House to the circumstances under which Her Majesty's Government have prevented the owners and occupiers of the 72,000 acres of land injured or inundated by the waters of the Suck from undertaking the drainage of their lands under the Drainage Act of 1863, and to move—

"That the course of action pursued by Her Majesty's Government in preventing the owners and occupiers of land injured or inundated by the waters of the Suck from undertaking the drainage of their lands, at their own expense, under the Drainage Act of 1863, is most prejudicial to the interests of a large agricultural population in the west of Ireland, and calculated to discourage a spirit of enterprise and self-reliance so necessary for the development of the resources of that country."

PRIVILEGE—THE APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS—THE JUDICATURE BILL.

MR. GLADSTONE: I think, Sir, it will be for the convenience of the House that I should give some further explanation of the intentions of Her Majesty's Government in consequence of what occurred "elsewhere" in relation to the Judicature Bill. I stated, when the subject was formerly alluded to, that it had come to our knowledge that serious doubts were entertained in quarters entitled to much authority and respect, whether the proposal we had given notice of our intention of making in this Bill was or was not consistent with the Privileges of the other House of Parliament. We have thought it our duty, not in a controversial, but, I hope, in a constitutional and prudential spirit, to give immediately our best attention to the question. It is our duty, in the first place, to watch with care over everything that relates to the progress of a Bill of so much importance, on which so much of the labour of both Houses has been spent, and in regard to which so much expectation is entertained by the country; and it is also our duty to consider any matter relating to a subject so serious as a conflict of opinion between the two Houses of Parliament as to their Jurisdiction—a matter which we know to be grave, and which, especially after the transactions of 1860, the House of Lords knows to be grave also. We thought it very advantageous that we should consider this subject before any question was actually proposed to this House of Parliament which could lead to the adoption of any positive proceeding in the other House leading to the possibility of future difficulty. At present nothing has happened, excepting that the Government has announced its intention to make a certain proposal as to which Gentlemen in many different quarters of the House have given their opinion almost uniformly, I think, if not quite uniformly, in its favour; but on the other hand, as I have said, in quarters of influence and authority doubts have been raised on this very serious matter. What I understand to be the statement made to which these observations of mine have reference is this—if this House should, in amending the Supreme Court of Judicature Bill, insert provisions which would extinguish the Jurisdiction of the House of Lords with regard to Irish and Scotch appeals, it is to be considered as a violation of the Privileges of the House of Lords, assuming these Privileges to be correctly declared in a certain well-known passage of Mr. Justice Blackstone, which runs as follows:—

"All Bills likewise which in their character affect the rights of the Peerage are, by the wisdom of Parliament, to have their first rise or beginning in the House of Peers, and suffer no changes or Amendments in the House of Commons."

Now, there are two questions that may be raised on that passage—first, with reference to its meaning, and second with respect to its authority. As regards its authority, I should not say that a sentence quoted from Mr. Justice Blackstone could bind the right or title of Parliament—I mean morally—which must depend on accumulated evidence of often repeated and long-continued consent. With respect to the meaning of the passage, it is very difficult to say what is meant by "the rights of the Peerage." But, undoubtedly, it is the opinion of some—I confess I think it a reasonable opinion—that that expression does not point so much to what concerns either the constitution or the duties of the House of Lords collectively, as it does to questions affecting the titles individually by which Members of that House sit within its walls. However that may be, I wish to observe upon an important point in connection with the present case. The present case is one in which we do not propose—it never has been proposed—to deal with one of the original and traditional Privileges of the House of Lords. As regards the power of the House of Lords to judge English Appeals, it is a power which the House has possessed from time immemorial, and which it is very difficult to detach even in argument from the history and being of that House. But as respects the power to deal with Irish and Scotch Appeals, it is a power which accrues to the House of Lords exclusively from the declarations of a statute; and while I would carefully avoid any term of controversy so far as it is in my power, I must say it would be to carry this doctrine to excess if, with respect to what has been done by a statute, it were to be contended that it was not in the power of this House to make proposals to modify or remove that power. I may be permitted on this occasion of very considerable interest to point out how very far the practice of the other House of Parliament has been from the assertion of this rigid theoretic doctrine. I will mention a few cases which have occurred, and I will quote nothing whatever but what have been the subjects of Parliamentary controversy. Some of those who hear me recollect the time when it was almost the annual practice to bring forward Motions in this House to relieve the Members of the Episcopal Bench from their duties in the House of Lords. Bills for that purpose were introduced, although they were never passed or accepted by the House. They were objected to on the ground of policy and sometimes of high constitutional argument; but never, so far as I know, was it asserted that to deal with or even to initiate such a Bill was beyond the proper province of this House. I may mention that Bills for that purpose were brought forward in 1834, 1836, 1837, and 1838, and I believe, if the Votes were carefully examined, additions might be made to the list.

MR. DISRAELI: I must rise to Order, Sir. I do so with the greatest regret; but I must call attention to the fact that, without Notice, the right hon. Gentleman is entering into discussion on a subject of the greatest importance. No doubt the indulgence of the House to one filling the exalted position of the right hon. Gentleman, and who is entitled to that position for so many reasons, would be willingly granted, but it must be done with reason. Under usual circumstances, a Minister would bring up some Papers, and on the Motion that these do lie on the Table the House would, of course, listen to him, and enable him to make any statement which he thought necessary. The late Lord Palmerston, when he led this House, always took that course. Even if he did not take that course, the House will receive with great indulgence any statement of facts from the right hon. Gentleman, however lengthy it must necessarily be; but he is not confining himself to a statement of facts for the future consideration of the House. He is entering into an argument upon a very abstruse question, without first of all giving any Notice to the House, and under circumstances which will not allow other Members to express their opinions. I therefore object to the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman. If he wished a discussion on this important question he should have given Notice, and, at all events, he should make some Motion now which will enable other Members to avail themselves of their right and privilege to make such observations as they think necessary.

MR. GLADSTONE: The importance of the matter is such that unquestionably I should be justified in making the Motion, which ought never to be made without serious cause, that the House do now adjourn; and I have not the slightest objection to conclude with that Motion, in order to enable the right hon. Gentleman to make any remarks which he would be entitled to make, whether I conclude with a Motion or not. The right hon. Gentleman will see I have justification for the course I am pursuing, because it is one which is conceived in no narrow spirit, and which really aims at giving facility for the progress of Public Business as well as avoiding causes of serious difficulty. The right hon. Gentleman must be aware that there is some peculiarity in the circumstances out of which my address arises, and it has reference to proceedings such as are not permitted in this House, and it is difficult to treat under the regular forms of this House of proceedings which have been so carried on. I will resume the enumeration of precedents to which I had begun to refer. In the year 1832, there was actually introduced into this House a Bill for the abolition of the right of voting by proxy in the House of Lords. That proposal, however, was not persevered with, upon the ground that it trench'd on the Privileges of the House of Lords. I think that withdrawal was perfectly justified, inasmuch as the Bill did not refer to anything belonging to the duties of the House of Lords, but to a subject which is properly one of procedure in the House of Lords. It is a plainly reasonable assumption that the procedure of either House ought not to be the subject of discussion in the other House. In the year 1856 a Bill was brought into this House from the House of Lords, which dealt with the appellate jurisdiction of the Lords in relation to the creation of life Peers for certain purposes. That Bill was not accepted by this House, but it was referred to a Select Committee, and, unless I am very much mistaken, it is impossible to conceive any more clear assertion by the House of its title to deal with the details of such Bills and to introduce Amendments into them. In the year 1868 there came to this House a Bill to increase the number of Bishops, and provision was made in this Bill for introducing the new Bishops into the rotation by which prelates take their seats in Parliament. That Bill was amended by this House. We struck out all the provisions relating to the Peerage, and we struck out of it others relating to salary. The Bill was sent back to the Lords, and the Lords disagreed with the Amendments, but they disagreed upon the merits and did not raise any question of Privilege; and the Bill was finally dropped, because this House adhered to its Amendments, the Lords adhered to their disagreement upon the merits, and the Bill was lost. In the year 1833, under the high authority of the late Lord Derby, there was actually introduced into this House that important measure known as the Irish Church Temporalities Act, which most importantly modified and altered the constitution of the House of Lords with regard to the rotation in which the Irish Bishops were to sit. That Bill was accepted by the Lords without any difficulty as to Privilege, and finally became the law of the land. In 1869, we introduced into this House the Irish Church Bill; in that Bill, if I am correct in my recollection, we proposed to take away the right of Peerage of existing Peers as well as to destroy the Peerages themselves prospectively. That Bill went to the House of Lords, and the Lords, I believe, amended the Bill by carrying the rights of the existing Peers; we adhered to our refusal to recognize those rights, the Lords eventually accepted the provisions of the House of Commons; and that provision, on the initiation of the House of Commons, going straight to the rights of the Peers in the highest sense, became the law of the land. These are proceedings of the Commons, and I believe many others might be mentioned; but there are other proceedings in the House of Lords. If ever there was an Act which materially touched the constitution and Privileges of the House of Commons, it was the Septennial Act, which in 1716 was introduced not in this House, but in the House of Lords. In the year 1832 there occurred a most singular instance. A Bill was introduced into the Lords, the effect of which was to alter the law with respect to the vacating of seats upon the acceptance of office under the Crown. That Bill was received by the Lords without objection;

it was debated in the Lords; a single Peer, Lord Radnor, took the objection that it dealt with the Privileges of the House of Commons, as, indeed, it did in the very highest and closest sense; that objection does not appear to have received any support from any other Peer, and the Bill was dropped before the second reading; but it was dropped, as I believe, entirely on the ground of want of time to proceed with it at the period of the Session at which it was introduced. We say, therefore, as regards this claim, such as we understand it, without seeking at this moment to commit the House, because I am arguing the matter entirely with reference to the intention of the Government as to its own proposals—we shall feel bound to deny in the most respectful but in the most unequivocal, and in the most absolute manner, the claim of Privilege which has been advanced. With every regard for the freedom of the House of Lords to assert its own privileges, should it think fit, the time for this assertion upon the present occasion, as I have already said, at any rate has not yet arrived, and I am discussing only individual, but weighty opinions; but we must unequivocally decline to accept or admit that claim of Privilege. I may say we should do that in no narrow spirit of selfish or exclusive regard to the Privileges of the House, though I hold the maintenance of the Privileges of the House the very first among the duties of its Members. This is a matter in which, in our view, the interests of the whole country and the interests of the House of Lords itself are directly concerned. If it be held, with respect to the constitution and duties of the House of Lords, that the House of Commons cannot initiate a Bill nor amend a Bill, but is reduced to the simple function of saying "Aye" or "No" upon the aggregate, what is the consequence? Among other consequences it immediately results that the House of Commons must make a corresponding counter claim, and we must say, with respect to every Bill which touches the constitution of the House of Commons, the mode of its choice, and the duties it performs, that the Lords cannot take the initiative. I need not remind the House how completely that will be at variance with the course hitherto pursued; because we almost all of us recollect what happened in 1867.

Many may remember what happened in 1832—and happened, in principle, I think, with perfect propriety—when the House of Lords came to exercise its title to pronounce an opinion adverse to that of the House of Commons upon many provisions of Bills for reforming the representation of the people. As to the general doctrine, there can be no question, in our minds, as to the duty we ought to pursue; but I ask nothing of the House upon the subject at the present moment. I may venture, without impertinence, to say this is not the first time the subject has been touched during the existence of the present Government. There have been two cases—one of them in the present year and one in 1869. An hon. Friend sitting behind me (Mr. Stapleton) proposed to introduce a Bill to alter the mode of electing representative Peers of Scotland and Ireland—undoubtedly a question directly affecting the constitution and Privileges of the House of Lords, and I venture to refer to what I said on that occasion, the 9th of March, 1869, to show that at least I do not require now to invent or profess for the first time a doctrine applicable to the present occasion. No objection was taken to the Bill on the ground that it trespassed on the Privileges of the House of Lords, and I said—

"And yet if I might give a recommendation to my hon. Friend, it would be that he should be satisfied with the introduction of the Bill, and that he should not attempt, at the present time, to press it further. I should not certainly venture to make any recommendation of the kind in a manner implying the slightest derogation from the title of any Member of this House to introduce a Bill, or of this House to pass through all its stages a Bill affecting the constitution of the House of Lords. The House of Lords has at all times exercised its unquestionable right of passing and of modifying or rejecting measures affecting the constitution of this House. The rights of the two Houses in this respect are incontestable. At the same time, as a matter of policy, I think my hon. Friend will agree with me that it is desirable that the initiative should be taken by the House of Lords itself in legislation of this kind."—[3 Hansard, xciv. 988.]

That is the principle upon which Her Majesty's Government have endeavoured to act in the present year in inviting the House of Lords to deal in the first instance with a measure which went directly to the question of the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction. So much for the general doctrine; and now let me consider the position in which we find ourselves. There has been made in the House a proposal which I may say met with general favour, and which was accepted by the Government, who anticipated any substantive Motion of my right hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Bouverie), with a declaration on their part that they had always regarded it as an improvement in this important Bill, and that the only reason which had prevented them from endeavouring to secure its adoption in the first instance as a portion of the measure had disappeared—namely, the presumed disqualification of the people of Scotland and Ireland. The question is this—can we gain the important objects we have in view of giving completeness to the Bill now before the House, with reference to appellate jurisdiction, and at the same time avoid any reasonable chance or apprehension of anything like a conflict with the House of Lords? I am bound to observe that this is an occasion upon which, if possible, the feelings of every Member of this House would induce him to desire to avoid any conflict with the House of Lords. There can be no mistake in our assertion of the rights of this House; but the circumstances under which we shall have to consider the application of them are peculiar circumstances; for the House of Lords itself has spontaneously tendered to us a Bill in which it has sacrificed the main part of this important jurisdiction as an offering to the public welfare. That, Sir, is a significant and an important fact, and it is one to which we desire to allow due and full weight. We consider it in conjunction with the public importance of passing the measure, and the great importance also of severing, if possible, the consideration of any measure involving large public interests from questions relating to conflict of jurisdiction between the two Houses. Now, we believe there is a mode of procedure which is not without sanction and analogy in the mode of procedure of Parliament, which will enable us to gain this end. If hon. Gentlemen will advert to the Amendments of which Notice has been given on the part of my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, they will perceive that a portion of those Amendments touch directly the jurisdiction of the House of Lords; whereas the larger portion of them embrace matters which, although I am very far from saying they belong exclusively to the House of Commons, yet they most properly belong to the House of Commons, because they touch the question of the judicial establishments of the country, with the charge they necessarily entail. I am not now going to speak of money Bills properly so called, for the questions of privilege and practice with regard to such Bills are so well understood that I need not refer to them; but sometimes in other Bills collaterally there arises in the view of the House of Lords the necessity for some provision which, if fully made, would entail a charge on the people of this country; and the House of Lords when it desires to attain the double object, first of all of indicating what they think public policy requires, and, secondly, of avoiding even an apparent trespass upon the province of the House of Commons, is in the habit of introducing into such Bills words indicative of its purpose, but yet, until they receive their complement by the action of this House, insufficient to give effect to those provisions. We propose to pursue an analogous course with regard to the Amendments of which we have given Notice. We propose to retain in these Amendments everything which relates to the complete and effectual constitution of the new Court of Appeal and to all matters collaterally incidental to that Court. I am now speaking, of course, of what we intend to ask the House to allow us to propose, if the House should accede to the Motion to re-commit the Bill. The whole of these provisions of the Amendments we shall ask the House to adopt. If that is done we shall at the same time forbear to ask the House to adopt those words which directly deal with the jurisdiction of the House of Lords, and the transfer of the Appeals. If the House of Lords feels disposed on the merits to deal with these beneficial provisions and to accept them it will thus be able to pursue that course without finding itself entangled in any questions relating to the Privileges of that House. The Lords will find, ready made to their hands, a Court of Appeal evidently intended for the three kingdoms, and in truth only to be justified in its details, because it is intended for the three kingdoms. But they will find nothing which, by the force of the words contained in the Bill, will either destroy or impair the jurisdiction of the House of Lords over Scotch and Irish appeals. That will be a mode of invitation from this House to the House of Lords to part with their appeals which is analogous to the invitation which the House of Lords addresses to us in certain cases to make provisions of law involving public charges, and it will enable the House of Lords to deal with the question entirely apart from perplexing matters of controversy. I may also say that this mode of procedure is one which I hope will not put the House to inconvenience by entailing any delay in our proceeding with this Bill. It is evidently for the convenience of the House that the proposal to re-commit shall be made immediately on the receiving of the Report and before the consideration of the Amendments, so that the House may have an opportunity of considering the Bill as a whole, instead of being obliged to consider the Amendments first in a fragmentary and then in a complete form. In the course of this evening we will make the necessary modifications in the Amendments which have been laid on the Table, and they will then be before the House in a form which we trust will be both effectual and pacific. We make this proposal as an act of courtesy and consideration, which we think is warranted and called for by the circumstances of the case. We are unwilling to enter into a conflict with the other House of Parliament on any subject, and we are most of all unwilling to run the risk of such a conflict—whatever we may think of any abstract proposal—when the challenge given would be in the form of a reply to a Bill by which the House of Lords has patriotically and wisely surrendered a portion of its own jurisdiction. We wish to meet and to requite, as far as belongs to us, that wisdom and patriotism of the House of Lords by an act of courtesy and consideration on the part of the House of Commons. By doing so we must express the reservation of all we think the constitutional doctrine requires with regard to the title of this House and of the other House generally, and, for the purposes of legislation, to treat with great, and I might even say unreserved freedom, those classes of subjects which, as I have shown, have constantly been matters of consideration. I hope it will be seen that, although I began with a matter which might be considered a matter of contention and controversy this was not the end I had in view. I trust it will appear that this explanation was called for in consequence of the opinions elsewhere expressed, and that it has been warranted by the peculiar circumstances of the case. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. BOUVERIE: As it was the Notice which I put on the Paper of the House in reference to the extension of the Jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal constituted under the Bill that caused all this disturbance, perhaps the House will permit me to say one or two words on the subject. Having looked into the matter, it appears to me that the contention of Privilege on the part of the House of Lords in this matter is entirely unfounded. The best evidence of it is that the proposal which I submitted, and which has brought about this great difference between the two Houses, is a proposal respecting the Jurisdiction of the House of Lords in Irish and Scotch appeals. Now, that jurisdiction was conferred on the other House by Act of Parliament. The Acts of Union between England and Scotland, and between Great Britain and Ireland, which conferred that jurisdiction, were both of them introduced in this House and carried through the other, without a single word being said, as far as I am aware of, with regard to the Privileges of the Peerage being interfered with. This, I think, affords conclusive evidence that there is no such Privilege in the present case as has been claimed. The fact is that the courtesy of this House has always been exercised in reference to many of the peculiar functions of the House of Lords as a Court of record and so forth, and the personal privileges of the Peers. The traditional feeling of this House has always been that legislation in regard to rights of Peerage ought, by the courtesy of this House, to be allowed to be initiated in the House of Lords; but there appears to be no claim to Privilege in this particular instance. With regard to the passage quoted from Blackstone, I may remark that Blackstone himself is not considered a high authority unless his statements are confirmed by previous writers, and he gives no authority for his statement as to this Privilege, God forbid, however, that we should enter into any controversy on this matter with the House of Lords! for in the whole course of our history such controversies have never led to any good result or advantage to the public service. If we enter into this controversy there can be no doubt what the issue will be; but the question naturally arises, what is the prudent and proper thing for us to do in the circumstances of the case? I do not gather from my right hon. Friend the exact course which he now proposes. Though personally I am interested in the adoption of Amendments which were originally suggested by me, I think it would have been better, after this threatened dispute with the other House, to drop the proposal in the present Session, with a view to obtain the great good which the Bill, even in its imperfect state, offers to the public, being certain that in the ensuing Session the jurisdiction relinquished by the House of Lords over English appeals cannot be permanently maintained over Scotch and Irish appeals. I should, therefore, have willingly consented to drop these Amendments, and pass the Bill, dealing solely with the English appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords. But my right hon. Friend proposes that we should make imperfect Amendments, indicating what we wish, and leaving it to the House of Lords to complete these Amendments, if they are so minded, by adding the necessary words, taking from them the whole of their appellate jurisdiction. The objection which I see at the first blush to that course would be that we should then appear upon the record to be admitting the claim of Privilege made by the House of Lords in this matter. To act with regard to this claim as the House of Lords act with regard to our undoubted money privileges by putting in imperfect clauses, to be filled up in accordance with their views of their exclusive rights and Privileges, appears to me to be an admission on our part that their claim of Privilege is a well-founded and a just one. Suppose, however, that they do not make the alterations we expect them to make, and the imperfect clauses are left as we insert them, the Bill would then be a lame and mutilated one, creditable neither to us nor the other House. That is my first impression of the course proposed by Her Majesty's Government; but I concur with my right hon. Friend that nothing is more to be deprecated than a hot conflict with the other House of Parliament as to the Privileges of either House, because the history of these contests shows that they have impeded Public Business, created ill-blood, and have conduced to no one good result.

MR. DISRAELI: The right hon. Gentleman said he addressed us in a spirit of conciliation, for which I give him every credit. I think he has, at the same time, to a certain degree addressed us in a spirit of confusion, for though I listened attentively, it was with great difficulty that I gathered—and my infirmity was shared by others—the precise intentions of Her Majesty's Ministers. On reflection they appear to me to be these:—That the House of Commons are to furnish certain salaries to certain officials, and the House of Lords are to assign to those officials the duties they are to perform in return for their salaries. That is not an unfair statement of what is proposed, and I certainly think it requires the month of July to induce a Minister to make a proposal of that kind. Almost all the resources of the Government must surely have been exhausted before such a proposal could be brought before us. It is not now for us to enter into a discussion respecting the Privileges of the House of Lords. At any time that is to be deprecated, as it is equally to be deprecated that the other House should discuss the Privileges of the House of Commons. But it is most inconvenient to enter into a discussion of so abstruse a character without any Notice on the part of the right hon. Gentleman that it was his intention to solicit the opinion of Parliament on the subject, as he has really solicited it now. It is difficult to follow the right hon. Gentleman, who comes here armed with precedents when we had no Notice of his intention to produce or discuss them. So far as I can judge, however, there is—I will not say no analogy—but no identity between his precedents and the case before us. For instance, the right hon. Gentleman quoted a Bill introduced into the other House as to the vacating of seats by Members of the House of Commons upon the acceptance of office under the Crown, and he treated that as an infringement upon our Privileges. ["No!"] Then the right hon. Gentleman treated it as a Bill which might have infringed our Privileges. But in that case there could be no collision, for the House of Lords never sent the Bill down here. So with the Bill introduced here and bearing upon the present constitution of the Scotch Peerage, there could be no question of Privilege in the House of Lords, because the Bill never left the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman cited one case which had the appearance of a precedent. I have heard it quoted before; but it is one founded upon an entire fallacy—I mean the Septennial Act. That Act was proposed in the House of Lords, and was not, it is said, thought an invasion of the Privileges of the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman treated the Septennial Act as one referring peculiarly to the House of Commons. But it was really an Act referring to the Parliament of England, and concerned the House of Lords, as much as it concerned the House of Commons. ["No!"] The hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White) seems astonished to hear that the House of Lords is a part of the Imperial Parliament. This is a fact of which he may avail himself in his next historical address to his constituents, and it may, perhaps, interest him and be of value to them. Sir, I cannot agree that this is a convenient mode of raising this question, and I think the right hon. Gentleman ought to have made the statement with which he has just favoured us at a time when we might expect it—namely, upon the consideration of the clauses which are to be brought up on the Report. We should then have entered into the subject with a more mature knowledge of the relative positions of the two Houses than we at present possess. He excuses the abrupt and unusual course he has adopted by reference to proceedings in "another place," which he thinks authorize his present course. But those proceedings elsewhere were adopted after due Notice; and though even then Her Majesty's Ministers were totally unprepared to meet the question at issue, that does not alter the fact that due Notice was given. The right hon. Gentleman is acting in error if he supposes that the Privileges of the House of Lords in this matter are built up merely upon a passage in Blackstone. That passage was brought in in an illustrative manner—merely to illustrate a position and enforce an argument to show what was the opinion prevalent in the time of Blackstone. But all the precedents of the right hon. Gentleman refer to this passage in Blackstone, and have no reference to the alleged Privilege of the House of Lords. We shall, no doubt, have another opportunity of discussing the matter when the House, having received due Notice of and time to digest the queer propositions of Her Majesty's Ministers on the matter, will be better enabled to come to a conclusion which I have no doubt will maintain the Privileges of this House and respect the Privileges of the other House of Parliament.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that he believed it would be much more in accordance with the wishes of the Irish people if the consideration of the appellate jurisdiction was postponed until next year, and he would tell the House why. The English Bill did not treat simply of appeals, but was a great measure, designed to effect extensive and beneficial reforms in all the superior Courts, and if such a Bill was required in England it was much more required in Ireland. The Government itself had recognized this, for in 1869 they passed a Bill through the House of Lords which had for its object the assimilation of the Irish system of Common Law in many important points with the English system; but that Bill did not get further than a first reading in the House of Commons, and had since disappeared entirely. No harm could possibly arise from postponing the question of Irish appeals, because the Judicature Bill could not come into operation until after next Session, and therefore the Government would have the opportunity of dealing with the Irish judicature in a thorough and efficient manner. The House had heard the opinion of the Judges and the Bar of Ireland; but there was another class of persons to be considered, and that was the suitors and the public generally—and they had very good reason to be dissatisfied with the present state of things. He, for one, was not in favour of overworking the Judges; on the contrary, he thought that those eminent persons ought to be amply sufficient in number to discharge their duties with comfort to themselves, and without undue strain on their mental and physical powers; but there was no getting over the fact that a Parliamentary Return had shown that Ireland provided only one-fifth of the amount of legal business that England did, whilst there were 12 Judges to do it, as against 17 in England. The Irish people, therefore, would object to additional expenses being incurred in new appointments until it was shown that they could not be done without. The present system was enormously expensive and cumbersome to the suitor, for the practice of a single Judge sitting at Chambers and disposing of motions of course, hardly existed in Ireland; but the time of the full Court was taken up in hearing trumpery applications in which counsel appeared on both sides, at great expense, which in England would be disposed of for a few shillings by an attorney's clerk going before a Judge in Chambers. Moreover, the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Martin) had shown last year that the Government gave away not less than 150 legal appointments, amongst the 400 Irish Barristers who practised their profession; and they could calculate for themselves what the result would be in England if the same proportion was maintained. He thought, therefore, that he had given reasons which were unanswerable in favour of the postponement of this question of Irish appeals; but he did not say anything respecting Scotch appeals, for he did not understand the question, and spoke only in the interests of the country of which he was one of the representatives.

MR. GORDON wished to remind the House that Scotch appeals were not introduced to the House of Lords by statute. About the year 1680 there was a discussion as to the right of appeal from the Scotch Courts to the House of Lords. A serious discussion arose between the petitioners to the Courts and the Judges, who went so far as to banish the advocates from Edinburgh unless they acknowledged that the judgments of the Court of Session were final and conclusive, and that there was no appeal to Parliament. There was, however, a protestation made that the subjects should have the right of appeal against the sentences pronounced in the Courts of Session. The result was that the appeals to Parliament were recognized in Scotland without any transference by the Act of Union or any statutory provision whatever. The system was, in fact, a simple continuance of a custom which existed in Scotland before the Act of Union between the two kingdoms was passed. All he wished to insist upon was that there was nothing in the Act of Union which set up the House of Lords as a tribunal for the review of Scotch decisions.

MR. GLADSTONE stated that the modified Amendments would be placed upon the Paper to-morrow morning, in order that hon. Members might have the earliest possible opportunity of understanding what was intended. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) was in error in stating that Notice was given of an intention to raise a discussion in "another place" on a question of Privilege on the Judicature Bill. Neither he nor his Colleagues had any knowledge of any such intention; but it was not a point of sufficient importance to detain the House with.

MR. DISRAELI wished to know whether it was intended to proceed with the Judicature Bill at the morning sitting on the following day?

MR. VERNON HARCOURT wished to know whether it was intended to consider the Amendments about to be put upon the Paper on the Report, before the re-committal of the Bill, or whether the Bill would be re-committed, and the Report be proceeded with after the re-committal? He wished to express his satisfaction with the entire and absolute terms in which the Prime Minister had repudiated the claim of Privilege set up by the House of Lords. That seemed to be the main question; what course would be taken with reference to the subject of the Bill was a secondary matter. It was not only satisfactory to have heard what the Prime Minister had said on this subject, but it was equally satisfactory to know that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), Leader of the Opposition, did not maintain the doctrine of Privilege asserted by the House of Lords. He should have been much surprised if a person occupying a position so eminent as that of the right hon. Gentleman had been prepared to lay the Privileges of the House of Commons at the feet of the House of Lords. It was most important that both parties in the House should enter their protest against the doctrine. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) spoke with great wisdom in respect to the authority of Blackstone, which had been cited. The right hon. Gentleman, did not seem disposed to rely upon the authority, and it would be, indeed, strange if the authority of either House of Parliament was to be made to depend upon a text-book of Common Law. On the occasion of the impeachment of Warren Hastings it was proposed to take the opinion of the Judges as to whether the impeachment abated by reason of a dissolution; but Burke, in declining to be guided by the ruling of the Judges, said he would not think of taking the opinion of a rabbit on the proper time of gestation for an elephant. That was a criticism which might properly be applied to an attempt to import the authority of Blackstone in order to determine the Privileges of either House of Parliament. The same question arose in 1856 on the occasion of a Bill being sent down to the House of Lords, the object of which was the creation of life Peerages for the express purpose of conducting the Appellate Jurisdiction. The Bill was strongly opposed in the House of Commons, and among others by the present Prime Minister. The Attorney General—the present Lord Chief Justice—rather faintly recommended the Bill to the acceptance of the House, remarking that it was not the best plan, but it was one which ought to be adopted, because the House of Lords would not consent to any other plan. Upon that argument of the Attorney General Sir James Graham said—

"The Attorney General, who proposed the second reading of this Bill, if I mistake not, told us that the defects of that tribunal were glaring, and that it was on account of those defects that the Government proposed this Bill. I am bound to add that there were several observations made by the Attorney General which filled me with amazement and fear. The hon. and learned Gentleman told us that the defects of this tribunal were glaring; that a better course might possibly be adopted than that proposed by this Bill; and he added, as a reason for passing this Bill, that the House of Lords would not surrender its Appellate Jurisdiction. I said some of the hon. and learned Gentleman's observations filled me with fear and amazement. Have we arrived at that point that we, the Commons of England, if we shall be satisfied with the judgment of the House of Lords itself as to the inefficient mode in which it now exercises its judicial functions, are to be told, when called upon to supply a remedy, that, though a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, we are not to exercise our own right of decision with respect to the remedy, and that we are to be coerced by the assertion of Her Majesty's Attorney General that the House of Lords will not surrender its Appellate Jurisdiction, and consent that a new tribunal shall be erected which, it was admitted, is not one that will fulfil all the requirements of such a Court. Have we arrived at such a pitch of degradation?"—[3 Hansard, cxliii. 436.]

That was the language of Sir James Graham, and it was the language and the sentiment of every man who deserved to occupy a position in the House of Commons such as Sir James Graham held.

MR. MACFIE said, he thought there was a great deal in the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie). The course proposed by the Government was an entirely new one, and if it were adopted it might create a precedent which would be embarrassing at some future time. He thought that, under all the circumstances of the case, it would be well to let the Bill stand over until next Session.

THE LORD ADVOCATE asserted that the appeal to the House of Lords depended upon the Act of Union only. There was no express provision on the subject; but it was only by virtue of the statute that the appeals which formerly went to the Scotch Parliament were afterwards taken to the Imperial Parliament.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the Government would adhere to their proposal of the re-commitment of the measure. He should propose to proceed to-morrow with the Judicature Bill.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

BILL.—[BILL 154.]—(Lords.)

(Mr. Attorney General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 8th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee).

PART IV.—Trial and Procedure.

Clause 54 (Power to direct trials before referees).

MR. GREGORY moved, in page 29, line 14, after "thereto," to leave out "and also without such consent in any such cause or matter." The House had a right to know who these official referees were to be, and what particular causes were to be referred to them. Were they to be barristers, solicitors, or experts, and were they to be permanently attached to the Court or appointed pro hac vice? He protested against all delegated authority, and trusted that the Committee would support him in his Amendment.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that the proposition of the hon. Gentleman would make the trial of certain causes impossible. What the clause proposed to do was done in every case at law which was referred, and it was done also in some cases by the practice of the Court of Chancery. Referees were to be appointed without the consent of the parties for conducting any inquiry which could not, in the opinion of the Court, be properly conducted in the ordinary way. The Bill proposed, as regarded documents, to continue the present practice of the Court of Chancery, and it was quite impossible that questions of detail should be examined in Court, except on appeal. Accounts in Chancery were never taken in Court, but were referred to Chambers in some way or other, and were taken by an officer termed a Chief Clerk. At Common Law such matters were referred to a Master, or to an arbitrator. They could not be taken in Court at all. He had yesterday before him a Government case, an action the account in which contained 400 items. The case was referred as soon as it came into Court. It was referred by consent, but only after the expense of the counsel for the Crown and three for the other side, and of several attendances and heavy briefs, had been incurred. The intention of the clause was to prevent useless expenditure of that description, and that references should be made without the consent of the parties. Clients were often disgusted at finding that heavy expenditure incurred in the preliminary stages of a trial were thrown away, on their case going to arbitration. As regarded cases for scientific investigation, they proposed a slight alteration. In Courts of Common Law, such cases were only referred by consent; but the Courts of Equity had power to refer them not in form but in effect to parties named by the Judge. That power had had the most beneficial effect, and he should be glad to see it exercised more frequently than it was. In one case it had saved many thousands of pounds expenditure. It was a case of pollution of water. The Lord Justice James ordered the case to be referred for report to an eminent engineer, whose report he adopted, and nothing more was heard of the case. As the Bill was intended to fuse Law and Equity, it would extend this power to Common Law. Then, as regarded cases for local investigation, it was intended to get rid of the necessity of having "juries to view." A Lord Chancellor, in a suit for the obstruction of light, once said that since the case was before him on the previous day he had been to see the place for himself, a shop in the Strand. For this he was called to account, and he had no power to do what he did; yet there could be no doubt that it was a very useful power. They proposed that the Court should have power to send an officer to view. The hon. Member for Sussex would find, on reference to the Bill, that it provided sufficient checks against the appointment of incompetent referees, or of more than were needed. At the same time, they were not wedded to these particular definitions and proposals, but would be willing to consider any others that could be suggested. These experts attached to the Court would be permanent officers of the Court, holding a position of responsibility and professional honour, and therefore giving the Court a greater hold over them than over ordinary experts. The payment of these experts would also be more moderate.

MR. HUNT regarded the question raised by the hon. Member for Sussex as a very important one, and the remarks of the Solicitor General had by no means convinced him that the view of the hon. Member on this point was wrong. He fully admitted that official referees should be appointed to hear cases which could not properly be disposed of in Court; but, at the same time, he strongly objected to the Judge having a statutory power to order cases to be referred, because the exercise of such a power by the Judge might prove most oppressive to the suitor. He also objected to the appointment of scientific experts to whom cases should be compulsorily referred, on the ground that scientific men usually held theories of their own on scientific matters, and that justice would be more likely to be done if such persons were called as witnesses than if they were to be made Judges of the cases involving scientific subjects of which they were assumed to have peculiar knowledge. He also objected to cases involving local investigations being made compulsorily referable, because nearly every case which came before the Courts might be held to involve a local investigation. It would be wiser to leave the parties at liberty to try or to refer their cases at their option, trusting to their common sense and to the advice of the Judge to induce them to refer where necessary.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL remarked that the Judges had now a statutory power to order a case to be referred where it involved a question of account.

MR. MATTHEWS said, he thought that the power to order a case to be referred ought to be exercised before it came into Court, so that parties might be saved the expense of paying counsel's fees. If the clause were agreed to in its present form, we should have a crowd of official and salaried chemists, doctors, mathematicians, and other scientific persons in the employ of the Government. That all cases might be compulsorily referred to official experts seemed to him to be a dangerous proposal to make, because such men, however honestly disposed they might be, would be liable to act upon theories of their own, and not to deal with the questions which came before them from that common-sense point of view from which juries, though less acquainted with the subject, would consider those questions. He was not prepared, therefore, on such short notice to accept that part of the clause.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he thought the clause one of the most valuable improvements in our system, which had been devised. It provided for just those cases which could not be properly tried in a Court of Justice, but which ought to be dealt with in a private room by an arbitrator. He, however, concurred with the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken in the objection which he had taken to the scientific referee.

MR. LOPES said, the clause dealt with scientific and technical cases, as well as questions of account, but there were many railway cases which would come under that description which ought to be tried by a jury. As the clause stood he thought it would confer a very dangerous power.

MR. JAMES said, the effect of the clause was that almost every case that could be conceived, might be referred. He hoped that the Committee would be disposed to consider the interests of suitors, and not give Judges an unlimited power of referring all the causes, or as many of them as they might select from the list to arbitrators.

MR. AMPHLETT said, he thought the clause went too far, and might offer a great temptation, in the hurry of Assize business, to both Judges and counsel, to get rid of a case by referring it. He hoped the Solicitor General would agree to the insertion of words requiring the reference to be made before notice of trial, and also to the omission of the words "any scientific or local investigation."

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, said, that if he had to choose between a properly qualified official referee and an ordinary arbitrator, he would prefer the former, as the latter had all the duties and none of the powers of a Judge. That clause, however, as it stood was far too sweeping, and would practically enable Judges at any time to shift from themselves the burden of trying every case. Scientific referees would generally be inclined to decide according to their preconceived theories. The Court of Chancery had now the power of taking the evidence of scientific witnesses; but here it was proposed to substitute the man of science for the Judge.

MR. STAVELEY HILL apprehended that under this clause there would be an uncertain number of referees, and that the Judges would be able to refer such causes as they might think proper. In his opinion, any cause which could be properly tried by a Judge should not be delegated to any referee.

MR. HINDE PALMER regarded this clause as one of the most important in the Bill, and hoped its main principle and object would not be destroyed, for many causes which related to matters of account and to subjects of scientific importance could not be properly tried by a Judge.

MR. VERNON HARROD questioned whether the advantages offered by the clause might not be bought at too great a price. He considered that one of the greatest scandals of the profession was the present system of reference. If the cause were to be disposed of at the Assizes, it would soon be over and done with; but in the case of a reference there were almost invariably postponements—now for the convenience of counsel, now for that of the arbitrator—and the result was dilatory proceeding, heavy expense, and great anxiety. He hoped that in the Bill the number of cases in which reference could be resorted to would be limited, and that the Committee would have some idea given them of what the expense of the new system was likely to be.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the clause was an important one, and ought to be approached from the suitors' point of view. The discussion seemed to have proceeded on a distrust of the discharge of their duty on the part of the Judges. It was apprehended that if the Bill passed as it stood the Judges would refer cases which ought to be disposed of by juries in their own Courts. In that view he, for one, could not concur. The Judges had power at this moment to refer not only all cases of account, but also all cases which involved "partly matter of mere account." It was true that no such reference could be made at Nisi Prius; but he had known cases in which causes were adjourned at Nisi Prius, and summonses subsequently taken out for a reference of each instance. He was bound to say that the cases in question ought originally to have been referred. What was now sought to be done was this—to provide that, before great expense was incurred in the giving out of briefs and otherwise, such cases should be remitted, not to arbitrators to be paid by the parties, but to a tribunal to be appointed by the Government and paid by the State. With respect to the expense of such a tribunal, he need only say that year by year the charges consequent upon it would be before the House in the Estimates, so that Parliament would have the opportunity of exercising complete control over them. The worst, therefore, that could happen—and even that he did not contemplate—would be an extravagant payment for one year.

MR. GREGORY observed, that the question before the Committee now was simply whether a man should have a right to be tried by Judge and jury, or have his case sent to a referee, whether he would or not. He proposed to withdraw his present Amendment, and, instead of that, to move to strike out from the clause the words "or any scientific or local investigation."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 29, line 16, to leave out the words "or any scientific or local investigation." — (Mr. Gregory.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

DR. BALL supported the Amendment. He objected to giving irresponsible power to any scientific persons. You might have them to assist, but he would have a legal mind present to guide and control them.

Question put.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 76; Noes 55: Majority 21.

MR. MATTHEWS proposed, in page 29, line 20, to insert after "at any time" the words "before notice of trial." His object was to prevent the scandal of persons being sent to a reference after they had gone to all the expense of preparing for a trial.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL objected to the Amendment as limiting too much the discretion of the Judge. It was not the suitor but the attorney that objected to a reference. He opposed the Amendment in the interest of the suitor.

MR. LOPES observed that references now were made in matters of account before trial.

MR. JAMES supported the Motion, which was really made in the interest of suitors. If an attorney was sincere and honourable to his client he would endeavour to prevent a reference on account of the expense inevitably caused thereby. If, on the other hand, he wished to increase his bill of costs, he would act in the contrary way. He must, however, make one remark. It was very hopeless and almost heart-breaking work for Members who remained in their places and took great pains to improve as far as they could a measure which was not a party one, to have themselves set aside by other

Mr. Gregory

Members who came in for the division and voted without hearing or understanding the question, but were merely told which were the "Ayes" and which were the "Noes." In the case of the last division the Members in the House were almost unanimous in favour of the Amendment. Yet it was lost, and he had little doubt that if a division took place on the Amendment now moved by the hon. and learned Member for Dungarvan, the result would be the same.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was sorry to hear the observations of his hon. and learned Friend, but he would endeavour to keep his temper, and would not retort.

MR. HUNT must say there was some ground in the last division for the observation of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. James). No independent Member had supported the view of the Law Officers of the Crown.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL observed that his hon. and learned Friend behind him (Mr. Hinde Palmer) had spoken on that side.

MR. HUNT admitted he had made a mistake. The Government had the support of one independent Member. But certainly the division lobby did not represent the opinion of those who had heard the debate. He thought this Amendment would require some modification. He hoped, however, it would be pressed; if it were not, he should take the sense of the Committee on the whole clause.

MR. JAMES, in explanation, said, he had criticized only the conduct of Members who were absent from their discussions.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL observed that in technical discussions of this kind the lay Members of the House ought either to have confidence in the Law Officers of the Crown, who were only actuated by a desire for the public interest, or else rely upon the opinion of such other lawyers as might be accidentally in attendance. The adoption of any other course would not be satisfactory either to the House or to the public.

MR. HUNT denied that this was a mere technical matter, but a broad and intelligible proposal whether a Judge was to have the statutory right of driving litigants to arbitration. He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman should be more careful, and not attribute improper motives to those who opposed the clause.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he had not had any such intention.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, he could not vote for words which would deprive the Judge at a trial of the power of directing a reference.

MR. F. S. POWELL vindicated the right of lay Members to discuss matters affecting the interests of suitors.

MR. C. E. LEWIS opposed the Amendment on the ground that practically it would operate as a denial of justice.

MR. MATTHEWS expressed his willingness to adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt), and to substitute for the word "time" the words "at any time by consent, and without consent before notice of trial."

MR. HUNT said, he hoped the hon. and learned Member for Dungarvan would allow his Amendment to be negatived, so that a division might be taken on the original clause, which he desired to see expunged.

Amendment negative.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 66; Noes 25: Majority 41.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 56 (Powers of Court with respect to proceedings before Referees) agreed to.

Clause 57 (Her Majesty may establish District Registries in the country for the Supreme Court).

MR. F. S. POWELL moved, in page 30, line 8, to leave out "to be thereby defined," and insert, "which shall be such as are hereinafter described." His object was to ask the Government to define and limit the area on the face of the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL opposed the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MATTHEWS moved, in page 30, line 10, after "issued," to leave out to "after-mentioned" in line 11. The object was to confine district registries to ministerial steps in an action, and to take away from them the contentious proceedings which were given by Section 60.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thought it would be better to take the discussion of this matter on Clause 60, which raised the whole question.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 58 (Seals of District Registrars) agreed to.

Clause 59 (Powers of District Registrars) agreed to.

Clause 60 (Proceedings to be taken in District Registries).

MR. RATHBONE moved in page 31, line 9, after "proceedings," to insert, "including proceedings for the arrest or detention of a ship, her tackle, apparel, furniture, cargo, or freight."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. LOPES said, he had great objection to the clause, and moved its omission. These district registries would have jurisdiction, unlimited, both as to subject-matter and geographical extent. Under the new system anyone might issue a writ in the District Registry against anyone living anywhere. If the proceedings were not removed the cause would go to judgment in the district; and the decision of the District Registrar was practically without appeal. It was true that application might be made to the Judge, who might remove the whole proceedings. But there was no inherent right of appeal, and this power of applying to the Judge was a perfect illusion, for the Judge would be too apt to think the Registrar a competent person, nor could the grounds of objection to the Registrar's jurisdiction always be stated to the Judge. The Registrars would have to exercise judicial duties, to settle pleas and issues under a new system of pleading, to deal with particulars, to decide whether interrogatories should be administered, to decide also as to discovery and inspection of documents and the taking of partnership accounts. These were matters now dealt with by Judges and Masters, but hereafter they would be dealt with by Registrars, who would be practising attorneys within the district, unassisted by any Bar. What were the benefits to the suitors to be accomplished by this sweeping change? It was said that this localization would save expense and prevent delay. As to expense, the only difference would be that hereafter under the Bill the local attorney would put the whole of the fees into his pocket, instead of dividing them with the London agent. If a man living at Truro were to bring an action against a defendant at Newcastle, the defendant must employ a person at Truro, of whom he knew nothing, to conduct his case; and as the District Registrars would decide differently all over the country upon points of law and practice, there would be the utmost confusion. He denied that the local solicitors favoured this local jurisdiction. He knew they did so with regard to the issue of writs and the dealing locally with mere ministerial matters; but they did not desire that contentious and judicial business should be disposed of locally. The example of the County Palatine was not in point, for an easy appeal existed there, and the writ did not run beyond the County Palatine, so that both plaintiff and defendant lived within the same jurisdiction. If the Government would be content to confine these District Registries to ministerial proceedings, and to remit contentious proceedings and judicial matters to be disposed of in London, or to give the parties the option of removing them upon mere application, a considerable part of his objections to the clause would be removed; but if the clause remained as it was, the practical effect would be, whilst endeavouring to redress an alleged grievance, to create one of much larger proportions, to the injury of the general body of suitors.

MR. LEEMAN said, the country solicitors in Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, Leeds, and many other of our large towns, were of opinion that if there was one portion of the Bill from which the community at large was likely to derive great benefit, it was that portion which gave to local communities the power of putting into operation the provisions of the Bill. The establishment of the County Courts was almost an analogous case to that which was proposed, and they had conferred such advantages upon the community that it had been thought advisable to entrust to them Equity, Admiralty, and Bankruptcy jurisdiction. It was the crying evil of our law that the moment they got a Chancery suit, however small might be the amount it involved, into the office of the Chief Clerk of the Court in London, they could form no idea of the time when they would get it out of that office. If, however, as proposed by that Bill, District Registrars could, by directions from the High Court of Justice, go into and take accounts, there would be far less delay and expense incurred than if the business were entirely done in London. As to District Registrars not being able, especially in the absence of the Bar, to deal with contentious business, he would remark that it was only in difficult cases that country solicitors required to consult the Bar, and that they were obliged by their education to make themselves acquainted with the practice of both Law and Equity. He hoped the Government would hold by the clause they had proposed, which, in his opinion, would work satisfactorily.

MR. RATHBONE observed that the profession in those districts where local courts existed were anxious that the clause should be adopted, and that thereby the advantages existing in certain localities should be widely extended.

SIR RICHARD BAGGALLAY said, that no objection was taken to a certain amount of jurisdiction being conferred on the District Registrars. The objection was to the magnitude of the judicial power which it was proposed to confer on gentlemen who, however well qualified to discharge the offices which they at present filled, did not possess the qualifications which usually belonged to Judges of the Superior Courts. The clause enacted that all proceedings down to the trial might be taken before these District Registrars, and they might even exercise, in certain cases, a jurisdiction equivalent to the issuing of an injunction. The duties of the Registrar ought to be limited to purely ministerial functions. He did not believe that the public were aware of what was now proposed to be done, otherwise there would be a great outcry against it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he thought he could relieve his learned Friends from some of their apprehensions by pointing out that the powers to be conferred upon Registrars would be subject to rules framed under the 64th clause by the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice of England, and a majority of the Judges—subject to the approval of Parliament. That was a guarantee that no powers would be given them which they were not qualified to exercise; and it was out of the question to suppose that they would be entrusted with the power of issuing injunctions. It had been found in practice in the County Palatine that the powers conferred by the clause had been of the greatest use, and had saved enormous expense. Sixty per cent of the writs issued by the Registrars never went any further. The causes became undefended actions, and all further expenses and costs were saved, which was a mercy to the defendants. The Committee might safely leave the power of making these rules in the hands of the Judges.

MR. MATTHEWS opposed the clause, observing that it allowed absurd and irrational things to be done, which the Judges were to endeavour to prevent by the framing of Rules of Court.

MR. TORR said, this seemed to be a contest between the London and the country lawyers. But the suitors were the persons to be considered. He regarded it as a most important and valuable feature of the Bill that it did away with the extensive centralization, which in legal matters now existed in London.

DR. BALL said, there was nothing in the Bill to limit the jurisdiction in which these writs should be issued. He would suggest that the District Registrars should be left as they were, and the power of issuing writs retained; but that no writ should be served on a defendant who resided more than a certain distance from the particular Registry from which the writ proceeded. It would place a vast power of annoyance in the hands of litigants if some such limit was not fixed.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he thought the power which his right hon. and learned Friend sought was contained in the 4th sub-section of Clause 64, which laid down rules for the conduct of the practice and procedure of the Courts.

MR. C. E. LEWIS pointed out that the 7th rule in the Schedule would work harshly in many cases. For instance, a London merchant served with a writ issued out of a County Court in Dorsetshire would have, if the writ had been specially endorsed, to obtain permission from the Judge to show that he had sufficient prima facie evidence for a good defence before he could be allowed to proceed in the action. It would be a hardship upon a man, to compel him to go to long distances and incur considerable expense in order to take the initiatory steps towards meeting what was perhaps an illusory claim.

MR. WHALLEY complained that the Bill was being passed through Committee without any Member being able to understand it who was not a lawyer. In his opinion, the Government were bound to explain what was the precise grievance to suitors with which this clause proposed to deal. It was quite a new thing to lay down in an Act of Parliament rules for a system of procedure for a purpose that was not strictly necessary.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, added to the Bill.

Clause 61 (Power for Court to remove proceedings from District Registraries) agreed to.

Clause 62 (Accounts and inquiries may be referred to District Registrars) agreed to.

Clause 63 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142. ss. 5, 7, 8, 10, to extend to actions in High Court).

MR. MATTHEWS moved, in page 82, line 6, to leave out the word "fifth," the object being to omit the continuance of the 5th clause of the County Courts Act, as it was now unnecessary, upon the ground that under the present Bill the question of costs would be in the discretion of the Judge.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that it would, in his opinion, be necessary to retain the 5th section of the County Courts Act.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 64 to 72, inclusive, agreed to.

PART V.

Officers and Offices.

Clause 73 (Transfer of existing staff of officers to Supreme Court).

MR. R. N. FOWLER (for Viscount MAHON) moved an Amendment to entitle District Registry Clerks of the Court of Probate to the same progressive salaries and the scale of superannuation as were enjoyed by the clerks of the principal Registry Office, and to secure retiring allowances to those persons. The case of these men well deserved the consideration of the Committee. He therefore begged to move the insertion of the Amendment which stood in the name of his noble Friend (Viscount Mahon).

Amendment proposed,

In page 36, line 29, after the word "thereof," to insert the words "District registry clerks of the Court of Probate shall moreover be entitled to the same progressive salaries and scale of superannuation as are enjoyed by the clerks of the principal registry office; and it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to grant to any clerk in a district registry attached to the Court of Probate, who from age, infirmity, or other causes may desire or have to retire from his duties on the coming into operation of this Act, or at any time thereafter, who may have had continuous employment in such district registry, and in the office of any registrar of the courts formerly exercising jurisdiction in matters and causes testamentary (abolished by the Court of Probate Act, 1857), for twenty years and upwards immediately before such retirement, an annual allowance of two-thirds of the salary and emoluments of his office."—(Mr. Robert Fowler.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. MONK said, he thought the case of the District Registrars one of great hardship. They ought to be placed on the same footing with regard to superannuation as the other Civil servants.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he was not surprised that the noble Viscount who proposed this Amendment had run away from it. It had nothing whatever to do with the Bill. The reason why they were not placed in the same position as the clerks in the principal Registry was because they did not do half the work.

MR. STAVELEY HILL maintained that the District Registry Clerks were entitled to be placed in the same position as the Registry Clerks in the Chief Court of Probate, and were as much entitled to proper superannuation as Equity Judges.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not see any hardship in the case of these men. They had hired themselves on certain terms, and they got what they bargained for. They were not Civil servants. Every Civil servant must produce a certificate from the Civil Service Commission, which none of these individuals could do. In the next place, Civil servants were the servants of the Crown, but these men were appointed by the Registrars.

Mr. R. N. Fowler

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 49; Noes 171: Majority 122.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 74 (Officers of Courts of Pleas at Lancaster and Durham).

MR. A. EGERTON said, that as there was no chance of the Bill passing this Session he would move that the Chairman report Progress. It was important that the Turnpikes Acts Continuance, &c., Bill, which stood on the Orders, should not be brought on, as it had hitherto been, at the small hours.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he could hardly think that the hon. Member was serious in making the proposal. It was wholly without precedent, on a measure of first-rate magnitude for which the Government was responsible, to move until midnight, or until after midnight, and in the absence of any special cause, that the Chairman should report Progress. In all his experience he never knew such a proposal being made, and as it was the first, so he hoped it would be the last. The hon. Member was entitled to the credit, whatever it might be, of the originality of the step; but as it broke up the uniform practice of the House he trusted the Committee would not adopt it.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, the reason why it was desired that the further progress of this measure should be stopped at that point was the desire on the part of many hon. Members that they should proceed with the Turnpike Acts Continuance, &c., Bill—a Bill of such importance that it should be considered before the small hours of the morning.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that he would pledge himself that if the Bill referred to did not come on until an hour after midnight he would not proceed with it, and that, as far as he could, he would give a full opportunity for its consideration.

MR. A. EGERTON said, that under the circumstances he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. RAIKES moved to amend the clause to the effect that vacancies in the Courts should be filled "with the concurrence" of the President of the Division of the High Court of Justice, who was more likely to understand the requirements than was the Lord Chief Justice, whose name stood in the clause.

Amendment proposed.

In page 37, line 20, to leave out the words "Lord Chief Justice of England," and insert the words "President of the Division of the High Court of Justice to which such officer is attached,"—(Mr. Raikes,) —instead thereof.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he proposed to leave out that portion of the clause requiring such concurrence, so that the concurrence of the Treasury would alone be required.

DR. BALL observed that it would cause great dissatisfaction among the Judges if the Lord Chancellor and the First Lord of the Treasury, who were both Members of the Cabinet, should be given the power of abolishing offices connected with the Courts.

MR. JAMES thought that the convenience of some one of the high legal dignitaries should be required.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK inquired whether the section would affect the extensive patronage of the Master of the Rolls?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that when the Report of the Select Committee which had inquired into the subject was carried into effect it would practically abolish the extensive patronage.

MR. COLLINS remarked that it was taken too much for granted that that Report would be acted upon; the fact being that the House usually reversed the decisions of its Committees.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he must ask again what would become of the patronage of the Master of the Rolls, which was very considerable, both legal and literary? It was no answer to say the question had been dealt with by a Committee upstairs.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL intimated that the question was under the consideration of the Government, who would deal with the Report of the Committee. As to the Amendment, he would agree to the words "Lord Chief Justice" being left out of this clause; but he could not agree to the insertion of the other words, because he thought that the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury might be trusted to do what was right with offices as vacancies occurred.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH pointed out that the Committee had reported, and the question was whether the Government would take action on it?

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK wished to know whether it was intended to separate the patronage now vested in the Master of the Rolls?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the Government would be responsible for any alterations that might be made; but he could not give an intelligible answer until after the Government had carefully considered the Report of the Committee. When that had been done, he would give the best answer he could.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 99; Noes 160: Majority 61.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 75 (Personal officers of future Judges).

MR. LOPES moved in page 38, line 34, to leave out "secretary," and insert "principal clerk." The effect of the clause would be to lower the status of the clerks to the Common Law Judges. This proposal of the Government was on the score of economy, but upon a principle which he thought unwise. His Amendment was intended to retain the salaries and positions of the officers of the Judges as they now were as nearly as possible.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL pointed out that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member would deprive the Equity Judges of their secretaries, who were barristers, and capable of performing legal duties.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL observed that the services of the clerk were invaluable to the barrister; that it was he, and not the country, who ought to reward him.

Amendment negatived.

MR. HINDE PALMER moved, in page 38, line 38, after "justice," insert—

"Who shall belong to the Chancery division, a secretary whose salary shall be four hundred pounds per annum, a principal clerk whose salary shall be three hundred pounds per annum, and a junior clerk whose salary shall be one hundred and twenty pounds per annum, and to each of the other judges of the High Court of Justice."

LORD JOHN MANNERS moved that the Chairman report Progress, as there was a desire on the part of many hon. Members that reasonable time should be afforded for the discussion of the next Order—the Turnpike Acts Continuance, &c., Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE said, if it were the wish of the House he would consent to reporting Progress.

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH, as Chairman of the Select Committee on the Bill, said, that many hon. Members were in attendance in anticipation of the Bill coming on.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

TURNPIKE ACTS CONTINUANCE, &c.

BILL. [BILL 199.]

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Stanfeld.)

COMMITTEE.—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [3rd July],

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to make provision for rendering compulsory in England and Wales the Highway Acts 1862 and 1864." — (Lord George Cavendish.)

Question again proposed.

MR. WELBY said, there were three objections raised to the Instruction before the Committee—namely, that the Highway Acts themselves ought to be first amended; that if they were to be made compulsory, it should be by Bill, not by Instruction; and that it was too late in the Session for either. This last was no fault of the Committee which sat on the subject, and of which he was a Member, nor of the Government. The Bill might have been read a second time on 26th of June, but for the Notice of opposition given by the noble Lord the Member for South Wiltshire (Lord Henry Thynne). To proceed by Instruction was the only course open to the Select Committee after the Government had said they could not find time for a Bill, and to insist on amending the Acts first was equivalent to refusing to do anything. The hon. and learned Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross) had suggested that the Government should even at that late period take up the question; but that course was not now practicable, and if the matter was to be dealt with at all this year, it must be done in the way now proposed and no other. The Select Committee had to provide for the extinction of the trusts referred to them as speedily as was consistent with the repayment of a fair proportion of their debts, and with the proper maintenance of the roads for the future. For this purpose the whole or most of the toll-income must be applied to the debts, and the maintenance provided from other sources. There was nothing new in this, as alleged. It had been constantly done for many years. Out of 503 trusts under the Continuance Act in 1867, 107 were wholly or partially repaired by the parishes; and 19 out of the 65, which after certain deductions, had been dealt with by the Select Committee this year. But the Committee thought that when the repair of roads was thrown on the individual parishes, very severe hardship often resulted; but if it were thrown on a highway district instead of the parish, a great portion of that hardship would disappear. Where the district through which the turnpike trust ran was partly under the operation of the Highway Act and partly was not, the greatest difficulty was experienced in coming to any equitable arrangement under those circumstances, and if the Act was made compulsory, many of their difficulties would be removed. Indeed, making the Highway Act compulsory appeared to afford the best and almost the only chance of maintaining the roads in anything like efficient repair. Parishes allowed them to decay partly from the expense, partly from the incompetence of overseers. The Highway Acts were already in force in 34 counties out of 49; and the sooner they were made compulsory the cheaper it would be, because the expense of them lay not in maintaining, but in bringing up to a proper state roads which had been allowed to decay. When well worked the Acts were economical. He therefore hoped the Committee would adopt the instruction.

MR. ASSHETON said, he was in favour of highway districts, and should like to see the Highway Act made compulsory; but he objected to effect even good objects by a side wind, and he should certainly vote against the present Bill.

Mr. Hinds Palmer

COLONEL BRICE thought the present highway system worked well, but under it there were instances of jobbery. The old parochial system, with a proper county administration, would prove, in his opinion, most effective in highway districts. To the present Bill he should offer every opposition.

COLONEL KINGSCOTE was in favour of the proposed Instruction to the Committee. In his district the highway system had worked well.

LORD HENRY THYNNE said, the Government seemed to have an utter disregard of the rights of the ratepayers. He maintained that the ratepayers ought not to be taxed for the benefit of those persons who did not maintain the roads in a proper state. The subject could not possibly be discussed at that hour (it was now five minutes past One A.M.) and he moved that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Lord Henry Thynne.)

MR. HENLEY said, they were placed in an unfair position—a position that the Government ought not to place the House in. He maintained that this Turnpike Acts Continuance Bill was brought forward by a sidewind, by which the Government were trying to impose a heavy compulsory tax upon the whole country. It was now past One o'clock, and he hoped the Government would withdraw the Bill.

MR. WHALLEY said, that this was the natural supplement of the Highway Act, and the turnpikes could not be altogether done away with till the area of taxation was enlarged and fairly adjusted.

MR. PELL said, the Highway Act was most defective. It encouraged jobbery, and if amended there would be no necessity for the Turnpike Continuance Bill.

MR. HIBBERT asked that the Motion for adjournment should be withdrawn, in order that the Instruction might be discussed. ["No."] The Government would be guided by the opinion of the House, and, as far as he was able to judge, the House was in favour of the Instruction. The Government were of opinion that the Highway Acts ought to be amended, and would be prepared to introduce a Bill for that purpose at a sufficiently early period next Session.

Question put:

The House divided:—Ayes 58; Noes 115: Majority 57.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. CLARE READ said, that they were at half-past One in the morning discussing a measure which was of more importance to the rural districts of England than many matters which were mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. It was most unfair to attempt to introduce into a Turnpike Acts Continuance Bill by a sidewind a proposal so important as this which would render the Highway Acts compulsory throughout England and Wales. He protested against the House being called upon to proceed with this important Bill at so advanced an hour. He therefore moved that the House do now adjourn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Clare Read.)

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH expressed a hope that the House would consent to divide on the Instruction, and that the Amendment would be withdrawn.

LORD JOHN MANNERS also expressed a hope that the House would divide on the Question. The Government in a very little time would become more potent to carry their measures than they were at present, and the present was the best opportunity to divide on the Question.

Question put:

The House divided:—Ayes 44; Noes 116: Majority 72.

Original Question again proposed.

It was now Two of the clock A.M. The discussion was continued by hon. Members, in a continually diminishing House, with alternative Motions for the Adjournment of the House and the Adjournment of the Debate. The opponents of the Motion persistently urged the impropriety of making the existing Highways Acts compulsory, and imposing a permanent burden of Local Taxation, by the "sidewind" of introducing an "Instruction" into a Bill for Turnpike Acts Continuance.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Colonel Parker.)

The House divided :—Ayes 46; Noes 104: Majority 58.

Original Question again proposed.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Joshua Fielden.)

The House divided :—Ayes 44; Noes 99: Majority 55.

Original Question again proposed.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Colonel Barttelot.)

The House divided :—Ayes 40; Noes 94: Majority 54.

Original Question again proposed.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

The House divided :—Ayes 41; Noes 91: Majority 50.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. HIBBERT said, he would consent to the adjournment of the debate, on the understanding that the hon. and gallant Member for East Essex (Colonel Brise) would withdraw his Notice to move—"That this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," and that it would not be put down on the Paper by any other Member.

COLONEL BRISE was understood to agree to this arrangement so far as his Notice was concerned; but said he could not be answerable for the action of any other hon. Member.

Motion made, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Frederick Walpole.)

At length,

Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned," put and agreed to.

Debate adjourned, at half-past Three A.M., till this day (Friday).

CHURCH DISCIPLINE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. WHALLEY, Bill to repeal so much of the Act of the third and fourth years of Her present Majesty, chapter eighty-six, commonly called "The Church Discipline Act," as deprives the Laity of the power of prosecuting the Clergy for offences against the Ecclesiastical Discipline of the Church of England, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WHALLEY and Mr. JONES PARRY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 234.]

REGULATION OF RAILWAYS (RETURNS)

BILL

On Motion of Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, Bill to make further provision for the Regulation of Railways, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE and Mr. ARTHUR PEEL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 232.]

TREASURY CHEST FUND BILL

On Motion of Mr. WILLIAM HENRY GLADSTONE, Bill to reduce the limit of the available Balance of the Treasury Chest Fund, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WILLIAM HENRY GLADSTONE and Mr. BAXTER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 233.]

Then the other Orders of the Day, 46 in number, having been disposed of,

House adjourned at Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 11th July, 1873.

MINUTES.]—POSTAGE BILLS.—First Reading—Militia (Service, &c.) * (206).

Second Reading—Gas and Water Works Facilities Act, 1870, Amendment (201); Court of Queen's Bench (Ireland) (Grand Juries) * (184).

Committee—Law Agents (Scotland) (163-207); Colonial Church * (208-208).

Committee—Report—Blackwater Bridge (Composition of Debt) * (199); Indian Railways Registration * (164).

Report—Prison Officers Superannuation (Ireland) * (192); Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 6) * (157).

Third Reading—Statute Law Revision * (174); Canada Loan Guarantee * (183), and passed.

ALDERNEY (HARBOUR AND FORTIFICATIONS).—QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET rose to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Select Committee in last Session on the Works in Alderney, and to ask what decision the Government had arrived at with respect to the maintenance of those Works? The circumstances which had led to the construction of these Works were well known to their Lordships. They were commenced about a quarter of a century ago—in 1847, he believed—on the recommendation of the first naval and military authorities of the day, and with the sanction of the Duke of Wellington and Sir John Burgoyne, who considered them essential to the protection of the Channel and very important to the defence of the United Kingdom itself. They were completed after a very large expenditure of money in 1859 or 1860. The maintenance of the works in repair required a certain annual expenditure; and in 1867 great damage was done to the breakwater by heavy storms, which had been repaired at great outlay. Objection being taken to this expenditure in the House of Commons, the Secretary to the Treasury stated that as soon as the harbour was finished it would be necessary to commence the fortifications for its defence, whereas the fact was that they had already been constructed, and the whole works as a system of national defence were completed. The Select Committee for which he moved last Session unanimously recommended that the Government should seriously consider the course to be adopted. The question to be decided, they said, was in what way the fortified harbour should be now treated—whether it should be maintained in whole or in part—or destroyed and obliterated, or allowed gradually to perish by neglect?—and they stated that there was a very general concurrence of opinion amongst military and naval officers that in case of war the harbour at Alderney would be of great service and that the altered conditions of naval war did not detract from its value as a look-out station; as to the question of abandonment, they stated that the immense mass of materials would hold together for many years and afford an incomplete shelter to vessels of war, from which, if seized by an enemy, it would be difficult to dislodge him; and therefore to leave the breakwater in existence and to leave it undefended, Colonel Jervois said, was a proceeding which could not be contemplated. As to the question of the destruction of the harbour and fortifications, the work would, if possible at all, be extremely difficult, and at all events very costly, and Parliament after having expended £1,500,000 on the works would hardly now be disposed to vote a large sum of money for their destruction. He therefore desired to ask Her Majesty's Government what decision they had arrived at with respect to these works? The Lord Privy Seal, who was at the Admiralty a great part of the time that the works were carried on, and was more responsible than himself for them, asked him early in the Session to postpone his Motion, in order that the Government might have another examination and report of the actual state of the breakwater, and he believed they had since had a full Report from a naval engineer, a military engineer, and an independent civil engineer. But it was not only on account of the importance that might be attached to Alderney as a harbour of refuge and a base for naval operations, that he pressed the Government to come to a decision—it was unfair to the inhabitants of the island that matters should be left in their present condition. The lights which these works rendered necessary at a cost of £60 a-year, had hitherto been provided by the Government, but this year they took a very economical view, and the Board of Trade had decided that they would no longer be maintained. On the States being summoned, it was shown that the whole revenue of the island was only £750 a-year. Every great country had its debt, and the public debt of Alderney involved an annual charge of £88 or £90; and they had a standing army of 25 police. Then there was the comparatively handsome contribution of £50 a-year for education, besides other charges, and the States said £60 a-year for the lights would ruin them. Thinking they might influence the Chancellor of the Exchequer, they urged on the Treasury that the breakwater had not been made by them, that there was a shoal at the extremity of it, and that what with the breakwater and the shoal they would be shut out from communication unless the lights were kept up, though they had a communication before the breakwater was made. The Chancellor of the Exchequer so far relented as to say he would do nothing this year; but unfortunately his own motto—Ex luce lucellum occurred to his mind, and he thought that by putting out the light he could gain £60 a-year. Alderney had either therefore to pay or be left in darkness. This was a serious thing; last December several vessels were injured owing to the absence of the light. The forts contained about 200 guns, with some artillery and troops, and either the forts must be blown up and the troops withdrawn, or some landing-posed at the Foreign Office. A proposal had recently been made that a joint Commission of the four Powers should be appointed to draw up a line of frontier, and that in the meanwhile, to prevent collisions, the status quo should be observed till the line had been settled and marked out by the Commission. England and Russia were perfectly agreed on these proposals, and he had every reason to believe that the question would be settled. This would remove all serious difficulties between two countries whose interest it obviously was to maintain the most friendly relations, and such relations were important, not only to themselves, but to European Powers.

LAW AGENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

(No. 163.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order)

Clauses 1 to 4 agreed to.

LORD COLONSAY moved to insert a clause to the effect that every member of the Society of Writers to the Signet should be enrolled as a law agent on producing his certificate from the Society. He objected that the Writers to the Signet should be called upon to apply for admission and submit to a fresh examination. They were a body of professional men who had already passed a most searching examination, and whose right to practise in the Supreme Courts in virtue of their commissions as Writers to the Signet had been recognized by statute since the first half of the 16th century.

Moved, after Clause 4, to insert the following clause—

"Every person who shall hereafter be admitted a Member of the Society of Writers to the Signet shall be enrolled as a law agent by the registrar on producing a certificate of his admission by an officer authorised by the Society to grant such certificate."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he admitted the high position and great legal attainments of the Writers to the Signet; but he could not see any sufficient reason for exempting them from the examination required for admission as law agents. To do so would be to infringe the principle upon which the Bill was based—namely, to throw open the profession of law agents to all persons who passed the necessary examination, and it could surely be no hardship upon a Writer to the Signet, who had successfully passed a very strict examination, to ask him also to submit to the less trying ordeal through which law agents might be required to pass.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND regretted the refusal of the noble and learned Lord to accept the Amendment. The main object of the Bill was to raise the standard of legal education in Scotland, and he could see no reason why the Writers to the Signet should not obtain the exemption proposed in the clause now proposed.

LORD COLONSAY said, that to pass the Bill in its present shape would defeat one of the main objects of the Bill—namely, to raise the standard of legal education in Scotland. The Writers to the Signet had now to pass a series of very severe examinations, and they could scarcely be expected to submit to double examination; so that if the Bill passed in its present form, it would possibly lower the standard to the level of that which intending law agents were to be called upon to undergo.

After a few remarks from Lord CAIRNS,

On Question? Their Lordships divided: Contents 39; Not-Contents 46: Majority 7.

Resolved in the Negative.

Clauses 5 to 9 agreed to.

Clause 10 (Exceptions to rule that applicants shall undergo examination as to fitness to practise).

On the Motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR, Amendment made that no person who was under indenture at the time of the passing of the Procurators Act, or should have completed his apprenticeship prior to that date, shall be required to undergo an examination in general knowledge.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 11 to 24 agreed to.

Clause 25 (Repealing Clause).

LORD COLONSAY said, that by this clause the Procurators (Scotland) Act, 1865, was repealed; but it was provided that the repeal of that Act should not prevent Societies formed under the Act continuing to exist as "unincorporated bodies." He proposed to amend the clause by substituting the word "incorporated" for "unincorporated."

Earl Granville

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

LORD COLONSAY moved to insert the following new clause at the end of the Bill—

"Except in so far as relates to striking the name of any person off the roll of law agents, nothing in this Act shall be held to affect the existing powers of inferior Courts, or the Judges thereof, over Procurators practising before such Courts, so far as these powers may be necessary for supporting the jurisdiction, and maintaining the authority of several Courts."

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Tuesday next, and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 207.)

GAS AND WATER WORKS FACILITIES

ACT (1870) AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Earl Cowper.)

(no. 201.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

EARL COWPER, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was to enable any Gas or Waterworks Company to obtain Provisional Orders from the Board of Trade, authorizing an amendment of their special Act, in relation either to the prescribed illuminating power, or the prescribed maximum price, or the prescribed pressure of the gas, to be supplied. Certain necessary notices having been given, the Board of Trade was to consider the application, and if they signified their assent, the Provisional Orders were to be valid, and to come into operation without awaiting the confirmation by Parliament, which, however, was to be obtained as speedily as possible.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>d</sup>."
(The Earl Cowper.)

LORD REDESDALE said, the Bill appeared to him to require very serious consideration. It seemed to him to be a very dangerous step to confer upon the Board of Trade the power by their mere approval of an application for a Provisional Order, to do that which hitherto had been done only by the Legislature. It also seemed to him strange to introduce the principle that a Company which was not working at a profit might apply to the Government for permission to increase their rates. It might be a very proper thing to do where, from circumstances for which they were not answerable, they were carrying on their business at a loss; but, under ordinary circumstances, Companies should be held to their chance of profit and loss, like any other description of traders. The Act seemed to fix 5 per cent as the rate of profit to which the Companies were entitled. But a statutory stipulation that the rate of profit was not to exceed 5 per cent under extraordinary circumstances was in effect to fix a minimum dividend for ordinary circumstances.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he thought the Bill in some respects a useful one, and therefore he would not oppose the second reading; but, as it was only delivered that morning, it was proceeding in great haste to ask for the second reading that evening. The Bill gave very large powers to the Board of Trade, and consequently it ought to be seriously considered before it left that House. The Companies ought to be required to show that, through the great increase in the price of coals, or from some other cause, they were working at a loss. He hoped sufficient time would be given before it came on for consideration in Committee.

*Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>d</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.*

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, to Monday next,
Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 11th July, 1873.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Ecclesiastical Commissioners* [235]; Slave Trade (East African Courts)* [236].

Committee—Supreme Court of Judicature [154]

—R.P.

Committee—Report—Military Manœuvres* [215]; Revising Barristers* [221].

Third Reading—Public Records (Ireland) Act (1867) Amendment* [217], and passed.

Withdrawn—Public Health [99].

The House met at Two of the clock.

Mr. SPEAKER having taken the Chair,
PARLIAMENT—STRANGERS ORDERED TO WITHDRAW.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY, addressing Mr. SPEAKER, said: Sir, I call your attention to the circumstance that strangers are in the House. I am quite ready to give my reasons for taking this course if you think it necessary that I should do so, but I have no desire to do so at the present moment.

MR. SPEAKER: Strangers must withdraw.

Those parts of the House to which Strangers were admitted were accordingly cleared by the officers of the House.

On Strangers being again admitted (at about half-past Two of the clock), the House was proceeding with the "Questions."

The following, which was published by The Times journal the following morning, is believed to be an accurate memorandum of what took place during the exclusion of Strangers.

MR. BOUVERIE rose and said, he presumed that the hon. Member for Galway, who had called the attention of the Speaker to the presence of Strangers, did not intend that the House should go on until the end of the Session without reports of their proceedings. He did not know the exact circumstances which had induced the hon. Member to take the course which he had adopted; but he felt that the rule under which it was possible to adopt that course was one that could only be maintained if used reasonably and for just cause, and he hoped that the eyes of his hon. Friend would not continue to be so sharp if Strangers should again be found in the House.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that with the permission of the House, he would very briefly state the reasons which had induced him to take the course he had done. Far from wishing to exclude Strangers or to prevent reports of the proceedings of the House, his only desire was that fair and reasonably accurate reports of their proceedings should appear, and it was because he and other Irish members believed that they were systematically ill-treated in this matter, that he had been driven to call attention to the rule of the House excluding Strangers. He never spoke in that House without feeling as though he was undergoing a painful operation, for he was sensible how much the views of Irish Members were out of harmony with the mind of the House; but he also felt very strongly the duty that was cast upon Irish representatives to be faithful to their convictions. Yesterday he had very reluctantly interposed in the discussion raised by the Prime Minister on the Judicature Bill to state the views of some portion of the Irish people on a matter peculiarly affecting them, and although he rose amid noise and interruptions which were not unusual, he believed that the House itself admitted that there was force and weight in his arguments. It was essential to justify his interference on that important occasion that he should state some important facts, and in his brief statement he had done so. Very likely some hon. Members might blame him and think it presumptuous to complain; but he would not be so foolish as to deny that he wished those who sent him and other Irish Members to the House to know what on very important matters was said on their behalf. The privilege of sending reporters to the Gallery was not for the private advantage of the proprietors of newspapers, but it carried with it an implied moral obligation that reasonably full reports should be given of what Members had said in intelligible language, and not that any class should be very imperfectly reported or be nearly excluded. Of course, he well knew that the first consideration was due to eminent Members on both sides of the House, and he asked for nothing unreasonable, but only for fair play; not so much to himself, as to Irish constituencies. He did not know what changes had occurred, but he did believe that the arrangements for reports were not what they ought to be, and, unless something was done, he believed, with many Members, that assistance towards reports would have to be given by the House itself. Having said this, he did not wish to persevere in any course that was disagreeable to the House.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that as his hon. Friend had had the opportunity of stating his views, and of complaining as he had done, of some reports of proceedings that were not what he thought they ought to be, he presumed that he would be ready to give way to the general feeling of the House, and, indeed, he hoped it would be so, for if often resorted to it would not be possible to maintain the rule as to the exclusion of Strangers.

MR. WHALLEY: I desire to avail myself of the question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Galway by reminding the House that I have in my own way endeavoured to attract attention to the same subject, and there can be no doubt that, so far as informing the public of what passes here, the present system of reports is open to the charge that they are in a high degree deceptive and calculated to mislead. From 12 to 1, 2, 3, or 4 o'clock most important business is frequently done, and as to which the public, while under the general impression that they know what passes in this House, are completely ignorant; and it was as to the form of words in which The Times, in common with the other papers, slurs over this—giving the impression that it is a report of our proceedings, while, in fact, no report whatever is given—that I called attention under the form of breach of Privilege. I entirely concur with the hon. Member in his suggestion, that if any report is given it should be correct and sufficiently full as not to mislead. On those subjects in which I take an interest it so happens that the gentlemen in the Gallery have had it imputed to many of them that the reports which they give may be given under a bias. The Weekly Register some time since boasted that the Metropolitan Press was now almost wholly under the control of Roman Catholics, who fill their offices, and especially the Reporters' Gallery, a very large and undue proportion of whom—I have heard it stated at four-fifths—are of that faith.

An hon. MEMBER rose to Order, and the SPEAKER ruled that it was not open to the hon. Member for Peterborough to continue that line of observation.

MR. SPEAKER then said, that after what had passed he felt that he was consulting the general wish of the House in directing that strangers should now be re-admitted.

ARMY—SERVICE IN INDIA—LIMITATION OF AGE—QUESTION.

MR. W. M. TORRENS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in accordance with the Address to the Crown of the 20th June 1871, praying that youths under twenty years of age should no more be sent as soldiers to India, and the gracious reply of Her Majesty that the Queen would give directions in conformity with the desire of the House, the practice has been discontinued; or, whether it is true, as currently stated, that many soldiers under the age referred to have been sent out within the last twelve months?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the Address was modified by the addition of the words—"as far as practicable," and a Departmental Committee, of which the Inspector General of Recruiting was President and the Director General of the Army Medical Department was a Member, was appointed to consider the best means of giving effect to it. The Report of that Committee was laid upon the Table of this House. His Royal Highness's directions are in conformity with that Report, and I have had no reason to suppose that these directions have been departed from.

INDIA—SCRIPTURE READERS—MR. SANDWELL.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is the fact that the Commander-in-Chief in India dismissed from the station of Meen Mico in the Presidency of Bengal, Mr. Sandwell, a scripture reader, for the offence of lending to a soldier a pamphlet entitled "The Underground Railway to Rome," such pamphlet having been furnished to the said scripture reader by the Protestant chaplain of the station? He could assure the hon. Gentleman he had the information on the best authority.

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, no information, official or unofficial, has reached the India Office with regard to the matter alluded to in the Question of the hon. Gentleman.

NATIONAL EDUCATION COMMISSIONERS—THE CALLAN SCHOOLS—DISMISSAL OF REV. ROBERT O'KEEFE. MOTION FOR COMMITTEE WITHDRAWN.

QUESTION.

MR. BOUVERIE: I wish, Sir, to put to my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government a Question of some importance, relating to the Notice of Motion which stands in my name, on the subject of the Callan Schools and Mr. O'Keeffe. Since I gave that Notice, Papers have been placed in the hands of Members having a direct bearing on the subject of my Resolution. One part of that Resolution had regard to the past, and another related to the future. With regard to the past, I intended to propose that the House should express its regret for the course which had been taken by the National Board of Education with regard to the Rev. Mr. O'Keeffe, and as respects the future I intended to ask the House to lay down a rule for the conduct of the Board in similar cases hereafter. The Papers which have been delivered to hon. Members this morning show that a rule has been suggested by Her Majesty's Government to the Commissioners for their future guidance in similar cases, which, practically and substantially, is the same as I would have asked the House to agree to, and that rule it appears has been accepted by the Commissioners. Therefore, that part of my object has been answered. But though security has been given for the future, I still think that reparation for the past is due to the Rev. Mr. O'Keeffe. I understand, however, that Her Majesty's Government do contemplate that the new rule will be applied to the case of that rev. gentleman, and I can only say, therefore, that if the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government can give a satisfactory answer in this respect, and can assure me that the Government have every reason to believe, and will take every means in their power to insure, that Mr. O'Keeffe shall be fairly heard, and his right to be manager of the schools shall be considered by the National Board, without reference to his being a suspended priest; then the second object of my Resolution will be answered. The rev. gentleman will then have got the reparation which is his due, and the House will have obtained the assurance for the future which it has a right to demand. In that case it will not be necessary for me to trouble the House by moving my Resolution on Monday, and I now therefore beg to ask my right hon. Friend what is the view which the Government take of the matter?

MR. GLADSTONE: I hope, Sir, I shall be able fully to meet the wishes expressed by my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Bouvierie

Before answering his question I will first say one word upon the past. My right hon. Friend will bear in mind that when he raised this question during the last Session of Parliament—and no one could be surprised that it should have been raised by some hon. Member of the House—my noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland and I myself were not in full possession of the facts of the case. We admitted that we could not produce what in our judgment would be a full justification for the course of action which had been pursued, and we likewise admitted that Her Majesty's Government must, in every important question, be ultimately responsible for the proceedings of the Commissioners, that we could not and should not shield ourselves from ultimate responsibility, while we alleged that the moment had not yet arrived when we could consider with advantage the entire question. I then stated what I now repeat, that it would be a matter of extreme pain if, considering the immense importance of the question of national education in Ireland and the eminent services which during 40 years have been rendered by the Board of National Education, it had been found necessary by this House to pass, or by my right hon. Friend to propose, a Motion of Censure upon the conduct of the Commissioners. And I can now truly say that, although the Government has not been prepared to sustain or approve the rule which has heretofore, apparently, governed the practice of the Commissioners, I can perfectly well understand how the majority of the Commission was led by the consideration of that rule to the course which they have adopted. My right hon. Friend, giving a fair and not a captious interpretation to the subject, is satisfied with the rule which was recommended by Her Majesty's Government to the Commission, and which has been adopted by the Commission without difference of opinion. The question which he asks me is substantially this,—Whether the case of Mr. O'Keeffe will be read in the light of that rule? I can give my right hon. Friend a perfectly explicit answer. I could not entertain the smallest doubt that such a body of gentlemen as the Commissioners, in adopting that rule, have accepted it frankly and fully; and not only so, but I consider myself entitled, from information upon which I can rely without any fear of being deceived, to say that the Commission will give Mr. O'Keeffe the full benefit of the rule if he shall renew his application. Such, I believe, is the view of the Board—such, undoubtedly is the view of the Government, and upon the Government, as I have stated, the responsibility ultimately rests. The House has a right to demand at our hands an account of every important transaction of the Board, and it will be the duty of the Government to communicate to the Commissioners the wishes of the House.

MR. BOUVIERIE: I am perfectly satisfied myself with the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman, and, therefore, I shall not think it necessary to bring forward the Motion, having gained the object which I had in view.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am glad that so far as my right hon. Friend is concerned the question is at an end.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

MR. GLADSTONE, in answer to inquiries of hon. Members, said, that if the Committee on the Judicature Bill terminated before half-past 12 o'clock, he proposed that they should proceed with the Turnpike Acts Continuance Bill, which had engaged their attention until such an inconveniently late hour that morning. If the Judicature Bill were not disposed of, they would have to proceed with it on Monday; otherwise the Report of the Amendments made in the Rating Bill would be considered. The Government were anxious, if it were possible, to go on with the Merchant Shipping Bill. Due Notice would be given of the time when the Real Estate Intestacy Bill would be taken. It was not intended to proceed with the Education Act Amendment Bill on Monday; but Notice could be given on that day when it would be brought on.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL. [BILL 99.]

(Sir Charles Adderley, Mr. Francis Sharp Powell, Mr. Whitbread, Lord Robert Montagu, Mr. Stephen Cave, Mr. Richards.)

ORDER FOR COMMITTEE DISCHARGED.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in moving that the Order for Committee on this Bill be read in order to its being discharged, said, that after the divisions of last Tuesday, which showed that there was a minority of 36 against 93 that undertook the responsibility of opposing the Bill by every means, he had resolved not to trouble the House with nightly struggles, at the period to which the opposition had delayed the Bill. The opposition was first announced before the Bill was printed, and therefore it was irrespective of its details, and against every measure coming within its title. The plea had been a general fear of any possible increase of rates, which, on the contrary, the Bill proposed to economize, by completing the duties of officers already constituted. It was desirable to exhaust the amendments of Sanitary Acts recommended by the Commission before consolidating the law. The Acts of the last two Sessions had completed both the central and local machinery for all sanitary purposes, the digests of statutes must serve as law for a little longer. He gave Notice that he would re-introduce the Bill, excepting the 8th clause, at the opening of next Session, in time, if possible, for consolidation, which should be clear of Amendment, the same year.

MR. PELL said, he could not assent to the character which the right hon. Gentleman had given to the opposition. It had reference not to the increase of rates, but to the new powers which it was proposed to confer on Medical Officers of Health.

Order read and discharged:—Bill withdrawn.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

BILL.—[Lords].—[BILL 154.]

(Mr. Attorney General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 10th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 75 (Personal officers of future Judges).

Amendment proposed,

In page 38, line 38, after the word "justice," to insert the words "who shall belong to the Chancery division, a secretary whose salary shall be four hundred pounds per annum, a principal clerk whose salary shall be three hundred pounds per annum, and a junior clerk whose salary shall be one hundred and twenty pounds per annum, and to each of the other judges of the High Court of Justice."—(Mr. Hind Palmer.)

the subject of the Callan Schools and Mr. O'Keeffe. Since I gave that Notice, Papers have been placed in the hands of Members having a direct bearing on the subject of my Resolution. One part of that Resolution had regard to the past, and another related to the future. With regard to the past, I intended to propose that the House should express its regret for the course which had been taken by the National Board of Education with regard to the Rev. Mr. O'Keeffe; and as respects the future I intended to ask the House to lay down a rule for the conduct of the Board in similar cases hereafter. The Papers which have been delivered to hon. Members this morning show that a rule has been suggested by Her Majesty's Government to the Commissioners for their future guidance in similar cases, which, practically and substantially, is the same as I would have asked the House to agree to, and that rule it appears has been accepted by the Commissioners. Therefore, that part of my object has been answered. But though security has been given for the future, I still think that reparation for the past is due to the Rev. Mr. O'Keeffe. I understand, however, that Her Majesty's Government do contemplate that the new rule will be applied to the case of that rev. gentleman, and I can only say, therefore, that if the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government can give a satisfactory answer in this respect, and can assure me that the Government have every reason to believe, and will take every means in their power to insure, that Mr. O'Keeffe shall be fairly heard, and his right to be manager of the schools shall be considered by the National Board, without reference to his being a suspended priest, then the second object of my Resolution will be answered. The rev. gentleman will then have got the reparation which is his due, and the House will have obtained the assurance for the future which it has a right to demand. In that case it will not be necessary for me to trouble the House by moving my Resolution on Monday, and I now therefore beg to ask my right hon. Friend what is the view which the Government take of the matter?

MR. GLADSTONE: I hope, Sir, I shall be able fully to meet the wishes expressed by my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Boucicau

Before answering his question I will first say one word upon the past. My right hon. Friend will bear in mind that when he raised this question during the last Session of Parliament—and no one could be surprised that it should have been raised by some hon. Member of the House—my noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland and I myself were not in full possession of the facts of the case. We admitted that we could not produce what in our judgment would be a full justification for the course of action which had been pursued, and we likewise admitted that Her Majesty's Government must, in every important question, be ultimately responsible for the proceedings of the Commissioners, that we could not and should not shield ourselves from ultimate responsibility, while we alleged that the moment had not yet arrived when we could consider with advantage the entire question. I then stated what I now repeat, that it would be a matter of extreme pain if, considering the immense importance of the question of national education in Ireland and the eminent services which during 40 years have been rendered by the Board of National Education, it had been found necessary by this House to pass, or by my right hon. Friend to propose, a Motion of Censure upon the conduct of the Commissioners. And I can now truly say that, although the Government has not been prepared to sustain or approve the rule which has heretofore, apparently, governed the practice of the Commissioners, I can perfectly well understand how the majority of the Commission was led by the consideration of that rule to the course which they have adopted. My right hon. Friend, giving a fair and not a captious interpretation to the subject, is satisfied with the rule which was recommended by Her Majesty's Government to the Commission, and which has been adopted by the Commission without difference of opinion. The question which he asks me is substantially this,—Whether the case of Mr. O'Keeffe will be read in the light of that rule? I can give my right hon. Friend a perfectly explicit answer. I could not entertain the smallest doubt that such a body of gentlemen as the Commissioners, in adopting that rule, have accepted it frankly and fully; and not only so, but I consider myself entitled, from information upon which I can rely without any fear of being deceived, to say that the Commission will give Mr. O'Keeffe the full benefit of the rule if he shall renew his application. Such, I believe, is the view of the Board—such, undoubtedly is the view of the Government, and upon the Government, as I have stated, the responsibility ultimately rests. The House has a right to demand at our hands an account of every important transaction of the Board, and it will be the duty of the Government to communicate to the Commissioners the wishes of the House.

MR. BOUVIERIE: I am perfectly satisfied myself with the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman, and, therefore, I shall not think it necessary to bring forward the Motion, having gained the object which I had in view.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am glad that so far as my right hon. Friend is concerned the question is at an end.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

MR. GLADSTONE, in answer to inquiries of hon. Members, said, that if the Committee on the Judicature Bill terminated before half-past 12 o'clock, he proposed that they should proceed with the Turnpike Acts Continuance Bill, which had engaged their attention until such an inconveniently late hour that morning. If the Judicature Bill were not disposed of, they would have to proceed with it on Monday; otherwise the Report of the Amendments made in the Rating Bill would be considered. The Government were anxious, if it were possible, to go on with the Merchant Shipping Bill. Due Notice would be given of the time when the Real Estate Intestacy Bill would be taken. It was not intended to proceed with the Education Act Amendment Bill on Monday; but Notice could be given on that day when it would be brought on.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL. [BILL 99.]

(Sir Charles Adderley, Mr. Francis Sharp Powell, Mr. Whitbread, Lord Robert Montagu, Mr. Stephen Cave, Mr. Richards.)

ORDER FOR COMMITTEE DISCHARGED.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in moving that the Order for Committee on this Bill be read in order to its being discharged, said, that after the divisions of last Tuesday, which showed that there was a minority of 36 against 93 that undertook the responsibility of opposing the Bill by every means, he had resolved not to trouble the House with nightly struggles, at the period to which the opposition had delayed the Bill. The opposition was first announced before the Bill was printed, and therefore it was irrespective of its details, and against every measure coming within its title. The plea had been a general fear of any possible increase of rates, which, on the contrary, the Bill proposed to economize, by completing the duties of officers already constituted. It was desirable to exhaust the amendments of Sanitary Acts recommended by the Commission before consolidating the law. The Acts of the last two Sessions had completed both the central and local machinery for all sanitary purposes, the digests of statutes must serve as law for a little longer. He gave Notice that he would re-introduce the Bill, excepting the 8th clause, at the opening of next Session, in time, if possible, for consolidation, which should be clear of Amendment, the same year.

MR. PELL said, he could not assent to the character which the right hon. Gentleman had given to the opposition. It had reference not to the increase of rates, but to the new powers which it was proposed to confer on Medical Officers of Health.

Order read and discharged:—Bill withdrawn.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

BILL.—[Lords].—[BILL 154.]

(Mr. Attorney General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 10th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 75 (Personal officers of future Judges).

Amendment proposed,

In page 38, line 38, after the word "justice," to insert the words "who shall belong to the Chancery division, a secretary whose salary shall be four hundred pounds per annum, a principal clerk whose salary shall be three hundred pounds per annum, and a junior clerk whose salary shall be one hundred and twenty pounds per annum, and to each of the other judges of the High Court of Justice."—(Mr. Hinde Palmer.)

Question proposed, "That these words be there inserted."

MR. HINDE PALMER, in moving the Amendment, contended that the Judges could not perform their duties without the aid of barristers to read Petitions and other documents, and that, while competent men would take the position of secretary, they would not take that of chief clerk. Perhaps a secretary and one clerk would suffice; but the gentleman occupying the first position ought to be a secretary, and not a clerk. He hoped that the Committee would insist upon some such Amendment.

MR. LOPES said, he objected to the Amendment, because it proposed to draw a distinction between the Chancery Division and the other Divisions of the High Court, by giving one staff to the Chancery Division and a different one to all the other Divisions. He had always understood that the great object of the Bill was to do away with such distinction.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he could not accept the Amendment, on account of the distinction it would make.

MR. GREGORY urged that Judges could not discharge the duties of Vice Chancellors without the assistance of secretaries. It was not the Judge, but the business of the office that had to be provided.

MR. RYLANDS said, he objected, on the ground that it gave to a section of the Judges an additional permanent staff of clerks. He hoped the Committee would assist the Government in resisting the Amendment, and was not without hope that before they were done with the Bill, they would be able to get rid of some of the staff which it contemplated.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, his Amendment did not involve any increase of staff or of expenditure, but only a change in the description of the staff. He was not prepared to withdraw the Amendment. If the Committee was not prepared to accord his proposal adequate support, it could be negatived in the usual way.

MR. T. HUGHES thought that as long as the important duties were discharged, as now, by competent men, it was immaterial whether they were called clerks or secretaries.

Amendment negatived.

MR. VERNON HARcourt moved, as an Amendment, in page 38, line 38, to omit the words "and to each of the Ordinary Judges of the Court of Appeal," the object being to reduce the staff of clerks in the Court of Appeal. It was proposed in the clause to make a new charge of £600 a-year for a chief clerk to each of the nine ordinary Judges of the Court of Appeal. Now, at present, the Judges of the Privy Council had no clerks provided for them, and upon a very reasonable ground — namely, that the business of an Appellate Court was very simple. The case was delivered, and that really was all the Judge had got to deal with. He did not want to starve the Appellate Court, and when the time came would move that the salaries of the Judges should be £6,000 instead of £5,000; but these clerks were unnecessary.

Amendment proposed, in page 38, line 38, to leave out the words "and to each of the Ordinary Judges of the Court of Appeal." —(Mr. Vernon Harcourt.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'and to each of the' stand part of the Clause."

MR. LOPES said, he concurred in the view of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford. There was a vast difference between the duties of the Judges of the High Court and of the Judges of the Appeal Court, and he should therefore support the Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the choice of the Members of the Court of Appeal would be much limited if they were not allowed to take their clerks with them. That had been found a great practical difficulty in the constitution of the Judicial Committee under the recent Act. Two or three of the most distinguished Judges declined to accept appointments in the Court of Appeal, because of feeling and consideration for their clerks, and the Government must therefore oppose the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend.

MR. HUNT said, he was inclined to support the Amendment. It would be better to make a special arrangement for the clerks of the present Judges. It was only fair that the clerks should be transferred with the Judges, or that power should be given to the Treasury to compenceate them. It would be better to do that than saddle the country with the expense of a number of useless clerks.

MR. RYLANDS said, they had heard from his hon. and learned Friend below him (Mr. Harcourt), who was an authority, that two of the clerks of the Judges of the Court of Appeal were not necessary. Then why have an unnecessary number of clerks?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL did not admit that they were unnecessary.

MR. HUGHES said, he was unable to see why the public should be saddled for all time with a number of officers who were not needed.

MR. MATTHEWS suggested words that might be adopted to provide for the clerks of Judges taken from the High Court to the Appeal Court.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL reminded the Committee that the Bill would remove the officers of the Vice Chancellors, the House of Lords, and the Lord Chancellor, and there must be some one to discharge the duties which had hitherto been discharged by them.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL contended that the arrangement would be a fairly economical one.

MR. HUNT quite agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Oxford that it would be misplaced economy to stint the Judges of the Court of Appeal in regard to their salaries. Those salaries ought to be such as would attract the best men in the profession. As he understood, there were six Judges required to constitute the Court of Appeal; and in that case if three clerks were allowed to each Judge they would have 18 clerks. He, however, found that it was said two clerks would be sufficient for each Judge; and if that were so, why should they have 'superfluous' clerks? He was therefore prepared to support the proposal to raise the salaries of the Judges of the Court of Appeal; but at the same time he was not ready to provide them with staffs which he did not think necessary.

MR. LOPES said, the real question—a question that should not be lost sight of—was to pay the Judges an adequate salary—£6,000 a-year each, and then they might, if they deemed it necessary, have an extra clerk.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 102; Noes 78; Majority 24.

MR. RAIKES, in moving as an Amendment, in page 38, line 39, to leave out "Ordinary," and insert "other," said, he did so because the Committee had just decided that there were to be two clerks to each of the ordinary Judges of the Court of Appeal, and the object of his Amendment was to place all the Judges of the high Court of Justice and the Court of Appeal in similar positions with regard to their clerks and the salaries and pensions to be paid to them.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL opposed the Amendment.

MR. VERNON HAROURT said, that was a mere waste of money—nine times £600—forced upon the Committee by the Government by means of majorities brought in from the lobby. The proposal was outrageous, absurd, illogical. But what he would recommend the hon. and learned Member for Chester to do was to withdraw his Amendment, and let the clause go down to Westminster Hall in all its native absurdity.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had talked of the clause as outrageous, absurd, illogical. But the clause was in exactly the same state as when it came down from the House of Lords.

MR. VERNON HAROURT protested against the assumption that the Committee were not to alter anything coming down from the House of Lords. They had been told night after night that the Lords had done this and the Lords had done that, and the Lords must be right. The hon. and learned Gentlemen the Solicitor General and the Attorney General came down upon the Committee time after time and said Lord Selborne and Lord Cairns have agreed upon this, and it must be the proper thing to do. He would admit the doctrine of Privilege; but he trusted the Committee would not be overborne not merely by tyrannical majorities, but by tyrannical language.

MR. MATTHEWS remarked that when the Lords were spoken of as a judicial body the hon. and learned Solicitor General had not language strong enough to condemn them. They were octogenarians and so on; but now, when adhering to their legislative recommendations, he appeared to hold just the contrary opinion.

Amendment negatived.

On the Motion of Mr. Loxes, Amendment made in page 38, line 41, after "per annum," by inserting "and in the case of the Judges of the High Court of Appeal, a Junior Clerk whose salary shall be two hundred pounds per annum."

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he wished to put a question to the Government as to the establishment of the Master of the Rolls. It appeared by the clause that the Master of the Rolls was to have an establishment of officials assigned with fixed salaries. If the clause stood in its present form an end would be put to the legal establishment of the Master of the Rolls, and his secretary would receive only £500 a-year instead of £1,200. It was highly desirable the Committee should have some explanation on the subject.

MR. JAMES expressed a hope that the hon. and learned Attorney General would, at some stage of the Bill, make provision in it for preserving the status of Judges' marshals, which was somewhat interfered with by the clause. It was necessary to public convenience that such officers should be gentlemen fit to associate with the Judges, rather than comparative servants.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was never intended to interfere in the slightest degree with the position of the marshals. He would take care that words were brought up in the report to secure the marshals in the continuance of their offices.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK complained that no answer had been given to his question. He should, therefore, move that Progress be reported.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the hon. Member was told last night that the whole of this matter was under consideration. It was therefore impossible to give any answer at present.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 76 (Doubts as to the status of officers to be determined by Rule); and Clause 77 (Powers of Commissioners to administer oaths) agreed to.

Clause 78 (Official Referees to be appointed).

MR. MATTHEWS proposed as an Amendment, in page 39, line 31, after the word "that," to insert "each division of." The effect would be to attach the official referee, not to the Supreme Court, but to each Division of the three Courts. In his opinion one of the great and serious blots of the Bill was the extraordinary amount of patronage thrown into the hands of the Lord Chancellor. It therefore seemed to him that the president of each Division of the Court should have the patronage of his Division.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL could not accept the Amendment. If the patronage were given to the heads of Divisions, it would leave them open to temptations, and although they might not yield to those temptations a suspicion might be cast upon them from which it was desirable they should be free. The Lord Chancellor, however, was in a position of great independence with regard to each Division. The real question was whether official referees should be attached to a particular Division, or to the whole Supreme Court. He preferred the latter course, as they could then be made available for any Division requiring their services.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT thought it anomalous that the whole patronage should be vested in the Lord Chancellor, although he was practically removed from the Supreme Court. It would be much better that the officers attached to each Division should be appointed by its head.

MR. RYLANDS did not think there was a sufficient check upon the exercise of legal patronage where so many official referees were to be appointed.

MR. LOPES maintained that the Judges had always exercised the patronage they possessed in a most proper manner, and that the patronage of their Courts should belong to the Presidents of Divisions rather than to the Lord Chancellor, who was not to be the head of the High Court, and, being a political personage, would be more open to pressure.

Amendment negatived.

MR. MATTHEWS said, he must again raise the question of "referees," to which he had called the attention of the Committee on the previous evening, and in relation to whom he moved an Amendment which was negatived. The question was one of great importance, involving the appointment of "experts" in the various arts and sciences, to whom it was proposed to refer questions of great importance: What British justice wanted, however, was sworn testimony given by experts, sifted and tested before a Judge and jury, and not a decision by experts alone. They might be very clever in drawing up their reports; but the existing system of subjecting them to cross-examination should be adhered to. As he understood the hon. and learned Solicitor General that system was to be departed from. That hon. and learned Gentleman said, that there were not to be any barristers appointed as referees in the provisions of the clause; but that chemists, engineers, &c., were to have questions in science and art submitted to them as referees. He considered it necessary that legal men should be appointed. He would conclude by moving his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 39, line 34, after the word "referees," to insert the words "any barrister of not less than seven years' standing, or any solicitor of not less than ten years' standing, shall be qualified to be appointed an official referee."—(Mr. Matthew.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GREGORY considered the object of the clause one that deserved the most serious consideration of the Committee. He thought the Amendment an improvement on the clause, but it did not provide a proper substitute for the ordinary tribunal of Judge and jury.

DR. BREWER considered it of great importance that scientific men should be appointed as referees. In his own profession questions of great importance often arose, which ordinary men were not trained in a knowledge of, and in relation to which the professional man must be most competent to report upon.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, he had not until now taken any part in the discussions on this Bill. No one entertained a greater respect for scientific men than he did; but if they wanted scientific opinions, they should be obtained on sworn testimony, tested by cross-examination. If they were to deal with the English law in the manner proposed, they would commit a great error. It was not necessary for them to be guided by France or Belgium. They should retain that which had the sanction of British law. The scientific man's report on points submitted to him might go up for inspection and be sent down again for further consideration, and so on several times, thus leading to increased expense. The report, as the clause stood, would be without check. He hoped the House of Commons would exercise common sense, and let the country have the disposal of legal matters confined to legal hands. He said, that with the greatest respect for official referees, and thought that the President of the Tribunal at any rate ought to know something about the law he had to administer.

MR. LOPES, in supporting the Amendment, said, it was most important that they should know who those referees were to be. There was nothing in the Bill to inform them. The hon. and learned Solicitor General told them that they might be engineers, chemists, doctors, &c., and it appeared to him (Mr. Lopes) that they might be shoemakers, builders, mechanics, or men of any other trade; but they must not, according to the hon. and learned Gentleman, be barristers. [The SOLICITOR GENERAL: Not exclusively lawyers.] An hon. Member said, that referees could call in extra assessors to aid them in their investigations; but that was a power which referees should not have, it was a power that should rightly belong to the Judge to direct. It was also said that the referee's report was to be final. But the report might not be correct, and if it could be shown not to be, why should it be final? The hon. and learned Attorney General said, that after the report was made, it would be closed as to the facts; but, however that might be, it could not be closed as to the law. The whole matter was to go back again to the referee; and the effect would be to increase the expense to the suitors. He submitted that those proposals, as in the Bill, were most dangerous, and he should give his vote most decidedly in favour of the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend, should he go to a division upon it. In conclusion, he would remark that although commercial Gentlemen were absent when discussions on this Bill were going on, they were sure to rush into the House as soon as a division was called for.

MR. RATHBONE said, the commercial men had been present during the debates, and if they had refrained from taking a prominent part in them it was because they desired the Bill to pass as speedily as possible. In his opinion lawyers would not, in many cases, be the best referees.

MR. W. FOWLER, though favourable to the Amendment, hoped the hon. and learned Member for Dungarvan would not press it to a division, as a number of hon. Gentlemen who at that moment were writing letters in the Library would be sure to come in and vote against it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that the clause did not exclude lawyers.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID, in opposing the Amendment, thought that in the great majority of cases lawyers would be appointed; but argued that there were many cases in which it would be wise to give a power to select another class of persons for official referees.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would not enter into the question, as it had been discussed on the previous evening.

Question put.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 63; Noes 159: Majority 96.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 79 (Duties, appointment, and removal of officers of Supreme Court).

MR. MATTHEWS, in moving as an Amendment, in page 40, line 24, after "Chancellor," to insert—

"All officers assigned to perform duties with respect to the High Court of Justice shall be appointed by the Lord Chief Justice of England," said, that as that noble and learned Lord was to be no longer the head of that Court there was no reason for his retaining the patronage of the Court.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT, in supporting the Amendment, asked why the Lord Chancellor was to appoint the ushers? The reason was because, as was perfectly well known, they would not really be appointed by the Lord Chancellor, but by the hon. Member for Shaftesbury (Mr. Glyn). If the Lord Chief Justice had the patronage, he would not consult the hon. Member for Shaftesbury; but the Lord Chancellor, who was a political officer, would.

MR. MATTHEWS said, it was not only the ushers, but the official referees, who were to be appointed by the Lord Chancellor. That was an amount of patronage which it was very undesirable to put into the hands of a political officer.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked what were really the appointments proposed by this clause to be left in the hands of the Lord Chancellor?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, in reply, that the only patronage he knew of was the appointment of official referees and of certain ushers of the Court. The High Court would sit in the same place as the Court of Appeal, and if the patronage was given to two Judges, each would appoint his own set. It was thought better, therefore, to give the patronage to one Judge as the more economical. Some of the ushers who should act for the Supreme Court would also act for the Court of Appeal.

MR. LOPES said, the chief portion of the patronage was the appointment of the official referees, and therefore the Committee were entitled to ask what would be their number and what amount they would be paid?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he had answered the question to the best of his ability the other evening. He would, however, now say that the subject had been carefully considered by those most competent to deal with it. The number of official referees would depend on the amount of business, and the acceptance the system set up by the Bill met with at the hands of commercial men. If the reference proposed by it were satisfactory a great many would be wanted, and experience alone would tell how it was best to pay them. It might prove most economical to appoint a referee each time for every single case that was referred, the referee being chosen with regard to his special knowledge of the subject involved in the case. In a sugar case, for instance, it would be desirable to have a sugar broker, in a tea case a tea broker, and in an engineering case an engineer, sitting as referee. The question, therefore, was left open how they were to be paid, whether by fees or by salary, and for the present it was left to Parliament to pay them by annual Votes. The matter was not left to the Lord Chancellor alone, but to the Lord Chancellor, with the concurrence of the heads of Divisions, the concurrence of the Treasury, and the annual concurrence of Parliament.

Mr. Rathbone

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was quite willing, if there was any doubt on the point, to insert words as proposed by his hon. and learned Friend. He would undertake to do so on the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 80 (Patronage not otherwise provided for).

MR. VERNON HAROURT said, he had an Amendment to propose. It had often been said that the Preamble was the key to a Bill, but it should, perhaps, rather be said that the patronage clauses gave the proper key. There was a marked distinction made in this clause between the way in which the patronage of the chiefs and those who were not chiefs was dealt with. The patronage of the chiefs was to be continued for their lives, and so was the patronage of the other Judges; but the patronage of the chiefs was to remain for ever as it was, while that of all the other Judges was to "be exercised in such manner as Her Majesty may by Sign Manual direct." What was the patronage they were going to perpetuate? In the Estimates, which they talked so much about, but discussed so little, they would find a list of the personal officers of the Lord Chancellor which might serve as a specimen. The salaries of these officers, of which he read a list, amounted to £7,532 a-year. That — some would call it gigantic, but he called it an infinitesimal patronage — would be an unwise thing to perpetuate for ever, while the patronage of the rest of the Judges was placed under the consideration of the Executive Government for the purpose of revision. He would, therefore, move, as an Amendment, the omission of the words in line 22, from "if incident" to "and" in line 28.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the intention was to leave the patronage where it had always been. However, he had no objection to offer to the Amendment.

MR. HUNT said, he did not see the object of taking these words out of the clause.

MR. BOUVERIE doubted whether the patronage now exercised by the Lord Chancellor in regard to his personal attendants ought to be enjoyed by any one but himself. There was a large branch of patronage connected with the Probate Court, and the House ought to know who was to exercise it. The Judge of the Probate Court appointed the local Registrars all over the Kingdom. The Masters of the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, no doubt, held valuable appointments; but he doubted whether all their patronage should be taken away from persons of such high dignity as the chiefs of those Courts. Some one must select these officials, and it was better to distribute this patronage among a number of people than to centre it in the Government.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 81 to 93, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 94 (Interpretation of terms).

On the Motion of MR. MATTHEWS, Amendment made in page 45, line 29, by inserting before "pleading," the words "procedure shall include pleading."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Postponed Clause 31 (Assignment of certain business to particular Divisions of High Court subject to Rules).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL moved, as an Amendment, in page 20, line 24, to leave out "and the London Court of Bankruptcy respectively." The object of the Amendment was to transfer temporarily the control of the Court of Bankruptcy to the Court of Exchequer.

Amendment proposed, in page 20, line 24, to leave out the words "and the London Court of Bankruptcy respectively." — (Mr. Attorney General.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause?"

MR. JAMES said, he objected to the proposal to transfer the whole of the business of the Court of Bankruptcy in London to the Court of Exchequer, on the ground that the Court of Exchequer had not sufficient judicial strength to perform those additional duties in a manner that would prove satisfactory either to the suitors generally or to the country. The Common Law Judges would have to go circuit, and as there were only 15 left at present, and as the Bill would require the services of three, there would be only left 12 Common Law Judges to discharge all the duties that belonged to their several Courts. Besides, the business of the Bankruptcy Court was of a peculiar character, requiring the constant attendance and watchfulness of one particular Judge who was well experienced in such matters, including the winding-up of large estates, and the dealing with property of considerable amount. The proposal of the Attorney General, if assented to, would cast upon the Barons of the Court of Exchequer duties for which they were wholly unsuited. That was a piece of false economy to which he hoped the Committee would not assent.

MR. W. FOWLER concurred in the views just expressed by the hon. and learned Member for Taunton, and thought that this scheme of false parsimony which characterized the Bill generally would prove in the end to be wasteful and extravagant. The fact was, that more judicial strength was wanted in the Court of Bankruptcy, for a vast amount of business was now disposed of by the Registrars which ought to be done by the Judge.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, all the Courts were overburdened, owing to the waste of judicial strength which our antiquated arrangements had involved. A re-arrangement, he believed, would enable the Judges to do the work of the country. The arrangement now proposed was temporary, and it was subject to the disposition of the Court, which had power to transfer business from one Division to another. He merely proposed, after balancing the convenience and the inconvenience, to transfer the Bankruptcy business from the Division which was most overburdened to that which was least overburdened; and it would not break his heart if the Committee preferred some other arrangement.

DR. BALL said, the matter was one which concerned mercantile interests very closely. He was opposed to the transfer of the Bankruptcy business to the Court of Exchequer, a business which was peculiar in its character, and which should be placed in the hands of a Judge especially conversant with the law and practice relating to it, and always in readiness to administer it. The administration of Bankruptcy Law affected the status of individuals, and it was an anomaly that a man's status should be in the power of a Registrar instead of that of a Judge. A Member of Parliament had been made bankrupt by a Registrar whose judgment was finally overruled by the Judge, but that did not redress the evil done to the individual. The business of Landed Estates Courts and Bankruptcy Courts should be committed to particular Judges, the Courts should be always open, and the work should no more be delegated to inferior officers than was the administration of the Criminal Law, which was analogous to that of Bankruptcy. The interests of the merchants ought alone to be considered in this matter, and not the interests of the Bar. It was of the greatest importance to the mercantile public to have a permanent tribunal.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL remarked that the evil of which the right hon. and learned Gentleman complained already existed in England, and that the object of the present Amendment was to remove it. The Registrar now acted, and if the Amendment were not carried, he would continue to act.

MR. JAMES pointed out that the Bill had been most carefully framed elsewhere by those who were most capable of dealing with it, and who had not deemed it necessary to introduce the provision now proposed by the Government. He objected that the direction of business for which special provision ought to be made should be handed over to the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, who were already overburdened with their other duties.

Question put.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 70; Noes 114: Majority 44.

Clause further amended, and agreed to.
House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

And it being now Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ARMY—THE VOLUNTEER FORCE—THE NEW REGULATIONS.

RESOLUTION.

COLONEL C. H. LINDSAY, in rising to call attention to the military policy of the Government, more especially as regarded the new Volunteer Regulations, and their effect upon the numbers and efficiency of the force, and to move,

"That it is expedient that inquiry should be made into the present state of the Volunteer force, and into the causes that have led to the resignations of over 2,000 officers' commissions, which are still vacant," said, that he was fully sensible of the bold though, to his mind, necessary position which he had taken up by committing himself to the words of the Motion. But he made it with the conviction, right or wrong, that he was fulfilling a duty which he should, as an old soldier and a Volunteer commanding officer, be neglecting if he did not make it. There were two distinct questions embodied in the Motion—the one was the policy of the Government with respect to the Army and the Reserve forces; and the other was its policy with respect to the great Auxiliary or Volunteer force of the country. It was his intention, beyond offering a few brief remarks, to leave the Army question to his noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire, and to address himself to the Volunteer question as his special subject. He asserted that the condition of the Army was by no means satisfactory—for reasons which he would briefly give. A great and bold re-organization scheme had, no doubt, been inaugurated, and was on its trial; and, as one would suppose, it should, in justice to its promoters, and on principle, be patiently and considerately watched and criticized. But military opinion had decided that it was far too sweeping, too revolutionary, and too hazardous; in the violent and rapid changes of system which it had effected, to be acceptable as a safe or wise policy, especially as it had been pressed on in direct opposition to a large majority of the leading military men of the day. Let them look at the consequences which were already the result of that policy—results which were fraught with considerable risk to the efficiency of the Army as a fighting body. In the first place, there was great discontent amongst the officers of the Army consequent upon the abolition of the purchase system and its unpalatable results, together with various other ill-judged innovations of a jarring nature—a discontent which had placed them in an unfair and undignified position, as officers who were under the discipline of the Mutiny Act, so much so that more than 2,000 had found it expedient to memorialize the Commander-in-Chief against the invidious and financially unjust position in which they found themselves placed; by which means they had placed His Royal Highness in an embarrassing position, as the friend of the Army and the officers who were serving in it. In the second place, the recruiting for the Army was in a deplorable plight, consequent on the service having ceased to be a bond fide profession for the soldier, owing to the short service system now in operation, which had all the bitters of the engagement, but none of the sweets, and which, therefore, offered no inducement worth having for any man to enlist, added to which, the high price of the labour market stood prominently forward in its competition against the military service of the country, upon the present system; the result of which was that, as a rule, the most inferior specimens of human physique were gradually taking the place of those able-bodied soldiers of the old régime who were the glory and pride of England. And in the third place, the capacity and power of the control department, which was the mainspring of the great military machinery of the nation, and which was responsible for the health and condition of the Army, was not making that progress in its efficiency so as to command confidence in the minds of military men who were working under it. His argument was, therefore, that the Army of England was in an unsatisfactory condition, notwithstanding that 15 or 16 millions of money were annually expended upon it. He would now pass on to that part of the Motion which related to the Volunteer Service. He said that was also an important subject, touching, as it would do, the position and character of a great national institution; and although the view which he might take would no doubt invite strong criticism, for which he was prepared, it should not be the less interesting to the minds of those hon. Members who had been for some years identified with the great cause of national defence—a cause which was still, he thought, entitled to the respect and anxious consideration of the country. Now, it was not his intention to make a factious attack on the policy which Her Majesty's Government had thought proper to adopt with respect to the Volunteer Service of the country, nor to charge the nation with any intentional apathy as to its present and future position; nor did he intend to travel in detail over that once interesting ground upon which the starting-post of national training to arms was fixed in 1859—his intention was to criticize the result which that policy had had upon the Volunteer Service generally, as well as upon the present position and condition of the commissioned officers, which, for reasons which he would give, seemed to have become in the first instance irksome and difficult, and in the second instance invidious, discouraging, and therefore discontented; and he did so, not from any party feeling in the matter—far from it; but as a timely warning from one who was deeply interested in, and anxious for, the welfare of what had been so often described to be one of the most remarkable institutions of modern times. It was also his intention to suggest the antidote to the mistaken treatment which had been administered to the Volunteer Service, and which had already sown the seeds of discomfiture and prospective dissolution. Now, with respect to the position of the officers, it might be in the recollection of the House that he asked for a Return a few weeks ago of the number of vacant commissions at that particular time, and he did so in order to compare it with the Return which the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire had previously called for, and received. The noble Lord's Return exhibited no less than 2,233 vacant commissions, and the Return furnished at his (Colonel Lindsay's) request, exhibited—not a decrease, as one would have hoped—but an increase of five up to the 1st of May, and he had reason to believe that there was a grand approximate total of over 2,300 up to the present time! Now, to anyone who had served as a regimental officer in the Army, and who knew, and was able to appreciate, the great importance that company officers were to the healthy condition and discipline of their men, such a Return as that to which he had alluded was, to say the least of it, somewhat alarming in its relation to the Volunteer Service, and it was one which obviously demanded the serious attention of Her Majesty's Government. There was no disputing the fact that there had been, and still was, a singular want of attraction in the once-coveted officers' commissions in the Volunteer Service, and especially since the new Regulations were brought into operation, and which had been periodically supplemented by increased stringencies; and when he asked himself, as a commanding officer, what were the causes of the retirement of so many of the officers, and why so many commissions were going a-begging, his answer could only be an echo of that opinion which he had so often expressed in and out of the House, and it was this—in the first place, he said it was a disregard, unintentional no doubt, of that independent and patriotic element peculiar to a voluntary undertaking, which created, characterized, and maintained in vigour the Volunteer movement in its early days, and which, from the nature of its constitution, was not calculated to thrive under any undue military pressure in time of peace; and in the second place, owing to what seemed to him to be a want of judgment in dealing with a Service which, though loyal and patriotic in the highest degree, was unable, from its very composition, to comply satisfactorily with the demands that were now made upon it. Now, in his opinion, there were numerous causes which had had, and still had, a deterrent effect upon that most important branch of regimental machinery—the commissioned officers, who, be it remembered, were holding Queen's commissions, and therefore in the same position as the officers of the Regular Army, the Militia, and the Yeomanry. He would mention three causes by way of example—1st, the unequal position and status which Volunteer officers now held in comparison with the Militia and Yeomanry; 2ndly, the system of examination for the officers; and 3rdly, the hard-and-fast line which had been drawn in respect to the attendance of Volun-

teens at battalion and company drill. Now with respect to the first cause, he was, he confessed, not surprised at the dissatisfaction which was felt by those officers at the manner in which their position and privileges as "Queen's officers" had been, and still were, ignored, but which were granted to the Militia and Yeomanry officers; and it was the more apparent now that those three services were by Royal Warrant consolidated and placed in one and the same schedule. He alluded, for instance, to the officers of the Volunteer Service being denied the privilege of presentation at Court, being Queen's officers, when the officers of the other services were granted that privilege. He did not imagine that many would take advantage of what from their present position should be their privilege, as holding Queen's commissions, when their social position, as they were aware, would not otherwise frank them. The right hon. Gentleman had, he knew not why, except to complete his "harmonious whole," converted all Volunteer officers' commissions into Queen's, and as soon as he did so, he stultified his appointments by class legislation, which was unpalatable to officers holding Queen's commissions. Then, again, let him point out how the relative position and status of Volunteer officers had been rendered invidious and unjust in other ways:—for instance, with respect to honorary rank on retirement after a given number of years; for, according to Clause 30 of the Circular, dated April 21, 1878, field officers, captains, and lieutenants of the Militia were to be granted that privilege on a sliding scale, but no allusion whatever was made even to commanding officers of Volunteers and other officers. He wished, therefore, to know, had the right hon. Gentleman no such acknowledgment to offer to those who had been for years devoting themselves to the responsible duties they had undertaken? Were they to be allowed to retire from their respective commands and be forgotten as if they had never existed? He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would afford some information upon the subject. With respect to the second cause for discouragement—namely, the system of examinations for the officers—he would read the 48th paragraph of Clause 9 of the Circular of 28th May, 1872, which was as follows:—

"Every officer, on first appointment to a commission or on promotion, will be required, within one year of his appointment or promotion, to be examined for a certificate of proficiency for the rank to which he is appointed or promoted. Every officer now serving—with the exception of Lieutenant-colonels, appointed as such before the 1st January, 1871, and favourably reported upon by the Inspecting Officer—who is not in possession of such certificate, will be required to obtain it previous to the day of inspection in 1874. Officers who fail in obtaining certificates must again be examined within six months, and in the event of a second failure will be called upon to resign."

Now, he happened to know that the doubt and uncertainty which hung over a Volunteer officer's head as soon as he had been selected, with care and some difficulty, for a commission, as to whether he would be able to retain it or not, pending the examination he had to pass, according to the above Regulation, had a deterrent effect. He alluded to the probationary period of 12 months or so, by which time he must pass through what he might call the toll-bar of an unnecessary form of probation. Now he did not, by any means, object to the examination of Volunteer officers, but he did to the compulsory system and form upon which it was conducted. He objected to the system because, with men of business—from which class, as a rule, they must be drawn—it was harassing, comparatively useless, and technical, requiring as it did, a knowledge which, except in isolated instances, could only be superficial, owing to the want of practice; and it was endeavouring to make bond fide civilians into quasi-soldiers, and to gain an end which was out of all proportion to the means. It might be all very well to say that there was nothing in the character of the examinations that should be alarming to the most moderate capacity. That was not, and must not be, the question. It was the principle of forcing men, who had other and more important occupations to attend to, through an unnecessary ordeal. And all for what? In order that the right hon. Gentleman might bring every man who bore arms—Volunteers included—withn the magic circle of his "harmonious whole," which, in the case of Volunteers, was contrary to the object and intention of their existence. He (Colonel Lindsay) did not object to regimental examinations, which would be quite sufficient for the purpose; but he did object to the system which placed an aspiring young officer in a false position for a considerable time after he had been "gazetted." It was, as it were, putting the cart before the horse, by giving him his commission, and then trying him for the life of it. It would be almost better to examine him when a candidate, and confirm the appointment according to merit. He thought that there was only one course to adopt, and that was that every Volunteer, on receiving his commission, should be required at once to attach himself to a regiment of the Regular Army for at least a month, or to the Militia when out for training, receiving a certificate from the commanding officer and adjutant that he had regularly attended the necessary drills, which would be amply sufficient for the purpose, considering that when he returned to his regiment he had his own commanding officer, adjutant, and sergeant-instructor to assist his memory when necessary. Now these things had not been rendered more pleasant by two special Circulars which had been issued last month, which appeared only to add to the stringency—for one dated May 27 directed that all sub-lieutenants appointed since May 31 were to receive "probationary commissions" which were to last for two years—and the second discouraged the appointment of officers from the lower ranks by the commanding officer, for the select men were only "probationary" until they had passed a certain examination. Now, he said these were additional instances of arbitrary control, and consequent causes for discontent and discouragement. The right hon. Gentleman must not be led away by the zeal that was displayed last year, when 11,582 officers and sergeants went in and passed their examinations in a creditable manner. It, no doubt, exhibited a healthy spirit; but it was an effort not likely to be kept up by men of business. Then, the third cause for discontent applied to the men as well as the officers. It was that hard-and-fast line which had been drawn through the battalion and company-drill system; the effect of which would be to punish the majority present for the absence of the minority, which was contrary to the spirit of the Volunteer Service. It was not the actual figure of the line, which was moderate enough, but it was the imposition of any figure at all, and the penalties that accompanied it, as being arbitrary and unnecessary. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman was not aware how unpalatable such a rule was to men of business who were serving the country gratuitously. He objected also to the rule, because it tended to the abandonment of that continuous and independent system of drill which was so peculiarly convenient to men of business, who could only get away from their employments at uncertain times. And now, having stated what he considered to be some of the principal causes of so many vacant commissions in the Volunteer Service, he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman for a remedy. He asked him for an opinion, and he respectfully submitted that upon that opinion would probably depend the future condition of the Service, as well as the position of many of the commanding officers who were not prepared or inclined to continue upon a system which was depriving the Service of its officers—that was, of officers who should be men of influence and example and who would not accept commissions upon the present terms of the War Office. If the right hon. Gentleman knew how many considerations were necessary in the selection and training of the officers to a sufficient average of efficiency; and if he knew how much the establishment of a company was kept up by the local influence, popularity, and activity of the officers, he would not have used his official screw-driver so freely, and he would surely have paid more deference to the experience and knowledge of those commanding officers before he trod upon ground which was rapidly becoming what he might call the quicksands of the Volunteer movement. There were other causes for discontent amongst the rank and file as well as the officers, but with which he would not trouble the House beyond two or three passing allusions—causes which could be so easily removed, and with advantage to the service. For instance, why should attendance at reviews be excluded for the qualification from efficiency, when everyone knew that there was just as much instruction to be gained as at brigade-drill—and certainly a great deal more than at those ridiculous exhibitions in Hyde Park, which were rendered valueless by the previous and undisturbed occupation of the necessary ground by the British public, who would willingly be guided by any instructions that were authoritatively given to them? Such an exclusion from efficiency qualification was directly opposed to the opinion of General Ellice, whose Report the right hon. Gentleman had decided to stand by, in answer to a Question lately put to him by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire. And these were General Ellice's words—

"That all concentrations of Volunteers, under incompetent officers, should be encouraged; merely marching in large bodies, and taking up position imparts useful information."

That extraordinary decision had broken down the Easter Monday Reviews, and done infinite mischief to the Metropolitan Volunteers. It had also broken down the Whit-Monday Review, and very nearly broken down the Wimbledon Review, which had ceased to be popular among the Volunteers, and would cease to take place, unless some inducement was given them to attend. Then, again, why should attendance at the Autumn Manœuvres of last year have been rendered all but impossible to Volunteers by a sine qua non of a fortnight's or 16 days' presents for every man, instead of a week at a time, with proper relief, as was the case in 1871, when no less than 5,000 men were able to take advantage of the instruction of which many more would have gladly availed themselves had they been allowed? It was true a concession had been made that year by reducing the compulsory attendance to eight days, and they were obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for returning to the arrangements of 1871; but they could put no reliance upon such an arrangement being a fixed one, from the experience they had had. Then, again, why should another sine qua non, as to efficiency, of firing 10 rounds of blank ammunition be imposed, the accidental non-performance of which might disqualify a man who had drilled to the mark, and fired through his class, with that exception? It sounded a small matter, but it was a hard-and-fast line, and therefore harassing to men of business, who would willingly conform if they could. And, why should the £1 efficient be abolished which had worked so well in the early days of the movement? It had told hardly upon many valuable men and supporters of their corps, who were constant at their drill, but whose occupations prevented them from going to the butts every year, and the consequence was that they had been obliged to leave the Service. And let him ask, why should the adjutants, who were the commanding officers' right-hand and confidential men, be appointed by the War Office, and not as they used to be, upon the selection and recommendation of the commanding officers? Such a regulation was an interference with the commanding officers' necessary privilege, and highly distasteful; for it must be borne in mind that smartness and a thorough knowledge of drill were by no means the only attributes or qualifications necessary for such important appointments. And while he was upon the subject of the adjutants, he was glad to find that the right hon. Gentleman had decided that the adjutants who were appointed previous to 1871 were to receive a step of rank on retirement; the adjutant of the Inns of Court Volunteers, who retired last year, after having served since the formation of the corps, having been given the honorary rank of major, with permission to wear the uniform. They felt, however, that the scale of retiring allowances was a wretched one, being scarcely in excess of the wages of a daily labourer; also that it should be based on length of service, irrespective of age and other causes. Then the case of the contingent allowance was, naturally, a sore subject with the adjutants; an allowance that had been issued to them for 13 years as a supplement to their inadequate pay; and it had been discontinued without any warning or compensation. Now, as that allowance was granted in 1861 to cover contingent expenses in connection with War Office correspondence, at the rate of £4 per company, and at the same time to give a balance to the adjutant as an addition to his means, the withdrawal of it was unworthy of the right hon. Gentleman, and was unjust to a body of officers whose services were far more valuable than their pay and allowances. Then the medical attendance upon the adjutant was a farce which he endeavoured to expose last year, for no medical man in private practice would accept the consideration of 2*d.* per week, except out of generosity; so that the adjutants had virtually to pay for their medical advice, which was hard, considering that by the 40th clause of the last Circular, they lost all their allowance and half their pay if they were on the sick-list beyond six months. He believed that the noble Lord the Member for Berwick (Viscount Bury) had made several communications on the subject to the right hon. Gentleman without receiving any reply up to that moment. He hoped, however, that he would take the case of the adjutants into his consideration. In his (Colonel Lindsay's) opinion it would have been better to have left what was well alone, and abided by the recommendations of the Royal Commission, which were fully confirmed and accepted as far back as 1863. The hon. and gallant Member proceeded to read extracts from speeches of the Marquess of Hartington, Lord Palmerston, and the present Prime Minister, speaking in terms of the highest praise of the patriotic spirit which had given rise to the Volunteer movement; and of the spirit, energy, and discipline of the force — and then proceeded — Well, that being the undeniable opinion of these statesmen, he (Colonel Lindsay) would repeat his remark, "Leave well alone," and give the Service a helping hand over the stile, instead of throwing obstacles in the path that led to it — obstacles such as were contained in the numerous Circulars or Codes of Regulations, which since 1870 embraced no less than 77 clauses and 317 paragraphs, with reference solely to the unfortunate Volunteer Service upon which they were imposed. If the force was worth maintaining, let it be maintained with an ungrudging hand. If it was not, abolish it with Parliamentary dignity, until the country required its services. But it must be borne in mind that away would go all those clinging and depending particles and offsprings which had rendered the movement so remarkable, significant, and sound. But in the meantime it would be an unwise policy to throw cold water upon the fire of patriotism and extinguish it, for, when once out, not even the fascinating crack of the rifle, which was now resounding from morning till night at Wimbledon, would be able to rekindle it. If, therefore, it was expedient to preserve the movement, what had worked so well should be left alone. But it was only driving a willing horse to death by endeavouring to play the false game of making professional civilians into soldiers. He might be told that that was all very fine, but the Volunteers drew a capitation grant from the country, and that the country must have a quid pro quo; it must, in short, have the pound of flesh. He sincerely trusted that no such ungenerous sentiment might be flung in the faces of men who were not only serving their country gratuitously, but who, from the fact of their being in existence, had engaged to be the first to sacrifice their lives in defence of their country whenever she might be invaded, and which was, in all conscience, a sufficient quid pro quo. He now approached what he considered a very questionable policy on the part of Her Majesty's Government, and one which might have a prejudicial effect upon the interests of the Army. He alluded to the announcement contained in the heading of the last Auxiliary and Reserve Forces Circular of April 21st, 1873—namely—

"That it is deemed expedient that the several corps of Rifle Volunteers should be attached to and form part of the Army in the United Kingdom."

Now, that was the dangerous policy, against the chances of which the Commander-in-Chief himself and many other important personages had, some years back, declared their opinion; and now it had been adopted by the present Government—the effect of which would be to place the Army and the Volunteers in a false position with each other. It would act as a deception as far as the public and the Army were concerned, and it would be prejudicial to the Volunteer Service, the public, because it would tend to mislead the country as to the real and available strength of the Army; the Army, because of the following remarkable condition, or limitation attached to the Order, which was as follows:—

"That no persons belonging to the Volunteers shall be required to serve in other manner than that in which he might have been required to serve, or shall be liable to any greater punishment than that to which he might have been subjected if this Order had not been made,"

which appeared to him to be nothing more or less than what is called in military phraseology an "As you were!" and therefore a nullification, or stultification of the Order, which by Act of Parliament was impossible; and it would be prejudicial to the Volunteer Service, because it would tend to disturb the character of the movement, and impose upon its obligations, which were never intended for an unembodied force, whose character was purely voluntary. He objected to that policy, because it morally gave a fictitious or paper credit to the Army in the eyes of the public, of some 160,000 men more than it actually possessed, or could rely upon for any purpose, but the actual defence of the country against foreign invasion, and he objected to it because it trod upon the interests of the Army by affording the peace-at-any-price party and the taxpayer a plausible excuse to keep down its numerical strength, by reckoning the Volunteers being an armed force, as a convenient though shadowy substitute for any deficiencies that might, and undoubtedly would, be found in the muster-roll of the Army. It trod also upon the interests of the Army, because there was no doubt that if the Volunteers were disbanded, the strength of the Army would have to be increased as well as the pay of the soldier. But as long as it existed as a plausible portion of the Army, which that Order deceptively made it out to be, the House of Commons would be very loth to vote a penny more in that direction. That being so, it would have been better if the Volunteer Service had never existed, and the sooner it was abolished the better. Now, to briefly sum up his argument, ten years had elapsed since the Royal Commission recommended the Capitation Grant, and for six years it had been doled out with a grudging feeling; and every obstacle had been thrown in the way of its cheerful payment. Conflicting and unpalatable Regulations had been imposed during the last three years. Volunteer officers' commissions had been converted into Queen's, as in the Army, but their privileges and position were denied them; and now that purchase had been abolished, there could with justice be no difference between them, except that the Army was paid, and the Volunteers were not; and as a climax, the Volunteers were announced to form a part of the Army, which was a pretentious fiction, because it could not be a substantial fact—and this was the result of 14 years hard labour upon the treadmill of national defence. Was it, therefore, to be wondered at that discontent pervaded the Service? If he sat down then, the right hon. Gentleman would naturally say that he had made all sorts of complaints, but had offered no suggestions for future guidance. He could not act in that way. But he would make the following suggestions, and then sit down. He would say, let the Volunteers work out their own efficiency as they used to in 1862-3, and for several years after, when it was declared, by those distinguished persons whose opinions he had quoted, to be amply sufficient for the object in view. Let the standard of efficiency be tested by reasonable results, and not by arbitrary rules. Let the annual inspection be the test of regimental efficiency, and be reasonably and impartially conducted by Staff officers employed for that purpose, and not by this officer, and that officer, simply because he held a certain rank. Let the Volunteer Service have its own Inspector General, especially appointed to look after it, as was formerly the case, and which worked so well; for it was impossible for any man to embrace the necessary management of a special Service, like the Volunteers, in conjunction with other Services, which were totally distinct in every sense of the word. He believed if any officer could do the work of two or three, it was his own brother, the Inspector General. But as he was confined to his official call all day, and every day, and unable to travel, he was helpless. The visits of the Inspector General were events which were popular, and made much of, which did good, and kept up esprit and interest. Well, that was given up, and everything had become flat. Then, he said, let every Volunteer who had been a first-class efficient for three years in succession be qualified for the Capitation Grant during the remainder of his service, provided that he attended the annual inspection and one brigade drill, one battalion drill, and one company drill during the year. Let the hard-and-fast line with its impossible penalties, be abandoned. Let the Boards of Examination be optional, and not compulsory; and let efficient Volunteers have distinctive privileges as citizens under arms for the defence of their country. Upon that system he, for one, would be ready and willing to bear his share as a commanding officer; but unless the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to slacken the reins, which he had drawn so tight, he confessed that he did not see his way. But if he was anxious, as he believed he was, for the prosperity of the Volunteer Service; let him bear in mind that the healthy and contented condition of the officers was paramountly necessary to efficiency and discipline, and that as long as they continued to hold Queen's commissions they could only be measured by one gauge, and that was by the standard to which they had been raised as Queen's officers, which knew no difference between an officer and a gentleman, and with all the privileges of a gentleman as long as he behaved as one. In conclusion, he maintained that every Government had a responsible duty to perform with respect to that exceptional service as long as it was acceptable to the nation who demanded and therefore created it; and as it was handed over to the guardianship of the present Government as a national charge, when it came into office, it should bear in mind that there were too many important elements, the vitality of which must depend upon the healthy and contented condition and magnitude of the Service, to be lightly or unadvisedly treated by a policy which was obviously unsuited to its character and object. In the first place, the science and art of rifle-shooting was the offspring of the Volunteer movement; and the National Rifle Association, with its gigantic plant and machinery, depended solely upon the condition of the Volunteer Service; and he questioned whether, on reflection, the nation would be willing to part with or risk its present high position by any mistaken policy towards the parent institution; and, in the second place, the opportunity which the Volunteer Service afforded for the continuous training to arms of men who would otherwise not be trained at all, was an important element not to be thrown away, which also depended upon the maintenance of the Service and its admirably organized machinery. He therefore respectfully warned Her Majesty's Government and the right hon. Gentleman who represented it at the War Office, that, in the event of the Volunteer Service breaking down and fading away, the responsibility must rest with the Government that took charge of it in a prosperous and contented state, and not with the commanding officers, who had always fulfilled the trust that was placed in them, and done their best to carry out the original object and intention of the movement; and who, in its early days, received the confidence of the leading statesmen of the country. He had now stated his opinion as to the causes of discontent, and he had suggested the remedies which would remove them, and in doing so, his object had been to record his opinion upon the policy of the Government, and to stem the current of apathy which that mistaken policy had created, and which appeared to have set in throughout the country—an apathy which was calculated to wipe away the foot-prints of a great national cause, which at one time were pointed in the right direction, but which might yet be brought back to the path upon which they started, and which had at one time gained the admiration of Europe and the approval of an anxious and grateful country.

Colonel C. H. Lindsay

Lord ECHO, in seconding the Resolution, complimented the hon. and gallant Member on the great public service he had done in bringing the subject before the House. He was glad that the form of the hon. and gallant Member's Motion would enable him to call their attention to the general military policy of Her Majesty's Government. There were two kinds of military policy—a successful and an unsuccessful one. A successful military policy meant safety at home, and the integrity, honour, and independence of the Empire at large; and to these all other considerations were absolutely secondary. Germany afforded an instance of a successful, and France of an unsuccessful, military policy; and the question we had to consider was, whether our military policy most resembled that of Germany or of France. We had to inquire whether our Secretary of State for War most resembled a Bismarck or an Ollivier, and our Commander-in-Chief a Von Moltke or a Lebeuf. He fully admitted the excellent intentions of the Secretary of State for War, who was most anxious to combine efficiency with economy; and he begged to thank him for strengthening the Artillery and for having established a system of Manoeuvres. He would now give shortly what he believed to be the official view of the policy of the Government. If they were to rely on the dicta of official persons, the Army was at present in a most efficient condition; and that the new organization had been carried out in the most economical manner, and upon a right principle. Certainly the Artillery had been rendered a most efficient and superior Force, but the officials went further, and stated that when the present Government came into power, the Army was the slave of the officers; that they therefore had to purchase it back, and that that had been done in a spirit of justice and generosity. They contended that the officers were not adequately educated for military purposes, and that in future they would be highly trained like the Prussian officers. They stated that the Reserves did not exist, that pensions which were most expensive had been abolished, and that they had established a satisfactory system of short service without pensions. They maintained further, to use the words of his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War, that the Estimates were based on "moderation and efficiency." Thus much with regard to the Army. As regarded the Auxiliary Forces, the official view was that they were in a satisfactory and reliable condition, and that a "harmonious whole" had been created out of the various branches of the Services, and an efficient system of local organization called into existence. That was, he thought, a fair statement of the official view on the subject of Army Reform. He came, in the next place, to the non-official view—that of men who were practical soldiers and who were not in office. They contended that it was quite needless to abolish purchase, and that in abolishing it the Government had acted harshly and ungenerously towards the officers. They added that the officers were the only sound part of our military system, and that it was in reference to the Reserves and the men that the great difficulty arose. They said that the purchase money had been wasted; and that while that was done, the esprit de corps, which was so strong in the British Army, had been to a great extent destroyed. They further observed that the result of the policy which had been pursued was that great discontent and dissatisfaction prevailed in all ranks; that the opinions of practical military men were ignored; that the system of short service and no pensions had turned out to be a failure; that the general system of enlistment was hated by the soldier; and that the recruiting was not in a satisfactory state. They added that the Army was at present in a thoroughly unsatisfactory condition, and that as far as efficiency was concerned, it was in a better position 20 years ago. They stated in reference to the Militia, that it was insufficiently trained; that the Yeomanry as a cavalry fit to meet cavalry was comparatively worthless; and that the Volunteers as they were—and he cordially agreed with them—were almost useless. They asserted that the harmonious whole, which was said to be established, was a matter rather of name than of reality, and that our military system generally rested on no sound foundation. Those were the two sets of views in the country, and in dealing with them it became necessary to appeal to facts, for the question was one, he admitted, into which politics ought not to be allowed to enter, and such was not only his opinion, but that of the officers of the Army with whom he had come in contact. The facts, however, were not easily got at. Even Parliamentary Returns — though he wished to make no accusation whatever on that ground against his right hon. Friend—were not always to be relied on. As an instance of the difficulty of ascertaining facts, he might mention, as he had mentioned before, that it was said the divisional generals had reported unfavourably of the Control department at the late Autumn Manoeuvres, and that the Report which was presented, bearing the signature of the Commander-in-Chief, was not the original, but an amended Report, and did not give the view which had been first formed by His Royal Highness on the subject. That was a very grave matter, if it was true that the real opinions of the commanding officers could not be got at; and, if not true, the impression was one which ought as soon as possible to be removed. But to come to the facts; was it or was it not true, he should like to know, that discontent prevailed throughout the Army, both with regard to officers and men, and that the system of short service and recruiting was not working well? He ventured to say that very great discontent existed among the officers of the Army owing to the way in which they had been treated. That could hardly be disputed by anyone who looked into the Return which had been moved for by the Duke of Richmond in "another place." The first form of Petition which the officers had thought frequent changes in the terms of recruiting, nor did he wonder that in May last a longer term of service and the inducement of a pension were offered. He agreed with the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Seely) in what he stated on a former occasion as to the danger of letting loose, after a few years of service, a number of men trained to arms who had to seek the means of livelihood, and, he would add, who entertained feelings of dislike to the State who had had the best years of their life, and then allowed them to pass away unprovided for to any extent or degree. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Derbyshire (Major Wilmot) had told him that such was the effect of the present system, that if he were ordered on service he would rather have six of his old companies as they existed in 1853 than eight companies as they now were. But he might be told the Militia was in a satisfactory condition, and he might be referred to the figures of the Militia as they stood on the Estimates. The strength of the Militia of all ranks was there stated to be 135,234, a very imposing figure, but from which a tenth must be deducted for officers, permanent Staff, and non-commisioned officers. The Militia, however, was short of its establishment by 17,807, so that there were only 117,427 of all ranks enrolled. The Army Reserve of the First Class numbered 7,000 regular soldiers. The Militia Reserve was 31,522; but they were not extra to the Militia Force, and to get at the Militia Force that was available these 31,522 men must be deducted, who did not belong to the Militia, but were only trained with that Force. That left for the Militia of all ranks about 85,905 men. The figures looked well upon paper, but they were delusive, for instead of 117,427 men being trained that year, only 103,000 were trained, and if the Militia Reserves were deducted from that there would be only 72,000 remaining. The Militia infantry trained this year amounted to 74,957; but the infantry belonging to the Army Militia Reserve numbered 19,118, which left only 55,839 as the actual infantry Militia Force of this country at the present moment. To make the Militia an efficient and reliable Force it was necessary, in the opinion of competent military men, that they should be trained for one year continuously in the ranks, instead of for the present limited period. Would the officials of the War Office, in like manner, say that the Yeomanry were in a satisfactory condition as cavalry? Could they contend, for example, against an equal number of foreign cavalry? He feared that some time would elapse before their desired conversion into mounted rifles could be effected. As to the Volunteers, he had been a member of that Force for 14 years, and he could say for them, that at great personal inconvenience they did their duty as well as they could, and endeavoured to make themselves as efficient as possible. In 1860, when the Force was instituted, it was believed that it could be made so far efficient that when there was any danger of war, it could in the time afforded for preparation make itself thoroughly efficient and reliable—reliable in the sense that if trained to arms, and given a certain amount of organization and discipline, it might have been useful in the event of a foreign invasion. But since 1860 we had learnt some lessons. The events of 1866 and 1870 had shown that with the great Continental Powers it was only a word and a blow. Their military organization was so perfect that they did not want any time for making preparations, and therefore if war came upon us we should have no time to spare for the preparations of our Volunteers. That statement was as applicable to France as to Germany under the new French military system. Well, he asked any of his brother officers whom he saw around him, whether they felt that their regiments were in that position, as regarded efficiency and discipline, that they would be prepared at a fortnight's notice to meet such troops as would be brought against them, if the Volunteers had to fight for the defence of their native land? Having entered into this service in the hope of making his country strong, he had seriously asked himself whether under the circumstances he was justified in remaining in the Force and countenancing an untruth, seeing that the Force was now not what it professed to be, and was not to be trusted to meet in the field the Armies to which he had referred. He was bound to say that he did not regret the fact that there were 2,000 commissions vacant, or that there were 11,000 fewer efficient Volunteers this year than last, and he should even be be a wrong impression, but it induced the men to leave. Again, men on furlough found they did not benefit by the increased pay through the loss of rations. Further, the men complained of having to enlist for general service during the first 15 months of their service, instead of to join a particular regiment. The result of all that was that, instead of getting a thoroughly sound system of Reserves and admirable recruits, he found that desertions had gone on steadily increasing from 3,171 in 1870 to 4,553 in 1871, and 5,861 in 1872; and so far from the Army being 2,000 men over its strength, as stated in "another place" by the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for War, it was in reality reduced by 8,000 soldiers. He would now turn to the recruiting and the Reserves, and see the class of men they got. According to a Return on the Table they had during the last 24 years obtained the following recruits:—Between the ages of 17 and 18, 2,804; between the ages of 18 and 19, 10,093; at 19 years of age, 8,561; and at 21 years of age and over it, 11,632, making a total of 33,090. In the Prussian Service, out of that total only those who were of the age of 20 and upwards, or 11,632, would be deemed fit to be put in the ranks. It was a startling fact, therefore, that of the 33,090, no fewer than 21,958 would be considered unfit, under the Prussian system, to bear arms. Again, of the 13,000 recruits secured annually, only a little over 4,000 were able-bodied men according to the Prussian standard. They had now about 90,000 infantry of the Line, but so long as the system of six years' service continued, 15,000 men, or one-sixth of the whole, would be under 20 years of age, or not worth paying for. More than that, by a decision of that House, no soldier under 20 years of age was eligible to go to India. The result, therefore was, that these 15,000 men borne on the Home Establishment included not only the United Kingdom, but the garrisoning of Gibraltar, Malta, the Mauritius, Halifax, and, he believed, ports in China. With respect to the Reserves, a noble Duke in "another place" said that they could not be judged of until the year 1876. The noble Duke might have gone farther and said that they could not judge of the result of the six years' service system until 1882. In that year, however—taking the casualties at 8 per cent—it would require an annual recruiting at the rate of 13,000 men to give a Reserve of 39,000 men. So much for the state of the Army with reference to the question of Reserves, as shown by the Parliamentary Papers. What, now, was its actual condition? On Monday last a review was held at Aldershot, and it was an occasion on which England, as he might say, put its best leg foremost—the Heir of All the Russias being present. He hoped to have found some one at Aldershot who would say something good for the Army, but he sought such a person in vain. What was the field-state of the regiments on that occasion? There were on parade 9,409 men; in the ranks, 5,392; and the casualties, as they were called, including dismounted cavalry soldiers, were 3,893. The three brigades consisted of 15 regiments, and the average strength of each was 417, including affiliated companies, the actual average strength being only 359. What was the state of the companies as they marched past? In the 1st brigade the files were 26, 19, 26, 25, and 25; in the 3rd, 32, 24, 22, 25, and 25; while in the 2nd brigade they were 21, 21, 17, 13, and 21. If we had an ample and satisfactory system of recruiting that state of things would not be so very unsatisfactory; but, as matters were, no more unsatisfactory condition of the Army could well be conceived than the facts he had stated showed. The regiments were in that condition that if we were suddenly called upon to go to war we should have to denude one regiment for the benefit of another, and they were doing in the Army what had been protested against by the officers of Militia regiments—the volunteering from one regiment to another, as the Militia were allowed to volunteer into the Line. Our cavalry regiments were in the same unsatisfactory state as the infantry. On the occasion he had referred to there were only 1,161 horses in the field, giving an average for four regiments of 290 for each regiment. In fact, greater skeletons of regiments, both of cavalry and infantry, he never saw, though the depôts were called in to furnish supports; and all that arose from the shabby manner in which the soldier was dealt with. It was not surprising that, under existing circumstances, there should be would rest on the Government for not having had the courage to come forward and propose it.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is expedient that inquiry should be made into the present state of the Volunteer Force, and into the causes that have led to the resignations of over 2,000 Officers' Commissions, which are still vacant,"—(Colonel Charles Lindsay,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. CARDWELL said, he had listened for one hour and a-half to the noble Lord's speech, which was one which he hardly expected to have heard made on the Motion before the House; but he could scarcely say it came upon him without notice, as he thought he had heard all the arguments frequently before, and had on each occasion endeavoured to reply to them. The noble Lord seemed to have found a policy on which an aspiring Minister might go to the country, and believed in universal conscription without the liberty of procuring substitutes, and that the only persons to be exempted from it should be the Volunteers, and that was to be only for home defence. The policy of the noble Lord would, if carried into effect, leave India, which all who had studied the subject regarded as being our principal military difficulty, and all our foreign possessions, without any reliance upon this great country. He ventured to predict that any Ministry who went to the country upon such a policy as that would meet with no effectual support. The noble Lord admitted that in some respects the Government had improved our Military Forces; that they had doubled the force of our field artillery, and had done something towards increasing the efficiency of the cavalry. It must then be a gratification to the noble Lord to hear that the Government had within the last year made large additions to the supply of horses, and that that branch of the Service was now in a higher state of efficiency than it had been for many years before. The noble Lord had said that the Militia was not in a fit state to immediately compete with the veteran warriors of Germany. That might be so, but he could assure the House that the increase in the amount of training that was given to Militia recruits during the last few years had effected an immense improvement in that great constitutional defensive Force. The noble Lord had complained that the Yeomanry were not equal to highly-trained cavalry; but was he prepared to contend that the Force had not considerably improved under the recent Regulations during the last three or four years? The noble Lord should recollect that Rome was not built in a day, and he should give the Government some credit for the steps they had taken in the Spring to increase the efficiency of that force by appointing Cavalry Colonels to inspect the various Yeomanry regiments throughout the country. The noble Lord, speaking of the Volunteers, had characterized them as being totally useless. For his part, long before he expected to have anything to do with our military Forces, he had expressed in the House the utmost admiration and respect for the patriotic spirit which had given rise to, and had maintained, the Volunteer force in this country. He did not apprehend for a moment that without the Regular Army the Volunteers would be efficient in the field. It would be wrong to entertain such an expectation; but to speak of the Force as being totally useless was an assertion that the facts would not support. He believed that the Volunteer Force was of the greatest value; and he was told by competent military authorities, that with the notice that from our insular position we were certain to have before an enemy could land on these shores, the Volunteer Force could be rendered a most important and efficient addition to the Regular Army before we were attacked. The noble Lord admitted that the Government were acting on the right principle with regard to this Force—all he complained of was that they did not go far enough. The noble Lord had based his policy on three principles—in the first place he wished for conscription for the Militia—that was to say for that conscription which Lord Castlereagh had found to be useless—and he desired to exempt from this conscription the Volunteers—an exception which, when adopted during the great Peninsular War, had led Mr. Windham to taunt Mr. Addington with not only not having raised a defensive Force, but to have rendered the formation of it impossible, as he had driven 400,000 who would have otherwise been available for militia service to seek refuge in the Volunteer Force. The noble Lord's next principle was, that pensions should be offered as an inducement to enlist; but in the present state of feeling of the country, it would be absurd to seek to burden it with an enormous pension list. In making these observations he (Mr. Cardwell) did not speak in the interest of economy, but of defence; and he said that man was not a true friend of the country who built its defensive system up on so costly a foundation. The third great principle of the noble Lord was that purchase in the Army should not have been abolished. He had heard with astonishment the noble Lord say that night of that Army which had served so nobly before Sebastopol and during the Indian Mutiny, that its only sound part was that system which related to officers, and which had been abolished in 1871.

Lord ELCHO explained that what he had said was, that the system of purchase was one of the soundest parts in our military system; and that it was a waste of public money to do away with it. In doing so, he quoted the dicta of men of military experience, and had expressed no opinion of his own.

MR. CARDWELL was glad to hear the noble Lord disclaim what he had understood him to say; but it was evident that the noble Lord had heard more about the alleged discontent in the Army which had been produced in consequence of the abolition of purchase than he (Mr. Cardwell) had, and it was evident that the noble Lord believed in its existence more firmly than he did. It was quite true that 2,245 officers had signed a Memorial, which would undergo most respectful examination, and would be carefully considered. On that subject he would at present say no more. He knew, however, that sales of commissions in the Army were not going on with that extraordinary rapidity which would result if there were any deep-seated discontent among the officers, when they had only to take the trouble of walking down to Victoria Street in order to get a cheque for the price of their commissions, plus their over-regulation value. The noble Lord had been very eloquent on the paltry character of our Reserves. About four or five years ago the number of our Reserves amounted to some 3,000 or 4,000, whereas we had now 7,000 men in the First Class Army Reserve, more than 30,000 in the Militia Reserve, and nearly 20,000 men serving in the Army who were under the condition to join the Reserve at the expiration of their period of service. He thought that those figures might afford some comfort to the noble Lord, seeing the short time the present system had been in operation. The noble Lord had asked whether the Commander-in-Chief resembled the great General of Prussia or another foreign General—of whom he did not speak with the highest respect—and whether the Government were pursuing the military policy of Germany or that of France? The noble Lord said last year that the foundation of any good military system must be local, and that that was the Prussian system after Jena, which was so effective at Sadowa. In his (Mr. Cardwell's) opinion, the duty of Her Majesty's Government was not servilely to follow any system. The utmost to which they could aspire was to establish a system conformable to the habits, institutions, and wishes of the country. The noble Lord had spoken very disparagingly of the recruits. It was hardly patriotic thus to disparage one's own countrymen in the ranks, and the noble Lord would do well to attach less weight to what he picked up from the outside authorities to which he had referred, and which was not borne out by the Reports of the departments directly concerned.

The hon. and gallant Member for Abingdon (Colonel Lindsay) rather surprised him when in hortatory language he expressed his regret that the Secretary at War had not "let well alone." One would suppose that when the present Government came into office the state of the Volunteer Force was entirely satisfactory—but what was the exact state of the case? The first thing that happened when he was appointed to the War Office was, that a large deputation waited upon him. It was headed by his noble Friend, and comprised several Members of both Houses of Parliament. They had previously visited his predecessor in office, not to represent that the Volunteer Force was in a satisfactory position, but that it could not continue to exist without a very large increase of the Capitation Grant. His right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) had refused that request; but instead of imitating that conduct, and "letting well alone," the Government considered that application. They appointed a Committee to inquire into the average expense of the Volunteer Force, and the Committee having reported that it would require £5s. to sustain that Force, the Government decided to make that the Capitation Grant; only, instead of giving the money per capita over the whole body, they determined to give it in a larger sum to those officers who would qualify themselves for commands. It must also be remembered that in the year 1868 there were 1,553 vacant commissions, so that the number which the House was now discussing was not over 2,000, but the difference between 1,553 and the number specified. Well, as he had said, the Government had determined to increase the grant, not by spreading it throughout the whole of the ranks, but by giving it for increased efficiency to the officers, and they had added more than £50,000 a-year to the Vote given by Parliament to the Volunteer Forces. The Government thought it reasonable that a man who sought to command his fellow-men in arms should be qualified by military knowledge to lead them to victory and not to defeat. Surely, his hon. and gallant Friend must admit that the present Government had done a great deal better by the Volunteers, than if it had let them alone. The Government instituted schools, and he was assured by the highest authority—the Inspector General of the Auxiliary Forces—that, although there was a great diminution in the number of officers, there never was a time when there was so great a number of qualified officers in these Forces as at the present moment. They could not have gone to a school, unless the present Government had established one; and the result of the new arrangements was, that 11,582 officers and sergeants had obtained the additional grant by qualifications of special proficiency. Besides those advantages, the War Office had made up the camp allowance; they had armed the Volunteers with the breech-loaders; and they had furnished the Artillery Volunteers with 40-pounders and 60-pounders. It had been said that the examinations had a deterrent effect, and his hon. and gallant Friend added that two death-warrants had been issued in the shape of two camp Orders, one specifying the number required for special brigade drill, and the other for the annual inspection. His hon. and gallant Friend declared that these were intolerable conditions, but he would be pleased to hear on the high authority of his gallant Relative the Inspector General of the Auxiliary Forces that, generally speaking, the first camp Order had been complied with, and that there was no report of failure. With respect to the second Order, by which two-thirds of a corps were required to be present at the general inspection, at present the cases were extremely rare in which the inspection was postponed, because two-thirds were not present. When his hon. and gallant Friend saw that his gloomy prognostications had failed, he hoped he would feel satisfied that in prescribing examinations which he himself admitted were moderate, the Government had made the Force far more efficient and better than ever it was before. As to the unequal status of the officers with regard to presentations at Court, he was sure that the patriots who had devoted themselves with so much self-sacrifice to the service of their country would not have been discouraged even if there had been any fair ground of complaint, but there was no such inequality of status. All that had been done was, that it was considered that the men who devoted themselves in this way to the service of their country were entitled to hold their commissions, not from a subject, but direct from the Sovereign, and that was the only change which had been made. Next it was objected that they had required a certain fixed number of men to be present for battalion or company drill. He spoke in the presence of experienced Volunteer officers, who knew exactly what the state of the Force had been; and he asked, could there be anything more ridiculous, not to say more foolish, in every way than for an adjutant to go from his headquarters to visit his outlying corps, and to find only two or three men there to meet him? That was an evil which called for a remedy, and it would not have been letting well, but letting ill, alone to have failed to provide for it. He denied altogether that any injury had been done to the Force by that regulation. His hon. and gallant Friend had touched upon some other minor points, with which he would not occupy the House at any length. His hon. and gallant Friend said that by the Regulations issued from the War Office, the Brighton Review was stopped. But they did nothing of the kind; and for his own part all he knew of it was what he saw in the newspapers, and from that he thought it was chiefly owing to the increased fares which were proposed to be in force during the occasion. As to the complaint that they had last year required the Volunteers who attended the Autumn Maneuvres to attend 15 days; was that, he asked, unfriendly as regarded the Volunteers? He assured his hon. and gallant Friend that the motive of that arrangement was to enable the Volunteers, in the presence of distinguished foreign visitors, and of that vast assembly of their own countrymen who went to witness the Maneuvres, to go through the operation with credit. And it was the opinion of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief that if the Volunteers were to stand by the side of the Regular soldiers and the Militia in a spectacle of that kind, it was desirable that they should have at least a week's military training. But this year, when the operations were to be on a different scale, they would be permitted to go for eight days only. Surely that would not be very hard upon the Volunteers? With respect to the position of the adjutants, the Government had done nothing to injure them; on the contrary, it had given them honorary rank. He supposed that his hon. and gallant Friend would be satisfied with the discussion which he had raised. His hon. and gallant Friend had appealed to him to state his opinions and feelings with regard to the Volunteers. He had expressed them so often that he had scarcely anything to add to what he had previously said; but there was no man in this country who took a deeper interest in the origination of that movement—no man who entertained a higher sense of the value of that great Force, or a greater respect for the patriotic motives which induced them to sacrifice their time and labour to that service than he did. He sincerely hoped his hon. and gallant Friend would continue to devote himself to the cause he had served so long and so well. He rejoiced to know that the great meeting at Wimbledon was never better attended than in the present year. He trusted that the success of the Volunteer Force would be proportionate to the merits of those who conducted it; and he assured his hon. and gallant Friend that no effort should be wanting on his part, as long as he had any responsibility in the matter, to promote by every means in his power the objects which they all had at heart.

LORD ELCHO, in explanation, denied he had said that the Volunteers were a useless Force.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL maintained that the officers of the Army were discontented, and were only waiting to see what the Secretary of State would do. The moment the officers found their complaints were not listened to, the right hon. Gentleman might depend upon it that he would hear of a great many more sales.

EARL PERCY said, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had not answered the question that had been raised. He told them Government had done many good things for the Volunteers, but he had not told them anything about the causes which had led to the resignation of the commissions of so many officers. They had a large Force without officers. That he looked upon as the most unsatisfactory aspect of the question. The right hon. Gentleman said there was only a difference of some 500 in the number of the officers now as compared with the time when he came into office, and he spoke of that as if it were nothing. That question had been dealt with in a perfunctory manner by the Government, and he hoped it would not be lost sight of by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Abingdon (Colonel Lindsay). He hoped that if the Volunteer Force was to be continued, it would be well officered and well led.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he should be sorry if it were thought the Volunteers generally concurred in the idea that the changes which had been made had been detrimental to the Force. Having devoted 14 years to that movement, his experience had been that every call made upon the Volunteers to become more efficient was welcome to them. As to officers, he had never found any difficulty in obtaining an adequate supply of admirably qualified officers. The difficulty was not to find officers, but as in the Army, to find men. He wanted to see the Volunteers not less, but still more amalgamated with the Army, and the more they proceeded in that direction, the better it would be for them. What it was desirable to do was, to get rid of skeleton regiments without officers; and if the right hon. Gentleman would insist on a proper education of the officers, he would do great good.

MR. WHITWELL considered that of the three points stated by the hon. and gallant Member for Abingdon, as those upon which the Volunteers were dissatisfied, two of them had no foundation in fact. On the contrary, there was great satisfaction amongst the officers that they derived their commissions from the Queen. He considered that the changes made had given satisfaction generally to the Volunteers throughout the country, and he should therefore vote against the Motion.

COLONEL C. H. LINDSAY said, although not satisfied with the explanations of the right hon. Gentleman, he would not trouble the House to divide.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," proposed.

* CHANCERY (FUNDS) ACT—THE ACCOUNTANT GENERAL IN CHANCERY.
RESOLUTION.

MR. DICKINSON, in rising to call attention to the Return showing the Grant of a Pension to the late Accountant General of the Court of Chancery, and the absence of any special circumstances justifying the Grant, and to move—

"That the Lord Chancellor and the Lords of the Treasury re-consider the question and state distinctly what are the special circumstances which, in their opinion, justify a departure from the rules laid down in the Act 22 Vic. c. 26, s. 7." said, the Accountant General was paid a salary of £2,500 a-year. In 1850 a Select Committee recommended that the salary of the Accountant General should be £2,000 a-year, fixing that amount as sufficiently high, and the Committee of 1864 endorsed the recommendation. He had the power of appointing the broker in Chancery, and the arrangement which he made with the broker was that he (the Accountant General) should receive half the amount of his brokerage—so that he took that in addition to his salary. In his (Mr. Dickinson's) opinion, his salary and the brokerage brought his income up to £4,200 a-year which he had been in receipt of ever since 1839 to the present year. Thus he had been receiving £4,200 a-year for 30 years. With regard to pension he thought there was no pretence for going beyond two-thirds of the salary in this instance; and he, therefore, asked the House to adopt such a course as would have the effect of checking such an appropriation of the public money.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Member had in the course of last Session made a Motion, in which he brought the Accountant General's salary under consideration, and succeeded in introducing a clause in the Bill providing that the Accountant General's pension should be two-thirds of his salary. That provision, in accordance with what was understood to be the feeling of the whole House, including the hon. Gentleman himself, was afterwards changed, the Bill having been re-committed for the purpose. It was settled by the Lord Chancellor and himself, under the powers vested in them, that he should have his full salary under the Act, and it became as irrevocable as the Act itself. For those reasons he held that it was impossible that any further change could now be made in the matter.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

THE TICHBORNE CASE—
THE QUEEN v. CASTRO, alias TICHBORNE.
CONTEMPT OF COURT.
OBSERVATIONS.

MR. WHALLEY, in rising to call attention to the state of the Law relating to offences known as Contempt of Court, and especially to the recent administration of the Law in the Court of Queen's Bench in relation to the Tichborne Case now pending in that Court, said, that he had on various occasions endeavoured to state his views on this subject, but he had not succeeded, and at that late hour he would therefore confine himself to a very few words. In consequence of the manner in which this law of contempt had been administered, it was not possible for the defendant to have such a trial as would satisfy the prayer of above 100,000 persons, and at least five times that number whom he had himself seen and heard expressing the same opinion. Complete silence had been imposed on the Press and the public by the action of the Court, and the consequence was that the man was utterly destitute. Even a Petition could not be presented to that House, and he was entirely deprived of the means of defending himself in a prosecution instituted by the Government. After Dr. Wheeler, a witness for the defendant, had been examined by the Solicitor to the Treasury, he received a position abroad, with a salary four times greater than he had ever earned in his profession, so that he was prevented from giving evidence in the defendant's favour. That information he had from Dr. Wheeler himself. He held in his hand evidence which, he believed, would be conclusive before a Court of Justice, but if steps were not taken to bring it before the Court it would be utterly useless to the defendant. He would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, that that precedent might in future be found most prejudicial to the administration of justice. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman that he had himself consented to the publication of a correspondence which had passed between himself and the Secretary to the Treasury on the subject. If the Secretary to the Treasury was not prepared to allow this man the money necessary to produce his witnesses, now that the case for the prosecution had closed, he should, at least, take such measures as would ensure justice being done. If not, it would create a general feeling of dissatisfaction in the country.

Mr. BRUCE said, he was glad the hon. Gentleman had been allowed to unburden himself, and he hoped he would no longer think it necessary to occupy the time of the House with that subject. The hon. Gentleman had asked him whether it was not the duty of the Government to have provided funds not only for the prosecution, but also for the defence. He had all along suggested that the course which the Government had taken was not only unusual but in itself wrong. What did the hon. Gentleman think should have been done when the Judge ordered that the defendant should be prosecuted? From that moment, it became the duty of the Government to undertake the prosecution. Had no such action been taken, there would have been a scandalous failure of justice for which the Government would have been responsible. The hon. Gentleman then said that the Government, having done that—having undertaken the prosecution—should also undertake the defence—that they should employ counsel and bring up the witnesses for both sides, forgetful that public prosecutions existed in every country in Europe. What did that mean? How could he distinguish that from any other case? Then the hon. Gentleman spoke of the difficulties to which the defendant had been exposed in consequence of the ruling of the Judges with reference to the law of contempt. Now, he did not deny that there were special circumstances in the case, but if those who advocated the cause of the defendant had conducted themselves with decency and propriety, without making reflections on the Judges or on the conduct of the trial, they might have acted with perfect security, and it was because they had not done so that difficulties had arisen.

Mr. WHALLEY rose to Order.

An Hon. MEMBER: I also rise to Order, Sir, and move that the House be counted.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 14th July, 1873.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
Public Records (Ireland) Act (1867) Amendment* (209); Steam Threshing Machines* (210).

Second Reading—Public Schools (Eton College Property)* (204).

Report—Colonial Church* (208).

Third Reading—Tithe Commutation Acts Amendment* (171); Indian Railways Registration* (164); National Debt Commissioners (Annuites)* (191); Slave Trade (Consolidation)* (188); Prison Officers Superannuation (Ireland)* (192), and passed.

AFRICA—WEST COAST SETTLEMENTS
—THE ASHANTEE INVASION.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said—seeing the noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies in his place—that after what appeared in the newspapers that morning, any information which the noble Earl could give their Lordships on the subject of the hostilities between our forces at Elmina and the Ashantees would be listened to with interest.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he was much obliged to the noble Duke for giving him an opportunity of stating what had occurred. The summary of news that had appeared in the papers was generally correct. The date of the last despatch received from Cape Coast Castle was the 16th of June. Immediately before that despatch was written the engagement at Elmina referred to in the public papers had been fought between Her Majesty's military and naval forces and a body of Ashantees, in which the latter were repulsed. The forces on that occasion were commanded, the land force by Lieutenant-Colonel Festing, and the naval by Captain Fremantle, and both branches of the service conducted themselves with the greatest gallantry, and were led with the greatest skill and prudence. The Ashantees were repulsed with great loss, leaving not fewer than 200 men dead on the field, besides a great number of wounded. Our loss in that engagement and a slight skirmish which had occurred previously was two killed and seven wounded. Our regular troops were assisted by a body of Houssas, whose bravery was spoken of in the highest terms. The despatch of Lieutenant-Colonel Festing addressed to the War Office, and that of Captain Fremantle addressed to the Admiralty, which gave all the details of the engagement, would be published to-morrow, and therefore he need not enter into details in replying to the Question of the noble Duke. Another operation had been carried out previously. He alluded to the destruction of a portion of the town of Elmina—only a portion of it had been destroyed, because the other parts had remained loyal. That operation was undertaken in consequence of the disaffection of the inhabitants of a portion of the town, who showed a disposition to give aid to the Ashantees. Full notice was given to the inhabitants of that part of the town which was destroyed to remove, and Colonel Harley stated that owing to that precaution no life was lost. It was to be regretted that such a step should have become necessary, although there was strong ground for suspicion; but he might mention that the removal of the buildings which had been destroyed was not only necessary for the safety of the garrison but was also attended with sanitary advantages as they approached so close to the fort that proper steps would not be taken for the health of the forces. As regarded the probability of an attack on Cape Coast Castle, it was true that deserters from the enemy had informed the authorities that a force of Ashantees encamped at a distance of about 15 miles from Cape Coast Castle and Elmina respectively intended to make such an attack, and that in furtherance of that object scouts had advanced within seven miles of Cape Coast Castle; but Colonel Harley and the officers engaged in dealing with the Ashantees expressed no doubt as to the result of such an attack. As to stores and provisions, their Lordships might remember that on a former occasion he mentioned that two steamers on their way to Cape Coast had been lost, and apprehensions were entertained that a considerable supply of stores had been lost in them. After full inquiry, it had been ascertained that scarcely any military stores were in either of those ships. The whole of the military stores which he had supposed to have been on those steamers had been received at Cape Coast, and they were amply sufficient for all the wants of the troops. He believed the only loss experienced was that of a number of boots and great-coats; though it was possible that some military stores might have been put on board those steamers at Sierra Leone. If this was the case, such stores were lost; but none had been sent in those steamers from this country. A large supply of provisions had been sent out already, and much more was about to follow, in the shape of maize, rice, and other food suitable to the population.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE observed that the statement of the noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies was satisfactory as far as it went; but he ventured again to suggest that the natives should be armed and drilled for the purpose of service against the enemy in the interior. He understood that intelligence had been received up to the 23rd of June, and at that time there was a demand on the part of the colonists for gunboats to secure the safety of tribes under our protection.

CHURCH ASSOCIATION—CONFESION
IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

Lord ORANMORE AND BROWNE, in calling attention to this subject, said, the only reason he brought forward so important, so very difficult a question, was because no Member of the House more entitled and more capable had done so, and because he believed, with the Archbishops, not only that our national institutions for the maintenance of religion were endangered, but that those institutions were unjustly perverted to teaching antagonistic to them. He thought measures should be taken to stay this course of teaching within our Church, and that this branch of the Legislature, where the heads of the Church and the laity met together, was the most appropriate place to consider what measures should be taken towards that end. As to the reply of the Archbishops to the Church Association, he must say that he rejoiced that at last the efforts of that association were acknowledged as beneficial, and that, however tardily, their Graces had condemned Confession as having no place in our Church. It was acknowledged that the Petition of the 480 clergymen to Convocation expressed the views of a much larger number of the clergy than those signing. The Archbishop of Canterbury so stated in the Debate in Convocation, an eminent Member of the Church Union had stated to him they could easily have obtained ten times as many. This Petition asked for Sacramental Confession, the reservation of the Eucharist, the use of Unction in baptism, in confirmation, and in the visitation of the sick, the consecration of oils by the Bishop, and the administration of Holy Communion at burials and at other commemorations of the dead; also a proper preface for the feasts of the Blessed Virgin. The petitioners claimed these developments because other irregular developments had been already sanctioned by the Bishops. The clergy of this school and the Church Union, who were their representatives, prayed, as in the case of the Purchas judgment, the Bishops to ignore the decisions of the Privy Council when such decisions were displeasing to them—that was, the clergy of the Established Church who held their position and emoluments only under the law, claimed a position above or independent of the law. All these developments which, if not Roman Catholic, were ultra-Catholic, and contrary to all the principles of our Established Church, were already carried out by special services published in a book called The Priest's Prayer Book. The preface to this thanked the Bishops and theologians who had corrected the proofs; and that this book was much used in spite of the Clerical Subscription Act, which required the use of the Common Prayer and no other, was shown by the edition he held in his hand being the fifth. Besides the points prayed for in the Petition, there were services for the Life Profession of Brothers and Sisters, a Litany for the Dead, an Office for Unmarried Women after Childbirth, &c. On the acceptance of these practices and these doctrines, Archbishop Manning, Dr. Newman, and no fewer than 200 or 300 clergymen of the Church of England had fait themselves bound to join the Church of Rome. While we regretted that their convictions led them to take this course, we must respect their honesty, which brought out in painful contrast the conduct of those clergymen who, holding these ultra-Catholic views, still held also their emoluments and position as clergymen of the Established Church. Did they do evil that good might come? Did they remain in our Church to educate her people in these ultra-Catholic doctrines and practices, looking for Disestablishment and their share of the £90,000,000 which the Premier had stated would then accrue to the Disestablished Church of England? It was quite certain the right hon. Gentleman would not refuse them their share on account of their Catholic propensities. Could any system be imagined more contrary to that straightforward dealing on which Englishmen used to pride themselves? Could any system more tend to lower the whole tone of public morality than for clergymen, claiming a higher degree of sanctity than their neighbours, to allow themselves to be induced by any sophistry or casuistry to adopt a line of action so indefensible? In the debate in the Upper House of Convocation, the Bishops all agreed that Sacramental Confession was contrary to the mind and alien to the practice of the Church of England. They all agreed that the Confessional was now commonly practised in the Church. They all assented to the fact that great peril arose in the Sisterhoods from the Confessional, as well as from young men confessing young women; and that great scandals had arisen from these causes, which the Bishops had no power to prevent. Yet the right rev. Bench expressed sympathy for some kind of Confession, which evidently went beyond that intended by the Prayer Book. He did not know what kind of Confessional they wished, but he must refer the House and the public to what it was likely to be, from the instructions which were given to a priest in a book called The Priest in Absolution, &c. This book was published by Joseph Masters; it was Part I. and the second edition. On applying for the second Part, the publisher said he could not give it without the consent of the author, the Rev. J. C. Chambers, who replied that the second Part was reserved for Priests specially recommended. What Part II. was he could not say, but he could not understand how it could be a more filthy production than Part I. He had not read it through, and he would not abuse the Privileges of the House by reading extracts, for if he read them elsewhere he would assuredly be liable to imprisonment under Lord Campbell's Act, for its contents were in great measure the same as The Confessional Unmasked, being in great part a copy of Dens' Theology, explaining how a confessor was to act in questioning with regard not only to every natural and unnatural crime that could be committed, but as to every foul thought which could be suggested by the foulest imagination. Should any noble Lord doubt his accuracy he would lay the book on the Table, and refer him to pages 24 and 64, but he could not advise their perusal. A most distinguished Member of the right rev. Bench (the Bishop of Peterborough) had "denounced the Confessional as an outrage on decency and common sense." He said—"I maintain that taking God's place without God's attributes it is impossible, however prudent a priest may be, to avoid instilling vice by the Confessional." So much for the Confessional in our Church! But it had been alleged as more advantageous to accept all Roman Catholic doctrines into our Church than that those holding them should leave it. Let us learn the results; from the Catholic Register of February, 1873, it appeared that in London alone 2,000 perverts had joined the Roman Catholic Church. The Register stated that "a regular stream came from the different Sisterhoods and Ritualistic congregations." Let us see how dispassionate lookers on view this movement. The Allgemeine Zeitung spoke of England as the El Dorado of Popery—that while it was opposed in every other country in Europe, it met with every encouragement in England, where to become a Catholic had among the aristocracy and upper ten thousand, especially among the ladies, come to be a mark of distingué fashion, against which the arguments of common sense were as little availing as against any of the other freaks of the reigning mode—as crinoline yesterday, chignon to-day. But the question was, what remedy would you apply? First, he would ask the Bishops, "Do you exercise the powers you undoubtedly possess to repress and discourage the different practices of the High Church party?" They could inhibit clergy belonging to other dioceses from preaching in theirs. Well, the Bishop of this diocese allowed Mr. Bennett and Dr. Littledale, the extremest members of the Ritualistic clergy, to preach in London. Indeed, the only case of inhibition he had heard of was by the right rev. Prelate on the front benches (the Bishop of Winchester), who inhibited a clergyman of the diocese of London from giving Protestant lectures in Lambeth, though the same lectures had been given with the approbation of two successive Bishops of London, and this in spite of the 66th canon, which specially directed Bishop and clergy to preach to Popish recusants. The right rev. Prelate smiled; but he would like to hear some explanation from the right rev. Prelate. Would not the practice complained of be discouraged if this canon were not laid aside? Then, the Bishops had large patronage, but it was stated a right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Peterborough) had given half the patronage in his gift to the clergy who signed the protest on the Parchas judgment. Then the Bishops could revoke licences of curates. Half the signatures to the petition to Convocation were by curates. He doubted not they should hear excellent reasons why their licences were not revoked. Was it true that one of them was curate to the Examining Chaplain of a distinguished member of the right rev. Bench (the Bishop of Winchester)? If he remained in that position, would the public think that the Examining Chaplain disapproved the prayer of the petition? and if the right rev. Prelate continued his Examining Chaplain with a curate holding these views, it would be difficult to convince the public that the right rev. Prelate disapproved them. Then, though no layman could take action against a clergyman without the consent of the Bishops—after the Church Association had at great expense proved what was the law of the Church—yet he believed there was no case at present of any Member of the right rev. Bench taking proceedings to stay illegal practices, though a right rev. Prelate had in Convocation alleged that no Church in the universe was in so great a state of disorder as the Church of England. Then, if the Bishops wanted new powers, why did they not come to Parliament and ask for them? The right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Peterborough) in a debate on a Bill proposed by the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury), said that a Bishop was in the position of a Commander-in-Chief of an Army. He would ask him what would be said of a Commander-in-Chief who, with mutiny in his camp and his Army dwindling away by desertion, looked on and did nothing? Doubtless, the difficulties were great, as was the responsibility; but he believed if they had been faced in a courageous spirit they might never have existed, and that even now, by earnestness and vigour, they could be at least stayed. If not stayed, they would be constantly increasing; for, if not discouraged, ambition would make all the younger clergy join the Ultra-Catholic party, and through the churches and schools and pulpits of the Ritualistic party these doctrines were being daily propagated. In the upper classes he thought they were fools playing with edge tools, but they had their choice of schools and churches; not so the poor in rural parishes. It was to them the wrong was done—a grievous wrong it was; for in many such parishes they chose between the parish school and church or none at all. They would not allow a Roman Catholic priest to cross their threshold, but they received the clergyman of the parish as their natural guide, and did not the Legislature and the Bishops do the poor a great wrong if a minister of the Established Church only led them to accept Roman Catholic teaching, thus becoming a propaganda of Rome? But many would think that the Established Church was safe because Mr. Miall's Motion was rejected by so large a majority; but let them consider how entirely Protestant in their feelings were the electors who returned that majority. Their minds were, it was true, at present far more occupied with the pursuit of material comforts than religious questions; but they had shown their Protestant convictions for though they had returned Jews, they would not return a single Roman Catholic to represent them. He firmly believed they held to the saying that the Established Church was neither high nor low, but broad—not high enough to include Roman Catholics or Ultra-Catholics, not low enough to include sceptics or infidels, but broad enough to include within its pale all Protestants who accepted an Episcopal form of Church Government, and which extended its countenance and support to all Bible Christians whatever the form of Church government they selected. It was on these principles that the Church of England had till of late retained the sympathy and support she had secured during the three centuries of her existence; she had been regarded as the great centre round which all Protestants revolved, and if she were false to her Protestant character her knell was already sounded. It was his intention to take the opinion of the House on the Motion of which he had given Notice, perhaps not with a view to appoint a Committee at this late period of the Session, but as a declaration that some action was necessary to stay the advance of those dangers which threatened our Church.

Moved that a Select Committee be appointed to consider by what legislation or other means the danger apprehended of a considerable minority of the clergy and laity desiring to subvert the principles of the Reformation may be averted.—(The Lord Oranmore and Browne.)

we, the Bishops, desire to see kept. One other point I wish to mention for your Lordships' consideration. Of late times there has been one great obstacle to the establishment of these objectionable practices among us, and that is the existence of the High Court of Appeal, which in almost every instance has ordered these illegal practices to be discontinued. I beg, therefore, that if your Lordships in your wisdom shall substitute another Court for the Court of Appeal, which for a long time past has pronounced its opinions upon this subject, you will see that the new tribunal is thoroughly able to enter into the whole of these difficult questions, and that nothing is done to encourage certain persons calling themselves the English Church Union, who have placed in my hands a paper in which they declare to your Lordships and the whole country that they consider the decision of lay Courts in these matters possesses no spiritual or ecclesiastical validity. These persons call upon the Bishops not to pay any attention to the decisions of the highest Court of Appeal, because they would thus give a spiritual validity to these decisions. I think it is worth your Lordships' while to consider whether you ought not in every way to strengthen the hands of those who desire to see that the law of the land and of the Church is obeyed in these matters. It is a most unfortunate thing, as I have said, that any Professors of Theology in one of our great Universities should have expressed themselves against that which is pronounced to be the law of the Church. I consider it also a great misfortune that certain clergy connected with the cathedral of this metropolis should publish their determination to violate the law of the Church and of the land; and I cannot but think that a great responsibility rests upon those who appoint to posts of influence in the Church to see that they nominate persons who are perfectly loyal, not only to the general principles of the Church of England, but also to the law of the land and of the Church, as interpreted by the highest of our Courts.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER: My Lords, I wish to say a word or two upon one part of the speech of the noble Lord who has made this Motion. He has stated that I, because I differ from the opinion of a certain clergyman, inhibited him from coming to my diocese and preaching in it, and that this was the more wrong because two right rev. Prelates of the diocese of London had in succession given him permission to deliver the very lectures which I inhibited him from delivering. Now, I certainly smiled when this was said by the noble Lord; but I smiled simply because of the tissue of mis-statements made by the noble Lord. First, I did not inhibit the rev. gentleman; secondly, I did not differ from that which he wished to deliver; thirdly, no Bishop of London ever did licence the delivery of those lectures. These being the real facts, I hope I did not do very wrong in smiling. The case lies in a nutshell. A clergyman in the diocese of London, who in his own church—not with any licence from the Bishop, but from his own natural authority as incumbent—had delivered certain lectures, proposed to deliver in St. Saviour's Southwark, in my diocese, in which he had no cure, a set of lectures against the Roman Catholic Church, which may have been the same lectures as he had delivered in his own church. The churchwarden of St. Saviour's came to me and said there was a general objection to these controversial subjects being brought in this way into the church by a stranger to the diocese. St. Saviour's is a peculiar church, for it has two conjoint vicars, one of whom had given his permission to the delivery of the lectures, while the other sent the churchwarden to me to say he objected. Therefore I did not inhibit the rev. gentleman, but wrote to him a private letter, telling him that, under these circumstances, I could not let him deliver the lectures; that from all I had heard of his preaching I should rejoice to have him preach on my side of the water; and that, though, under the circumstances, I could not allow these controversial lectures to be delivered in St. Saviour's Church, I should be very glad, after he had sent me a syllabus of the lectures, to hear them delivered to the young men of Southwark in any of the many halls that were available for such a purpose there. I do not think that in this matter I showed myself tyrannical or overbearing. It certainly was never my wish to silence one for whom I have a very great respect, and who, I believe, judging from his letters, has a kind feeling towards me. I think I could say exactly who gave the noble Lord his brief; but he has been misled, for, as I have said, I inhibited no one; I did not differ from the rev. gentleman in opinion on the subject of his lectures—I was ready to welcome him to my diocese; but, upon the objection of the other vicar and the churchwarden, I certainly did object to the delivery of the lecture in that particular church. I am not going to enter upon the wide subject which has been introduced to us by the noble Lord; but I cannot pass over another charge, brought against the Rev. Dr. Woodford, my examining chaplain, because a curate of his is said to have signed this foolish address. It may have been so; and the curate may have been the very man who, in signing the address, thought he was petitioning against the Burials Bill; but Dr. Woodford would not have fallen into such a mistake, and, being in no danger of making such a blunder, he is just as far from the still greater danger of understanding what the address was about and then signing it.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am not one to under-rate the gravity of the duties of the most rev. Prelate, but I feel bound to protest in one respect against the manner in which he has thought fit to perform them. I cannot think that it is either convenient for the conduct of your Lordships' debates, or just to individuals, that the most rev. Prelate should select this opportunity for uttering condemnations of a strong and grave character against persons who are not present, and whom he would have other opportunities of censuring if he thought fit. I do not know what petition he refers to; but I do know that if a Member of the Government had referred to some Paper which was not upon your Lordships' Table—especially if it affected the conduct of individuals—we should at once have interfered and called him to Order, requesting him first to lay the Paper before the House. I do not think it is fair to apply to these Professors language so very grave as the most rev. Prelate has used, imputing to them a dereliction of duty, in reference to a Paper which is not in our hands, and from which, therefore, it is impossible to select any passages which might, in our opinion, show that the most rev. Prelate has done the Professors injustice or has misunderstood the course they have taken. I must make a similar protest as to his allusion to particular clergymen. If a clergyman has done wrong, let a Bishop exercise his episcopal authority in correcting him; but do not let any Bishop who thinks a clergyman has done wrong attack him in an Assembly where he cannot defend himself.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: I alluded to no particular clergymen.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The most rev. Prelate alluded to certain clergymen who had signed the petition, and therefore, of course, they were all included in his condemnation. It is a grave thing to tell four or five gentlemen that they have committed a breach of the law; and their answer may well be that they take a different view of what the law is, and do not consciously disobey it. If censure is thought necessary, it should be pronounced in another place and after proper investigation. I am not venturing to pronounce an opinion upon the conduct of the Professors. I am only protesting against a course which seems to me contrary to the spirit of equity and of fairness to individuals which always characterizes your Lordships' deliberations. Some other observations made by the most rev. Prelate also seem to me open to objection as being out of Order. The most rev. Prelate canvassed certain alterations made in the constitution of the Final Court of Appeal by the Bill which is now in "another place." I will only say with respect to his remarks on that point that, however grievous may be the language which, in his judgment has been used by the President of the English Church Union, that misconduct has occurred under the existing system, during the continuance of the present admirable Court of Appeal, and, therefore, forms no argument against attempting to reform that Court. I earnestly trust, with the most rev. Prelate, that in making any change in the constitution of that Court your Lordships will be careful that persons thoroughly qualified to interpret the law of England are placed there; and I think that no persons can be better qualified than such as have been trained in the study and practice of the law. The question which the noble Lord on the cross-benches (Lord Oranmore) has raised is, no doubt, a most important one. I am sure, however, he will feel that whatever we may think of his opinions it would be absolutely impossible for us at this period of the Session to adopt the course he has suggested. The general judgment of the public and the emphatic expression of your Lordships opinion on the subject will no doubt have their due effect upon those few persons who incline to these objectionable practices. Among the English people generally—among thinking men—there is no difference of opinion upon this question of "habitual confession." We have seen it tried in other countries—it was tried in olden time in our own—we know that besides its being unfavourable to that which we believe to be Christian truth, in its results it has been injurious to the moral independence and virility of the nation to an extent to which probably it has been given to no other institution to affect the character of mankind. I believe that if there are men in this country who think they will ever persuade the English people to adopt the practice of "habitual confession," they are proposing the most chimerical and the wildest scheme that ever entered into the heads of any men. No doubt our Church does not encourage "habitual confession," and the practice is opposed to the religious convictions of the English people. But it is not only a religious question. It so happens that this practice is deeply opposed to the peculiarities and idiosyncrasies which have been developed among the English people ever since they became a free people. The English people are specially jealous of putting unrestricted power into the hands of a single man. More than any other system the practice of "habitual confession" does put unrestricted and irresponsible power into the hands of a single man. An Englishman values and cherishes as a precious treasure the privacy of his family life—he looks with abhorrence upon any system that introduces another power into that family life, that introduces a third person between father and daughter and husband and wife. I believe that these reasons, apart from religious doctrine, have such powerful influence upon the English people that it would require the very strongest convictions of a positive revelation to induce them to conform to a practice which is so utterly opposed to their habits and feelings. Under such circumstances, and with this opinion of the convictions of the nation on the subject, is it not, I ask, a natural inference, that we—that some of us—are giving way to an undignified panic? If a few clergymen have signed, consciously or unconsciously, the Memorial in question, there are 20,000 clergymen in England; and a percentage of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  of folly is but a small proportion among so large a body of men. I doubt whether the two Houses of Parliament, if tested, would escape with a much lighter weight of folly. The grown-up male population of this country will never confess—there is not the slightest danger of the introduction of that practice among them. I venture to say if an account were obtained of the number of middle-aged men who confess it would convey very important information. That number, I believe, would be shown to be so small that no fear need be entertained of the introduction of "habitual confession" among the husbands or fathers in this country; and the authority and influence of husbands and fathers in this country is not so low as to give us any cause for fear lest the practice should be introduced into their families. If this be the case, surely there is no reason for the vehement language or the expression of such fears by the noble Lord, nor for the indiscriminate censure which the most rev. Prelate has thought it right to utter. In a matter of such importance the people of England may be left to take care of themselves. I should be deeply grieved if any large proportion of the clergy betook themselves to the practice of "habitual confession"; but, as I am quite sure the laity will never surrender themselves to the practice, I cannot see that we have grounds for any great alarm.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, he had listened with the greatest satisfaction to the denunciation of the practice of systematic Confession which had fallen from the noble Marquess, his noble Friend behind him, and he hoped it might be useful in many quarters; but he could not concur with him in the estimate which he had formed of the extent of the evil, or think with him that it might safely be neglected. He could not think that because as yet perhaps few men of middle age could be found to practise it, therefore it was safe to wish to ignore its existence among women and among the young of both sexes, among whom undoubtedly it prevailed to a great extent, and among whom every effort was made to extend it, not by a few scattered clergymen here and there, but by a body of men organized for the purpose, some of them placed, as we have heard from the most rev. Prelate, in positions of honour and influence by the Crown, and he (the Earl of Harrowby) would add also, by Bishops themselves, as well as by many private persons. He (the Earl of Harrowby) held in his hand a paper, reprinted from The Rock, containing the names and whole organization of this body, and it was fearful to observe the influence which they were enabled to exercise in the future destiny of the country. Was it a matter of indifference, however safe they might feel themselves, to what fearful influences their wives, their daughters—aye, and their sons, too—were exposed? The real question, after all, was—What was the remedy? He (the Earl of Harrowby) was afraid that it was not easy. The disease could scarcely be met by simple legislation or by the enforcement of law. The practice could not in itself be forbidden, like certain Ritual practices in Churches, because in itself Confession was lawful in our Church, if not systematic, or enforced upon the conscience. Perhaps their Lordships would allow him (the Earl of Harrowby) to quote upon this point the solemn saying of a deceased Friend of his, the late Bishop of Lichfield. On the last day of his life, he (the Bishop of Lichfield) was attending a public meeting on behalf of a public school, the system of which, rightly or wrongly, had been suspected of encouraging the practice of Confession. The question arose from the meeting—"What about Confession?" The Bishop rose, much agitated, from his seat, and said—

"If Auricular Confession is alluded to, that belongs to the Church of Rome, and I could have nothing to do with it; the Church of England does not encourage Confession. It only permits it on certain occasions."

Having said this, he sat down, and they were the last words he spoke in public, for he died that evening. Well, the question still remained—What was the remedy? I can well understand the difficulty which the Bishops have in meeting evils of this kind by process of law; the expenses, the uncertainty, the odium attached to the prosecution of individuals, some, at least, of whom are men of known piety and learning, and many of, at least, activity in their parishes, whether wisely exercised or not. The odium, I say; for it is the habit of Englishmen to be very zealous in the prosecution of a criminal, but, as soon as the prosecution is successful, to be equally zealous to get him off. There are 50 reasons by which a Bishop may be deterred from entering on a course of prosecutions, and nothing but a course of prosecutions is allowed to be effectual in the modern ethics of the Ritual clergy. But there are doors of influence still open to a Bishop, more effective in meeting an evil like this of Confession, than any prosecution. In their Charges, in their Ordinations, by private admonitions, and, above all, in their patronage, and in their support of institutions, they must show their sense of the danger and of the enormity of the evil. The remonstrances of the laity in regard to Romanizing practices must not be met by the cold shoulder, so often presented to them on such occasions, by representations of the value of peace and quietness, and by the representations that they had better look to their own deficiencies than be watchful over the excesses of others. Let the opinions of the Bishops, individually or collectively, in a matter of this kind be never left in doubt, so that everyone may know, that if practices of this nature are pursued, they are pursued in defiance of the wishes or authority of their superiors, and not as a school of thought within the Church, which may safely be looked upon with toleration, if not with indulgence. If such were the tone of our Bishops, the laity would willingly entrust them with some power, if necessary, for the protection of their families and congregations. Meanwhile, let them use the means of influence which they now possess, and which have been, in many cases, so far, very imperfectly employed, and let the Crown do its part by not placing in positions of influence those who cannot be entrusted with the faith and morals of the nation. Then might we hope that some check would be placed to the extension of these pernicious practices, dangerous as the Church of Rome acknowledged them to be, and therefore fenced round by her within her pale with many securities and precautions, but doubly dangerous within our own National Church, because such precautions were not possible, even if it were desirable to admit them.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK: My Lords, yielding to the fashion of the moment which seems to be that when anything goes wrong Archbishops must bear the blame, the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) has been very severe on the most Rev. Prelate for presuming to allude in this debate to the change in the Ecclesiastical Courts. The noble Marquess forgets that he was the first offender in this respect, when, the other night, in the midst of another subject, he suddenly told us with unconcealed glee that a change in the Ecclesiastical Courts had just been adopted in "another place." I am not going to follow that example—to discuss a subject with which at present we have nothing to do. The noble Marquess is very zealous that questions of pure law should be decided by lawyers. Questions of ritual observance, of inspiration, of the real Presence in the Sacrament, may be questions of pure law, and only to be understood by lawyers. But the people of this country understand the matter much better than the noble Marquess supposes. They will not be led away by his epigrammatic sentences. They are aware that the change in this Court has not been striven for merely to vindicate the rights of lawyers over questions of pure law. And now, turning to the subject before your Lordships, I will ask you to remember that it is not a difficulty of yesterday's growth. On the 1st of April, 1851, Sir George Grey sent to the Archbishop of Canterbury, by command of the Queen, an Address signed by nearly 250,000 churchmen, against changes and innovations in divine worship, with a letter recommending the Archbishop to take measures for giving effect to the prayer of the Memorial. Twenty-two years have elapsed—a whole generation of the clergy. And now the noble Lord brings before this House exactly the same complaint, but against a different generation of men. It is all very well to charge the Bishops with this condition of things; but if we look a little deeper we see that no amount of supineness on the part of the Bishops would account for the fact that in the face of a fear existing a generation ago, patrons of benefices and dignities have placed in those positions the men of whose extreme opinions and irregular acts the noble Lord is now complaining. The Bishops are not the patrons who have done this. In 1851, the attitude of the Crown was adverse to such practices. It is now alleged by the most rev. Prelate that at Oxford and in the Cathedral church of this diocese irregularities take place; but the places to which this applies are all in the patronage of the Crown. If the laity are in earnest as to the repression of unauthorized alterations in our ritual, the remedy is in their own hands, so far as they are patrons, or can bring any influence to bear upon patrons. But the truth is that by the action of patrons, whose power is very great, the evil not only remains but has increased. It seems to follow that the laity are not at one, or are not in earnest, in the demand which the noble Lord presses on us to-night. It could be no real cure for the evil that the Bishops should be obliged continually to resist at law the action of lay patrons. Nor does the noble Lord seem to recommend this. Indeed, the remedies that are actually suggested are either inadequate or futile. We are called on to express our opinions of these things. We have done it over and over again. We are asked to refuse to licence curates, over whom we have greater control. But is that a satisfactory position for the Bishops? That being unable at present to resist what is unlawful when done by incumbents, they are to punish it in the persons of the more defenceless curates? In short, the present condition of opinion has deeper roots than would be supposed from this debate; and the cure for it—if cure is to be found—is to be looked for not from the Archbishops alone, not from the Bishops alone, not from any one class, but from the formation of truer and sounder opinion in the whole body of the Church. I do not despair of that change. In the mean time it is better that we should recognize the true extent of the difficulty, and should admit that without the co-operation of all classes the state of the ecclesiastical law is such that it would be impossible for the Bishops to accomplish what the noble Lord expects of them. The true remedy, it must be repeated, is that we should all endeavour to assist the formation of truer and sounder opinions in every class in the Church.

VISCOUNT MIDDLETON said, that the petition on this subject which had been presented, by a number of petitioners unexpectedly large to Convocation had been received by that body in a paltry and trifling spirit, unworthy of its importance; and the subsequent remonstrance addressed to the most rev. Prelates had drawn forth the replies now before the House. It was no part of the duty, neither was it in the power of laymen, to repress the tendencies towards the confessional. No churchwarden, even though he should discharge his duties with the utmost efficiency could have the slightest effect upon the subject. The Bishops had the power and he should be prepared to increase that power, if necessary, to take certain steps to repress the practices in question. They had power to inhibit the curates who had signed the memorial from preaching, and in the case of incumbents they had power to inhibit them from preaching in any other diocese than their own, even if they could not prevent them from preaching in their own parishes. He was not, however, urging the adoption of extreme measures. He had much more confidence in the power of moral suasion than in any legislative enactment. He doubted whether to refer the question to a Committee was, on the whole, advisable—it was, at the same time, in his opinion, absolutely certain that the Episcopal Bench should give no uncertain sound, but that they should speak out frankly and fully the views which they entertained on the subject. Had they done so 15 years ago he believed the matter would not have been heard of now, and he trusted they would not now hesitate to exert their great influence not only in public but in private wherever it could be brought to bear. Otherwise, the very vitals of the Church would be torn. He was not speaking on the present occasion of the merits or demerits of the confessional. He relied on the broad ground that it was entirely uncongenial and repulsive to the feelings of the people of England, and that unless the recognized organs of the Church discouraged its use a large number of those who were now attached and devoted members of the Church would drift away to some other Communion—a result which he should most earnestly deprecate. He hoped the Bishops would use whatever means they possessed short of legal measures to discourage the practice, which he knew from personal observation had grown up in many congregations, of inflicting upon the young the practice of confession as a condition precedent to confirmation. He could say from two instances which came within his own knowledge within the last few weeks, that the country was in the presence of a real and serious evil, and he trusted the evil was one which the right rev. Bench would do everything in its power to remove.

On Question, Resolved in the Negative.

PERSIAN GOVERNMENT—CONCESSION TO BARON DE REUTER.

ADDRESS FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON in calling attention to the concession recently made by the Persian Government to Baron de Reuter, and to move for Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and Baron de Reuter on the subject, said, their Lordships must have been startled by the intelligence on the subject which appeared in the newspapers a short time ago. The concession appeared to him one of the most remarkable things that had occurred in the history of the world. He had not seen the text, but he found a summary of the document in The Times newspaper, which he took for granted was substantially correct. It appeared—he should refer only to the main points of the concession—that the Persian Government had authorized Baron de Reuter to establish a company for the purpose of giving effect to certain privileges which it proposed to confer upon him. It gave him further power to construct a railway between the Caspian Sea and the Persian Gulf, and in all other parts of Persia. It proceeded to guarantee to the new company any lands or buildings which might be necessary to carry out the object for which it was to be established. It exempted from all duties, tolls, customs, or excise, the materials employed in the work. It granted—with these exceptions, mines of gold, silver, and precious stones—the right of working any mines situated not only on lands belonging to the Government, but on those of private individuals. It made over all the forests to Baron de Reuter, as well as the control over canals, wells, and all natural and artificial water-courses throughout the country. It, moreover, empowered him to raise a capital of not less than £6,000,000, and it guaranteed interest at the rate of 5 per cent on all the moneys raised by the company. It further handed over to Baron de Reuter the whole management of the Customs for a period not less than 25 years; and gave him preferential rights for the supply of gas, the making of roads, telegraphs, mills, forges, and so forth. The concession lastly provided that the rights thus conferred might not only be enjoyed by him, but that they might be transferred by him to others. The House would see, therefore, that in the whole history of dealings between States and individuals there had never been so extraordinary a series of privileges conferred on any person. The whole thing reminded one rather of passages in The Arabian Nights than of anything that had ever occurred in real life. It might be said that all these privileges might be found worthless, as it was in the power of an arbitrary Government like that of Persia to put a stop to them at any moment. But as a matter of fact, concessions granted by Oriental Powers to Europeans were generally carried out. In the present case, the concessions might turn out to be the source not only of great wealth but of Sovereignty and Empire. But the concession having been granted, the next question which arose was how it could be worked. He did not believe it to be possible for any single individual unsupported by some powerful Government sanction to give it practical effect. Now, there were in the East but two Governments who could give such support. The one was our own, the other was that of Russia. He had reason to believe that concession had been placed before Her Majesty's Government, and that an offer—so far as he might use the expression—had been made to them to impose whatever conditions they pleased on the practical working of the concession. He believed those proposals had come before Her Majesty's Government in more ways than one, and perhaps he should say through more than one channel. He would ask his noble Friend to explain to the House what the answer of the Government had been on the subject. Had that offer been accepted, or was it still pending, or had it been declined? Had the Government refused to have any connection with the scheme, because they felt that by doing so they would be placing themselves and this country under engagements of an embarrassing nature and under heavy pecuniary liability? If so, although he should like to hear what the grounds and reasons for their decisions were, yet he should be the last person to find severe fault with them. But, on the other hand, if Her Majesty's Government had declined because they were opposed to the fair exercise of our commercial influence on that country, if they were going out of their way to "find lions in the path" and throw obstacles in the way of a scheme which, after all, was mainly of a commercial character, then he thought they had done wrong. A statement had gone the round of the papers that our Foreign Secretary had written a despatch or note expressing the intention of the Government absolutely to take no concern whatever in anything which might arise out of that concession. He hoped that was not true. If it were, he should say it certainly was gratuitous, and more than a great mistake on the part of the Government to have volunteered, as it were, that abnegation of their national duties and obligations. He now only desired that the House should know the exact state of the case, that they should not on that most grave and important question awake, as they had done on some former occasions, to the consciousness and the regret that things might have been otherwise if they had been only known and discussed by Parliament in time. Supposing the Government had declined all connection and concern with that matter, he said nothing of the obvious and most striking contrast between such a line of conduct and the reception which a few days ago it had been thought worth while publicly and privately to give to the Shah. What he would rather point out was that the state of Persia materially and socially was at this moment very bad indeed. For many years past that country had been falling deeper and deeper into distress and dis-organization. The only chance that seemed to present itself to the more intelligent minds of Persia was the enlistment of English capital and enterprise in that country. To that he thought they might attribute this concession to Baron de Reuter. It had been the fashion to speak of it as a most senseless and irrational act; but if he was right in the light he had now ventured to throw upon it, their Lordships would see that a wise statesman in Persia, anxious for his country's welfare, might feel that in the enlistment of English capital and enterprise lay the greatest and perhaps the sole chance of her regeneration. To that fact, in a great measure, was due the recent visit of the Shah to England ; and he was afraid that those Persians who had come here had left us mortified to a certain extent by the feeling that that concession, which might have been worked by English companies and English capital, would in consequence of the course taken by the Government not be so worked. If that were so, and if the concession was not worked by English companies, the only alternative was, he feared, that they probably would be worked by companies of that nation who had the next greatest interest in that part of the world—namely, Russia ; and moreover, while the companies working it would be Russian, the capital would, no doubt, be found in the English market. He doubted whether that would be altogether a satisfactory state of things. Any man would be perfectly blind to the known history of the case, and almost senseless, if he did not see that it had been not only the irresistible tendency but the set policy and purpose for years and years past on the part of Russia to enlarge the area of her dominions in that part of the globe. Let them consider the marvellous system of railways gradually being laid out over the whole of the Russian Empire on the highest strategical principle, connecting St. Petersburg with the extreme East and South—let them remember the lines of military forts which connected one position with another, and how completely, in a great measure, the Black Sea, the Caspian, and the Sea of Aral were now connected for military purposes. Who, then, he asked, did not perceive the vast advantage which the Russian Government would obtain if that concession—which included a railway from the Caspian to the Persian Gulf—were carried out under Russian auspices ? From that moment there would be a direct line of railway and navigation exclusively in the hands of Russia from St. Petersburg to the Persian Gulf. Every Power must be the judge of its own responsibilities and its own strength. He was quite aware how great was the strength of our Indian Empire. He knew well the view which had obtained among many of the most able and competent authorities, that the defence of India against whatever enemy was to be found rather by concentrating our strength within ourselves than by travelling beyond our frontiers to meet danger. He knew that within the last few years that great Empire had grown, so to speak, far more compact and concentrated in itself, and that by our own system of railways our position on our frontiers had assumed a very different character from what it wore some 20 years ago. On the other hand, nothing that could affect the condition of neighbouring States could ever be indifferent to us ; and of all the neighbouring States around our Indian possessions, none could be held to be of greater importance to us than the kingdom of Persia. Her people were, probably, the most intelligent of Easterns, and she had a cohesion which was wanting in every other country in those regions. Her resources, however reduced, were still considerable. Moreover, Persia and the Porte were the only two Powers in the East which filled the Native mind, as it were, with the idea of Sovereignty. Persia lay as a wedge between Turkey and India, and the master of Persia would necessarily be in a great degree the arbiter of those two countries. Afghanistan had often been spoken of as vitally important to us, and Persia was no less so. We were bound in every act and word—words, perhaps, being as important as acts—not to hinder the extension of the commercial influence and enterprise of a country—still less so that of a country with vast resources, which, if brought to some degree of civilization, would be a blessing to its neighbours. A cautious and waiting policy had great recommendations ; but had England always been excessively cautious her history would have been very different. It was desirable not to endanger good relations with our great neighbour in the East, and it was to the interests of both that the frontiers of the two Powers should not be conterminous. He preferred, however, to rest the case on the possible development of Persian resources were such concessions taken up by an English company and fairly worked for the good of the country, and on the commercial influence which England might naturally claim, as it had done under similar circumstances. These were critical times in the East, deserving the attention of this country. The cancelling of the Treaty of Paris as regarded the Black Sea, the rumoured change in the relations between the Porte and Egypt, and the fall of Khiva, were events of more importance to the East than any that had happened within a century. We could not be indifferent spectators; and while he readily admitted that the wider range of our present Empire imposed more caution and prudential reserve than our forefathers knew or practised, nothing could free us from the responsibilities and traditions of our Eastern Empire.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copy of correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and Baron de Reuter on the subject of the concession recently made by the Persian Government to him.—(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, their Lordships and the country had reason to be satisfied with the skill the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs had shown in conducting the negotiations as to Central Asia, and believed the country would look to him more than to any other Member of the Government for a wise policy in all these matters. It would be wrong to neglect this opportunity of promoting the prosperity of Persia by means of railroads, and it would be a great national inconsistency whilst British merchants and the British Press in China were complaining of the Chinese Government and wishing for pressure to be put upon it, because it would not allow them to construct railways in China, for the British Government to refuse to assist the Persian Government to construct railways. It was true that railways would pay better in China because it was more populous, whilst Persia had just been devastated by famine; but Persia was a country which had had more ups and downs than any other, and a country in which periods of abasement had been rapidly succeeded by others of grandeur and prosperity. He understood Baron de Reuter to solicit the moral support of this country, and he would want men to carry out his plans. Now, this was a good opportunity of utilizing the services of the numerous officers, some of them Engineers, whom the amalgamation of the East India Company's with the Queen's Army had discontented by placing them in a position of pay without work. Not only the Mussulmans, but the Hindus would rejoice to see us helping Persia in this way, for the leading Hindu papers had recently complained of the supineness of the Government in not counteracting the Russian advance in the East. Of late years the Foreign Office had neglected Persia, and this might be the last opportunity of doing what ought to have been done many years ago. He trusted that the Government, if they had not already done so, would come to a decision in the interests of England, and that should anything in the form of guarantee have been rejected, some alternative measure which might answer Baron de Reuter's purpose as well would be adopted.

EARL GRANVILLE thanked the noble Lord (Lord Stanley of Alderley) for the compliment he had paid to himself, and, without offering an opinion on the practical character of his suggestion, felt bound to say that he had been more definite in his advice than the noble Earl who introduced the subject. The latter always gave a good deal of excellent advice as to "a spirited policy worthy of a great country"; but in this case he had failed to perceive the exact line which the noble Earl thought the Government should adopt. He had been surprised to hear the noble Earl express astonishment at the concession, for he believed it was the topic of all the papers during last autumn. He himself had more right to feel astounded when first informed by Baron de Reuter last September that he had received a concession giving large powers as to railways, irrigation, and other public works, and that it had not only been signed, but ratified by the Shah. Baron de Reuter asked him to recognize the validity of the concession and for a promise to protect his rights as a British subject in the performance of it. After due consideration of the subject and consultation with his Colleagues, the answer he gave the Baron was that it would give Her Majesty's Government great satisfaction to see the resources of Persia developed by means of railways and roads, but that it was altogether out of our usual course to protect officially a commercial undertaking of that sort. The noble Earl alluded to some information he had received in reference to this matter, and which very much resembled the contents of a letter which had been handed to him (Earl Granville) since he entered the House. Then the noble Earl stated that His Majesty the Shah, who had been so well received in this country, had gone away entertaining a feeling of great dissatisfaction towards Her Majesty's Government. All he could say was that he was not aware that His Majesty entertained any such feelings, and he should be very sorry to believe anything so contrary to the professions which up to the last moment had been made on his Majesty's behalf. Not only had he received the most cordial assurances to the opposite effect from the principal Ministers of the Shah, but, he might also say, from his Majesty himself, and he might add that he had very recently received similar assurances from Paris. On the subject of the concession, he held the same language—entirely in conformity with the views of his Colleagues—to all who had spoken to him in reference to it. To the Persian Envoy and to Baron de Reuter, what he said was this—that Her Majesty's Government entertained the strongest wish for the prosperity of Persia, and believed that that prosperity would be developed by material improvement in the means of communication; that an arrangement might, perhaps, be arrived at such as was contemplated, which would be mutually beneficial to Persia on the one hand and to the capitalists concerned on the other; but that it was impossible that Her Majesty's Government could give to either the one party or the other any advice with reference to the terms of such a commercial agreement. They could not give it material support; and with regard to moral support, of which he had heard so much, he confessed he had never been able to find out what was meant by those who used the term. It would, of course, be enormous moral support to the capitalists if Her Majesty's Government were to tell them they would hold the Shah bound by every word of the concession. On the other hand, it would be great moral support to the Shah if they assured His Majesty that the capitalists would execute the works in question in the best and cheapest manner. But when he asked what was meant by the term, "moral support," he could never get a definition of what that support was to be. With respect to the Motion, he had no objection to produce the Correspondence which had taken place between Baron de Reuter and Her Majesty's Government. In conclusion, he had only to say that he was not aware of having ever given the slightest opposition to the scheme referred to; nor had he observed the "lions in the path" which the noble Earl said it was his custom to see. Some caution was, however, he thought, due to the Persian Government and to capitalists at home, and therefore it was that he had made the communication in reference to the views of Her Majesty's Government which he had stated to their Lordships.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, he had not one word to say against the legitimate development of railways and other public works in Persia; but at the same time he believed that the selfish interests of England would be best served if the railways in question and the other public works the subject of the concession were not made. They ought not, however, to arrest the progress of material improvement on account of their supposed self-interest—to do so would be wholly unworthy of this great country, and he believed that the magnanimity and generosity of this country would never allow such a course to be taken. His opinion, however, was that when the railways in question were constructed the stream of British commerce would probably be diverted from the Black Sea and from Turkish territory, where no transit dues were paid, to Russian territory, where dues, the amount of which they could not now foresee, would be charged. He could not see that, in a political point of view, or, in the first instance, in a commercial point of view, England would be at all benefited by the establishment of those railways and other public works; but he could not help thinking that it would be an unworthy policy on the part of this country to oppose them. He desired it to be understood that in any observation he made he was not actuated by any feeling of jealousy towards Russia. From her history, her interests, and her geographical position, it was impossible but that Russia should exercise a considerable influence in Persia, and he was far from saying that that influence had up to the present been exercised in an unworthy manner. On the contrary, he was free to admit that the operations of the Russian troops in the Khanate, which had resulted in the fall of Khiva, had conferred a great benefit upon Persia by protecting her borders from invasion by barbarous hordes. It was not, therefore, jealousy of Russia which made him say it was for the interest of England that Persia should be strong, independent, and self-governed. That was a well-recognized fact. How did the concession in question consist with the interests of Persia in that point of view? The circumstance should not be lost sight of that the great concession in question contained no reservation whatsoever as to transfer. Baron de Reuter could at any moment transfer the concession and all the rights derived under it to any Company or to any Government he pleased. He had the honour of knowing the Baron, and entertained a sincere esteem for his character. As a great financier and speculator, he had, of course, his own interests to serve, but, he believed Baron de Reuter was not exclusively nor even chiefly, influenced by pecuniary considerations. There was something of an aspiring character in the man; and he believed that in obtaining those concessions he was prompted by a desire to do something useful—something which would reflect glory upon himself and would do good to others. But what security had they that the concessions would be administered by him? He might die; the concessions might—as he said—be transferred to a foreign association or to a foreign Government. What position, he asked, would this country be in if the immense power were placed in the hands of Russia? Again, there was no condition laid down as to the gauge of the railways or their direction—both very important considerations in a military point of view. It was important for the commercial interests of Persia that her rulers should be able to exercise some option upon these and other matters; and it would be unsatisfactory to Great Britain if the railways in the south of Persia, which were of importance to us as regarded India, should be indefinitely postponed, while the railways in the north of Persia, which were of importance to Russia, should be immediately executed. He did not say there was any danger of such an occurrence while

Baron de Reuter retained the concession; but such a danger might arise if these powers fell into other hands. A word or two now as to the economical aspect of this question. Persia had granted to Baron de Reuter all the forests. Now, if there was a country in the world in which we should expect the Government to prescribe care and economy in the management of the forests it was Persia. In the north of Persia there were forests of great extent and value, and these were useful in developing the resources of the country, besides being of value in their influence upon climate. But under the concession those forests might be entirely destroyed. Again, in no country in the world was irrigation more important than in Persia, and you would naturally expect the Government to retain some control over the management of works of irrigation. Not only, however, was absolute authority given to Baron de Reuter in reference to irrigation, but the irrigated soil was to pass into the possession of the concessionaires, who might there establish colonies of any nationality. The establishment of agricultural colonies composed of foreigners upon the soil of an Eastern country was likely to create serious complication and to bring the colony into collision with the Government. He only mentioned these facts to show that concessions of a very large and, indeed, unprecedented nature had been made, which hereafter might prove embarrassing or even dangerous, and that the Persian Government in its anxiety to promote the material welfare of the country had not surrounded these concessions with the guarantees and the precautions which a Government was bound to provide for its own dignity and for the welfare of the people. It was very strange that in this matter the Persian Government should not have consulted the Governments of England and Russia. Both these Governments were seriously interested in all that concerned Persia, and if the Government of Teheran had submitted the proposed concessions to the judgment of their allies, precautions would probably have been suggested which might have been safely adopted without the loss of any—at all events without the loss of many—of the material benefits which were expected. But by what might be called a generous imprudence, without regard to political consideration, or the advice of their natural allies, the Government of Persia had put themselves, this country, and Baron de Reuter in a very difficult and embarrassing position. He hoped that at some later period, when these concessions were transferred to some company, they might be so modified as to render them more consistent with the independence of Persia and with the good relations which ought to exist between that country and the Governments of Russia and England.

Motion agreed to.

STEAM THRESHING MACHINES BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to provide for fencing the drums of steam threshing machines—Was presented by The Earl of MORLEY; read 1st. (No. 210.)

House adjourned at a quarter past Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, Eleven o'clock.

—
HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 14th July, 1873.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Penalties (Ireland)* [239]; Public Health Act (1872) Amendment* [238]. Second Reading—Exchequer Bonds (£1,600,000)* [230]; Treasury Chest Fund* [233]. Committee—Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland) [Salaries] [187]. [No Report.] Committee—Report—Supreme Court of Judicature [154-237]; Turnpike Acts Continuance, &c. [199] Medical Act Amendment (University of London)* [224]; Intestates Widows and Children (re-comm.)* [214]. Considered as amended—Military Manoeuvres* [215]; Salmon Fisheries [93].

PARLIAMENT—RULES AND ORDERS OF THE HOUSE AS TO STRANGERS—REPORTS OF THE DEBATES.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON gave Notice that he would move on to-morrow week that "Strangers" should not be required to withdraw unless upon Motion made and agreed to without debate.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY gave Notice that early next Session he would call the attention of the House to the reports of debates in this House—["Oh!"]—and move for a Select Committee to consider the question of reporting the proceedings of the House, with a view to ascertain whether any improvements could be introduced and changes advantageously made with respect to the present privilege of admission to the Reporters' Gallery. ["Oh, oh!"]

CRIMINAL LAW—THE INTERNATIONAL COCK-FIGHT.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the fact, as stated in the "Manchester Courier" of July 1st, that in the case of the International Cock-fight at Weaverham the bench decided that the names of the persons taken down by the police as present should not be made public; whether it is true, as stated in the same paper, that twenty-six summonses against persons described as being "gentlemen of influence and position in the county," have been withdrawn; and, whether the Government have taken any steps to bring these so-styled influential persons to justice?

MR. BRUCE: Sir, the report referred to by my hon. Friend is inaccurate in all essential particulars. The prosecution was instituted at the instance of the Chief Constable of the Cheshire police, who instructed a solicitor of great experience to conduct the proceedings. The summonses were issued on the 24th May against all persons who had been identified by the police as having been present on the occasion. It appeared, however, that only three summonses had been served by the 4th of June, when the Petty Sessions were held; and on that day the solicitor recommended, for the purpose of better securing the conviction of all concerned, that these summonses should be withdrawn, and that a fresh summons should be issued against one of the defendants who appeared to be the principal, inasmuch as he was the owner of the premises in which the cock-fight took place. On his conviction, they could better proceed against the other persons as aiders and abettors. The Chief Constable acted upon that advice, and summonses were accordingly issued against him for the next Petty Sessions, which sat on the 30th June, and he was then tried and convicted in the heaviest penalty authorized by the Act. Summonses were then taken out against all the persons known by the police to have been present, as aiders and abettors, and their cases will be investigated at the next Petty Sessions which will be held upon the 28th of this month. It was with the full consent of the solicitor conducting the prosecution that the names of these persons were withheld ; he considered not only that the publication of the names was altogether unnecessary to the prosecution he was then conducting against the principal, but that silence on the subject would be serviceable to the interest of the prosecution itself.

LAW AND JUSTICE—FOUR COURTS MARSHALSEA, DUBLIN.—QUESTION.

MR. BRUEN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether any steps have been taken to close the Four Courts Marshalsea, Dublin ; if not, whether it is the intention of Government to take such steps ; and, whether any, and, if any, what opinion has been elicited from the Inspectors of Prisons, Ireland, as to the expediency of closing the prison ?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON in reply, said, that the Inspector of Prisons had recently called the attention of the Irish Government to the very small and diminishing number of persons in that prison, and to the very large prison staff in proportion to the number of prisoners. A scheme would be submitted for the closing of the prison ; and although he was very doubtful whether at that period of the Session a Bill for the purpose could be passed, he would ask to be permitted to present the details of the scheme. He would very shortly state whether the Government could do anything that Session ; but, in his opinion, it would certainly be desirable that next Session something should be done.

GENERAL REGISTER AND RECORD OFFICE OF SHIPPING AND SEAMEN—THIRD CLASS CLERKS.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, If the annual leave of a portion of the third class of established clerks in the General Register and Record Office of Shipping and Seamen has been reduced from thirty-six to twenty-four days ; and, if so, whether the Registrar General of Shipping and Seamen did not endeavour by threat of dismissal to prevent the said clerks from memorialising the President of the Board of Trade against the reduction of their leave ?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE : Sir, I might reply that it was true that no clerks have had their leave reduced, and that there have been no threats of dismissal ; but I will reply more fully. The clerks referred to by the noble Lord were temporary clerks on weekly wages without fixity of tenure ; they had no claim to increased pay on the ground of seniority or length of service ; they were not entitled to superannuation or to any compensation on leaving or on being discharged with a week's notice from their office. On the occasion of the office being recently re-organized to meet the new state of things in the Civil Service, these temporary clerks were placed on the establishment, as an act of grace, on the recommendation of the Registrar General, who took unusual trouble in looking after the interests of the temporary clerks, and it is to him they are solely indebted for having their services retained and for being placed on the permanent establishment. As temporary clerks they were allowed three weeks' leave of absence during the year ; they are now allowed four weeks in common with all clerks appointed to the Board of Trade and its subordinate departments, under Scheme II. of the Order in Council of June, 1870. The Registrar General did not endeavour by threat of dismissal to prevent the clerks from memorializing me against the reduction of their leave. What he did do was to forcibly point out the impropriety of their protesting against a formal official Minute, issued by the Board of Trade for regulating the leave of clerks, and requesting that such a Minute should be rescinded to meet their views. The action taken by the Registrar General throughout this case has entirely met with my approval, and I have informed the clerks in question, that if they are dissatisfied with the arrangements made they had better at once resign their appointments.

Mr. Bruce

LICENSING ACT, 1872—WINE LICENCES TO GROCERS.—QUESTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that the Inland Revenue Commissioners have permitted their officers to grant licences for the sale of wines to grocers and other applicants without their having previously obtained the certificates of the justices duly granted and confirmed at the annual Licensing Sessions, according to the provisions of the Licensing

Act of 1872; and if the sale of intoxicating liquors, under such circumstances, will have the immediate attention of the Home Department as an infringement of the Act of last Session?

MR. BRUCE: Sir, the Licensing Bill of last year as introduced by the Government, and as it passed the House of Lords, left the position of grocers and retail wine-sellers unaltered. At that time they required no magistrate's certificate to enable them to hold a licence. An Amendment, however, was carried in this House, which prohibited the Inland Revenue Commissioners from granting licences to those dealers, unless on production of a magistrate's certificate. It thus happened that many of those dealers were not aware of the change made in their position, and neglected to apply for certificates at the last Brewster Sessions. They applied for relief to the Inland Revenue Commissioners, who were, of course, unable to grant licences, but forwarded their case for the consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. My right hon. Friend took, as he well might, a compassionate view of the matter, and made them the following answer:—

"In any case where a dealer in British wine omitted to obtain a certificate in September last in accordance with the provisions of the new Act, on his producing a letter from the licensing magistrates, to the effect that a licence would have been granted had application been made, and that such an application will be favourably entertained at the next licensing sessions, the Board of Inland Revenue will allow him to deposit the duty with the collector, and will thereupon instruct their officers not to interfere with the sale ad interim."

I am unable to say whether any magistrates have signed the required assurance. But whether they have or not, I have no reason to believe that the Inland Revenue Commissioners have issued any licences.

CUSTOMS OUT-PORT CLERKS. QUESTION.

VISCOUNT SANDON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will reconsider the claims of the Custom House Clerks at the Out-ports to be placed on the same footing as the Custom House Clerks in London as to the date of the increase of their salaries, promised by the Treasury Minute of the 28th of November, 1868?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER in reply, said, that when the present Government came into office they found a Minute in the Treasury, which conferred certain benefits on the Custom House clerks in London. The Government were of opinion that the matter required their looking into, and they suspended that Minute, thus depriving for a time the clerks of the benefit which the late Government conferred upon them. In doing so, however, the Government gave a promise that the clerks should not be losers in the end. After full consideration, the Government came to the conclusion that more might be done than was recommended in the Minute of the late Government, and more was done; and, in accordance with the promise, they were paid by reference back to the time when the Minute was first suspended. It was a clear case of vested interests and promised advantages which the Government were bound to respect, and now the noble Lord asked him to do the same for the Out-port clerks. There was a recommendation, no doubt, that their case should be looked into, and, having looked into it, the Government had come to the conclusion that certain improvements in their position and salaries might be effected, and they had been effected accordingly. But there was no claim for what was now asked. They had no vested interest at all at the time when the Government came into office, and if they were now to pay these persons upon the same footing as those who had actually received the benefit before the Government came into office, the effect would be to establish a precedent of this nature—that whenever any improvement in an office took place, the Government would be bound to pay the persons from the time when they first conceived the idea of making that improvement. He could not agree to any such principle.

ARMY — GLANDERS AT LEEDS BAR-RACKS — THE 12TH LANCERS. QUESTIONS.

COLONEL BARTTELOT asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance (in the absence of the Secretary of State for War,) Whether glanders has broken out amongst the horses of the 12 Lancers at Leeds Barracks; whether five or more horses have been shot for that disease; and, if this is the case, whether it is still intended to send the regiment to Cannock Chase for the Autumn Manœuvres?

COLONEL LEIGH (for Sir THOMAS BATESON) asked the Secretary of State for War, How many Commanding Officers of the six Cavalry Regiments attached respectively to the Northern and Southern Armies at the last Autumn Manœuvres reported horse blankets to be unnecessary; whether the 12th Lancers was not the only regiment which was unprovided with blankets last year; whether it is not admitted by experienced Veterinary Surgeons that glanders, of which abscess in the lungs is one of the chief characteristics, is frequently produced by exposure to damp and cold after fatigue; and, whether he will reconsider his decision not to supply blankets or other protection against the weather to the Cavalry horses at a period of the year when many of them are changing their coats, and consequently more liable to cold and disease?

SIR HENRY STORKS: Sir, the officer commanding the 12th Lancers reported to the Adjutant General on the 19th of June that five horses had been destroyed for glanders. A letter received from that officer on the 8th instant, shows that no further symptoms of the disease have appeared. Under these circumstances, there is no intention at present of withdrawing them from the list of regiments for the Autumn Manœuvres. In reply to the Question of the hon. and gallant Colonel the Member for Mid Cheshire (Colonel Leigh), I have to state that the commanding officers in question did not report officially one way or the other whether horse-blankets were considered necessary, nor were they asked to do so. The opinion of cavalry officers has, however, been obtained, and the result shows, as stated in the answer which I gave to the hon. and gallant Gentleman on the 30th ultimo, that they are in favour of the non-issue of these articles, as in consequence the extra kit which was carried in the valise last year on the horse will now be carried in the waggons, the dragoon carrying a very light kit on his horse's back. The 12th Lancers was the only regiment which did not use horse-blankets last year, and their horses looked quite as well as the rest of the cavalry. The Manœuvres, too, are held earlier this year, which makes a difference in the weather likely to be met with. No report that I am aware of has been received from experienced veterinary surgeons that the non-issue of horse-blankets is calculated to produce glanders, and the principal veterinary surgeon, on the contrary, has concurred in this non-issue. It has consequently been held unnecessary to alter the decision which has been arrived at.

THE WELLINGTON MONUMENT. QUESTION.

MR. GOLDSMITH asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether any Report has recently been received on the condition of the Wellington Monument; and, whether he has made any, and, if any, what arrangements with Mr. Collman for its completion?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the last Report he had received was dated the 7th of June. Mr. Stevens was then convalescent and again at work on the monument. The whole marble work was now finished, but the sculpture had not made much progress. It was hoped the monument would be finished by the end of 1874. No other arrangements had been made with Mr. Collman for its completion.

RIVERS POLLUTION—THE RIVER RIBBLE.—QUESTION.

MR. F. STANLEY asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been drawn to an extraordinary destruction of fish in the River Ribble on or about the 3rd instant, which is stated to have resulted from the pollution of the river; and, whether he is prepared to take any steps to prevent a recurrence of such damage from pollution of waters?

MR. STANFIELD, in reply, said, the Papers he had received had not been sufficiently explicit or exhaustive to enable him to give an opinion on the subject; but, so far as he understood them, he was not aware that the existing law supplied a remedy, and it must remain a matter for further legislation.

AFRICA—THE WEST COAST SETTLEMENTS—THE ASHANTEE INVASION. QUESTIONS.

MR. MACFIE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he has any later information to communicate with respect to the disturbances at and near Cape Coast Castle; and, if the Government intend to add any to the precautionary and peace-restoring measures which lately were thought to be adequate?

Colonel Barttelot

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY also asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, What has been the loss in material of war sent out to Cape Coast Castle by the wreck of the "Nigritia" and of the "Yoruba;" what is the latest news as to the advance of the Ashantees on the town and fort of Elmina, and as to the position of our allies the Fantees; and, what preparation has been made to remedy the losses which have been sustained?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: It may be, Sir, for the convenience of the House, that I should at the same time answer the Question of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Charles Adderley) with reference to the loss in material of war by the wrecks of the Nigritia and the Yoruba. I have very little to communicate beyond the news which has appeared in the morning newspapers. The Ashantees have received a severe check at Elmina, and when the mail left, their army was concentrated about midway between that town and Cape Coast, at a place called Effootoo. The military and naval forces, under the command of Colonel Festing and Captain Fremantle, and the Houssas under Mr. Loggie had behaved admirably, inflicting a considerable loss upon the enemy, while the casualties on our side were very slight. The despatches just received, giving an account of the engagement, will be immediately published in The Gazette. I may take the opportunity of stating with regard to the previous West Coast Papers which my noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) promised for this week, that being very voluminous, it has been thought best to divide them in order to facilitate their delivery, and that the first part will be distributed, I hope, to-morrow, and the rest before the end of the week. I hardly understand the second part of the Question of the hon. Member for Leith as to "precautionary and peace-restoring measures." At the present moment our first duty is to repel the Ashantee aggression, for which purpose every necessary measure will be taken. They have already had a severe and salutary lesson, and we have every confidence in our officers and men, as well as in the Administrator, Colonel Harley. With regard to the first part of the Question of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, I am happy to inform him that, as far as can be ascertained, no military stores were lost in the wrecks of the Nigritia and Yoruba, with the exception of some boots and clothing, though it may be possible that some stores were re-shipped from Sierra Leone. But by reports received from the Coast, ample supplies of military stores have arrived at the Coast, having gone out by previous vessels. Colonel Harley writes in good spirits, and speaks of having plenty of munitions of war; but, in addition, further stores, with large supplies of provisions, will be immediately sent in the Simoom. With regard to the latter part, the details of the engagement will appear in the despatches about to be published in The Gazette. A portion of the town of Elmina called the "King's Quarter," separated from the other part of the town by the river, had shown itself disloyal, and the Ashantees had been supplied with arms and provisions by the inhabitants. The latter were desired to give up their arms. That they did not do, and numbers of them were joining the Ashantees. After full and extended notice, that portion of the town was very properly destroyed. It would have been impossible to have allowed it to remain and be occupied by an enemy, as it was built close up to the walls of the castle.

PATENT LAWS—INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE, VIENNA.—QUESTION.

MR. MACFIE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he has any information regarding the intended conference on Patents for Inventions at Vienna, which he will now state or will lay upon the Table; and, if Government will anywise be represented there provided the principle or policy of Patents is not assumed to be acquiesced in by persons participating in the deliberations?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD, in reply, said, Her Majesty's Government had heard nothing of any proposed conference on Patents at Vienna since April last, when the United States Minister wrote unofficially to Her Majesty's Ambassador, saying that a conference among the Exhibition Commissioners on the subject had been mooted. It did not appear that that was to be a conference of an official or international character; and the Austro-Hungarian Government did not ask for any suggestions upon the subject, or invite representatives from other Powers to attend; and Her Majesty's Government did not know whether the project was going to be carried out or not.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT—ANNUITIES TO CERTIFIED TEACHERS.—QUESTION.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the Vice President of the Council on Education, If the Council has come to any definite conclusion as to whether or not any provision shall in future be made for granting annuities upon their retirement from old age and infirmity to those certificated teachers whose certificates date prior to 1860?

MR. W. E. FORSTER in reply, said, that was a departmental question, but one that would have to be decided ultimately by the Treasury. With regard to the matter itself, he might state that there was a Committee which sat last year on the subject of pensions to teachers, which was presided over by his hon. Friend the Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell). The Report of that Committee stated that many teachers regarded the Minutes as a promise of pensions to teachers; but, after the fullest consideration of the subject, the Committee were of opinion that the Minutes were not entitled to hold out any such promise. That was the construction put on them in the Minute of the 6th of August, 1871, and in that opinion his noble Friend (the Marquess of Ripon) concurred with him.

ARMY—AUTUMN MANOEUVRES—EXTRA ALLOWANCE TO VOLUNTEERS.
QUESTION.

SIR THOMAS BATESON (for Mr. MORRISON) asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, Whether, having regard to the great expenses incurred by Volunteers attending the Autumn Manœuvres, the War Office will consent to lend to Volunteers present at them, mess tins, haversacks, and canvas bags, to be either returned undamaged, or on the understanding that all damage, fair wear and tear excepted, shall be paid for by the several Volunteer Corps, in place of compelling them to purchase the articles for use during the short period during which the Volunteers can spare time to attend?

SIR HENRY STORKS: I am afraid, Sir, the War Department cannot undertake to issue these articles on loan to Volunteers when attending Autumn Manœuvres. The fair wear and tear consequent on their issue would be such that they could not be re-issued to the troops. An allowance of 1*l*. for each Volunteer of whatever rank who attends for eight days, and of £1 for such as attend 15 days, is made to cover any small expenses of this nature.

GUN FACTORY, WOOLWICH—PEN-SIONS TO WIDOWS OF ARTIFICERS.
QUESTIONS.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is true that Mary Wilson, who was left with six children unprovided for by the death of her husband when in discharge of his duty at the Gun Factory at Woolwich in October 1871, was recommended for a pension by the authorities at Woolwich and by the War Office, and that the Treasury rejected the application; and, whether this is in accordance with the practice formerly adopted?

MR. BAXTER: Sir, Robert Wilson was a non-established labourer in the Royal Gun Factories, who died from injuries received in the execution of his duty on the 5th of October, 1871, after nine months' service. He was not entitled to superannuation. On the 2nd of November, 1871, the Treasury awarded a compassionate gratuity of £20 to his widow, Mary Ann Wilson. That award was in accordance with the usual practice of the Treasury, in cases where the deceased was a non-established labourer not entitled to superannuation. If Robert Wilson had been an established labourer, an annual pension would have been granted to the widow.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: Was it not recommended by the Woolwich authorities and by the War Office that a pension should be granted?

MR. BAXTER: It was.

REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE—WEEKLY RETURNS.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Secretary of the Treasury to inform the House, Whether the weekly returns of Revenue Expenditure and Exchequer Balances will in future be published regularly every week without omission or delay, and on what day of the week these returns will appear; and whether the weekly returns that have not been published during this financial year will be made public; to explain whether the total estimated liabilities of this financial year, as shown in the weekly returns for "Supply Services," comprise amounts for this financial year under the same heads as in last year's "Supply Services," and if any new head has been inserted, then what is that head and what amount is so added; and, whether the total payments shown in the weekly returns to have been already incurred for Supply Services include only payments for these services under the same heads as in last year's payments for Supply Services, or if payments have been made for any new head then what is the head and the amount?

MR. BAXTER: Sir, it has been the practice hitherto, and there is no intention of departing from it, to publish the Returns of Revenue, Expenditure, and Exchequer Balances every Tuesday, made up to the Saturday preceding, unless in instances occurring at the commencement of a quarter, when such Returns would be calculated to mislead. The heads of the ordinary Supply Services are always the same; but almost every year there are extraordinary services which of course vary—such, for example, as China Wars, New Zealand Wars, Abolition of Purchase in the Army, and the Commutation of the Sound Dues. There is an item this year among both the estimated liabilities of the payments for the Alabama Indemnity which had no place in last year's accounts, and which, no doubt, is pointed at in the last two Questions of my hon. and gallant Friend.

SCOTLAND—NORTHERN LIGHTS COMMISSIONERS—THE TAY LIGHTS.

QUESTION.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the Board of Trade has suggested to the Seamen Fraternity of Dundee the desirability of altering the position of the so called leading lights at the entrance of the Tay, which masters of vessels allege are calculated to mislead vessels entering the river; and, if so, whether the Seamen Fraternity have expressed their intention of altering the position of these lights, so as to indicate the proper channel; whether the Board of Trade approves of the policy of entrusting to self elective irresponsible bodies the lighting of important channels of public navigation, and what were the reasons which induced the Board of Trade to renew, on its expiring recently, the charter of the Seamen Fraternity of Dundee, continuing to that body the highly responsible duty of lighting the Tay, and of levying dues therefor; and whether the Board of Trade intends to again renew the charter, when it expires again in March 1875, so far as regards the lighting of the Tay and the levying of dues?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: Sir, although they have made the suggestion the Board of Trade have no power to compel any alteration. The Seamen Fraternity of Dundee are, by Royal Charter, charged with the duty of lighting and buoying the river Tay; and are, by the same Charter empowered to levy certain dues therefor. The Charter is still existing; but if it had expired, the Board of Trade have, of course, no power to renew a Royal Charter. What they have done is as follows:—They have, under the direction of an Act of Parliament, which practically gives them no discretion in the matter (Harbours and Passing Tolls, &c., Act 1861), and with the advice of the Law Officers in Scotland, sanctioned the continuance of the payment by the Seamen Fraternity, for a limited period, of sundry charitable pensions to certain named persons who were proved to have a vested interest in them. As to the question of policy, there can be no doubt that the duty of lighting an important port would not at the present day be intrusted to a self-elected body, but to one representing the commercial interests of the port, and the persons who pay the dues. I presume it would be for the Harbour Commissioners or people of Dundee, if they should desire a change, to apply to Parliament for the purpose.

ARMY—THE LATE CAPTAIN CHARLES AGNEW—COMPENSATION FOR COMMISSION.—QUESTIONS.

MR. HENRY SAMUELSON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, when he refused to grant a sum of money to the representatives of the late Captain Charles Agnew, 16th Lancers, who was murdered at Suez in March last on his way home from India invalided, he was aware that, although no application for leave to retire from Her Majesty's service had been actually made, it was well known to the relatives of the deceased Officer and to others that it was his intention to make such an application; and, if he is not aware of that fact, whether he is willing to receive proof of it, and upon receipt of proof, to reconsider the circumstances of the case, with the view of granting to Captain Agnew's relatives, if possible, the amount, or part of the amount, which would have become his by right, had not his death by assassination prevented him from carrying out his intention to retire from the service, receiving the value of his commission?

MR. CARDWELL: I think, Sir, the Question has been framed under a mis-understanding of the extent of my powers and the scope of my duties. Parliament has confided to the Army Purchase Commissioners the duty of indemnifying officers in respect of the commissions they held on the day on which purchase ceased. I apprehend that the commission of Captain Agnew could not have been sold under the purchase system, and, therefore, that the Purchase Commissioners are not empowered to purchase it. It never was the custom, while purchase continued, to move estimates for cases of the kind, and I cannot undertake to create such a precedent in the present instance.

MR. HENRY SAMUELSON: Is there any fund out of which compensation could be made?

MR. CARDWELL: I have no fund at my disposal for the purpose.

NAVY—CHATHAM DOCKYARD RAILWAYS.—QUESTION.

MR. HOLMS asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the connection between the Dockyard and Government established at Chatham with the Railway system of the Country has been completed; and, if not, when the completion of such works may be expected?

MR. GOSCHEN in reply, said, that the connection of the dockyard and Government establishment of Chatham with the railway system of the country was a matter which had been left by Act of Parliament to the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, who were about to enter into contracts for the necessary works, which would probably be completed within the financial year.

POST OFFICE—TELEGRAPHIC DEPARTMENT—DELIVERY OF TELEGRAMS.

QUESTION.

MR. CLARE READ asked a Question which he said he must explain, because, having been framed by a legal friend, it appeared on the Paper in a form in which he himself did not understand it. The explanation, in substance, is that no charge is made for a messenger walking any distance under a mile; but, if the mile be exceeded, the distance charged for is not the distance over the mile, but the distance from the office; so that no allowance is made for that portion of the distance which is within the radius of free delivery?

MR. MUNSELL, in reply, said, it had been the practice to charge from the office from which the telegram was sent out. He concurred with his hon. Friend in doubting the legality of the practice; he had directed a legal opinion to be taken upon it; and, if it proved to be illegal, he would have the practice altered.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT, 1871— UNSEAWORTHY VESSELS.

QUESTIONS.

MR. CARTER asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to a Report made by Mr. W. H. Neath, Principal Surveyor of the Board of Trade for South Wales, on the condition of the ship "Nora," which left Cardiff a few days ago for Lisbon "loaded" as the Surveyor remarks, "almost to her hatches," and in such a rotten condition that she has been declared to be unseaworthy; if the Board of Trade have power under the Merchant Shipping Act of 1871 to prevent ships proceeding to sea in the state the "Nora" is reported to have been in; and, if power to stop ships in this condition is not given by the Act of 1871, he intends to ask Parliament for such power during the present Session?

Mr. Henry Samuelson

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE in reply, said, that his attention had been called to the case of the ship Nova, and what had happened was this—she had not proceeded to sea; on the contrary, the principal Surveyor of the Board of Trade for South Wales had made a formal complaint with respect to this vessel under the Act of 1871, and she had been detained for the purpose of survey. If it should prove that she was in an unsound state as to her construction, and therefore unfit to proceed to sea, he should be glad to stop her. If she were not unsound, but only overloaded, there was no power given to the Board of Trade by the Act of 1871 to stop her, although her crew might refuse to proceed to sea in her, without exposing themselves to any liability. That power, not given by the Act of 1871, would be given by the Bill which he had introduced into that House, and which he intended to proceed with as soon as possible.

Mr. CARTER asked whether the ship had not left Cardiff and got out into the roads before she was stopped or deserted by her crew?

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he had no information on that point.

ARMY RE-ORGANIZATION—CAVALRY SUB-LIEUTENANTS.

QUESTION.

SIR THOMAS BATESON (for Colonel LEIGH) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the two Sub-Lieutenants removed from Cavalry Regiments are to be restored; whether it is intended to alter the present system of sending Sub-Lieutenants to Sandhurst after having joined their regiments; and, whether in future Sub-Lieutenants will join their regiments so prepared as to make it unnecessary to lose their services by demanding them to Sandhurst?

Mr. CARDWELL: An addition, Sir, of one Sub-Lieutenant has been made to the reduced establishment of the Cavalry of the Line, to provide for the absence of those who are to be under education at Sandhurst. The intention of the system of education at Sandhurst is to give higher instruction to young officers who have already acquired the rudiments of military knowledge, and there is no intention to discontinue it.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS' COMMISSIONERS
SIR JOHN PORT'S FOUNDATION,
REPTON AND ETWALL.
QUESTION.

Mr. R. SMITH asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether any objections have been forwarded to the Endowed Schools Commissioners with respect to the "Scheme for the Management of the Charity of the Foundation of Sir John Port in Etwall and Repton, in the county of Derby;" and, if so, whether it is proposed to modify the scheme in accordance with such objections?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER in reply, said, that the Question of the hon. Member referred to a scheme on the Table of this House. The Endowed Schools Commissioners had a considerable Correspondence with those interested in the scheme before it was submitted to the Education Department, and they considered that a satisfactory arrangement was made at that time, and the Papers on the subject seemed to bear out that statement. He understood, however, that after the Commissioners had ceased to have any power in the matter, some fresh objections were stated. The objections had not come to the Department, nor could it entertain them, as the Department was precluded by Law from doing so after it had once approved the scheme; and it was not in the power of the Department to alter the scheme, even if it thought it advisable to do so.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT, 1870— STOURBRIDGE SCHOOL BOARD.

QUESTION.

Mr. C. DALRYMPLE asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether his attention has been directed to the circumstance that at a recent election of a School Board at Stourbridge an individual obtained a majority of votes, who has on different occasions been convicted of assault, and who but recently returned from residence in Worcester Gaol; and, whether it might not be possible in a Bill for the Amendment of the Education Act of 1870, to provide that any one previously convicted of crime should be ineligible to serve on a school board?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had reason to believe that one of the lately-elected members of the school board at Stourbridge had been convicted of assault—he did not know whether in more than one case—and, to use the euphemistic expression of the hon. Member, had recently returned from residence in Worcester Gaol. There was no provision in the Education Act which disqualifies for election a man who was elected after he had been convicted of crime, and he could not say he should be prepared to advise the introduction of a disqualifying clause into the Amendment Bill of that year. This case might be regarded as an exceptional one, and the matter might fairly be left to the discretion of electors generally. If such a clause were introduced it would make the law affecting members of school boards different from the law affecting town councillors, and also hon. Members of that House.

INDIA—THE INDIAN BUDGET.

In reply to Mr. R. FOWLER,

MR. GLADSTONE said, the time had not yet arrived when he could make a definite arrangement as to the sitting at which the Indian Budget should be submitted and discussed. He hoped towards the close of the week to be able to do so; and he would endeavour to bear in mind the wish of the hon. Member that the statement should not be made at a morning sitting.

TRIAL OF ELECTION PETITIONS— CANVASSING BY JUDGES.

QUESTION.

MR. CALLAN asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether it is in accord with or contrary to the duties incidental to the "powers, jurisdiction, and authority" conferred on the Court of Common Pleas by "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," for a Judge of that honourable Court to canvass Electors, by letter or otherwise in the interest of any candidate whose Election or whose Petition on Non-election may be a subject-matter of judicial investigation before the Judge so acting, either as a Judge on the rota for the trial of Election Petitions or as a member of the Court of Common Pleas?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL in reply, said, that he did not like to answer an abstract question without knowing something of the facts on which it was founded; but, speaking simply in the abstract, and without being supposed to pass an opinion on the conduct of any learned Judge of which he was entirely ignorant, he should say that nothing could be more improper than for a Judge of the Court of Common Pleas to canvass electors in the interest of any candidate whose Petition might come before him as a Judge for the trial of Election Petitions.

LEGISLATION—TURNPIKE ACTS CONTINUANCE BILL.—QUESTION.

Lord GEORGE CAVENDISH said, that a few days previous the House had sat till Four o'clock in the morning, in consequence of the determined resistance of a considerable number of Members to the Instruction he had moved to the Committee on the Turnpike Acts Continuance Bill, while upwards of 100 Members remained to the last to support the Instruction. As the delay of the Bill would involve public inconvenience, he asked whether, if the proposed Instruction were withdrawn, the Government would undertake to bring in a Bill on the subject next Session?

MR. HIBBERT in reply, said, he thought, after what had happened, the noble Lord would show a wise discretion if he would withdraw the proposed Instruction. The Local Government Board was quite prepared to have a measure drafted during the Recess, to be introduced early next Session.

LANDED ESTATES COURT (IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

In reply to Colonel STUART KNOX,

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the Government were quite aware that, in the face of the opposition offered to the Bill, there would be considerable difficulty in passing it through the House that Session in its present shape. The reason which originally induced the Government to think there was no necessity for the appointment of a second Judge, however, still remained in force. In the event of the Supreme Court of Judicature Bill passing, it would probably be necessary to introduce a measure dealing generally with Irish judicature, and such a measure would embrace the business of the Landed Estates Court. In considering it, it would be convenient to have to deal with such Judge only. To remove the opposition to the Bill, therefore, the Government proposed to make it a temporary measure, to suspend temporarily the appointment of a second Judge, and to make provision for the discharge of his duties during that period of suspension. It was proposed, therefore, to take the second reading of the measure that evening, and to give Notice of the Amendments which he would introduce in Committee.

Mr. W. E. Forster

wad to be obliged with a condition such as that proposed, the most eminent members of the profession were not likely to be attracted to the office. At present the retiring pension was £5,000 per annum unobliged with any condition, and he asked the hon. and learned Attorney-General for an explanation of the clause.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, the reasons which induced the Government to propose this clause were shortly as follows:—Before the time of Lord Brougham the Lord Chancellor had a pension of £4,000 a-year. In the time of Lord Brougham, however, the salary was altered, on the ground that that particular Lord Chancellor gave up appointments to many sinecure offices which were usually regarded as a means of providing for the families of Lord Chancellors. Therefore, as a sort of make-weight, there was inserted in the Act abolishing Sinecures a clause providing that every future Lord Chancellor should have a pension of £5,000 a-year. At that time the Lord Chancellors were practically the Appellate Judges of the House of Lords; although there was nothing like a contract between them and the country that they should discharge that duty. Within his own recollection, a Lord Chancellor, if not in office, always felt it his duty to render assistance as far as he could to the House of Lords in the adjudication of the Appeals which were brought before that tribunal. During the life of Lord Eldon the legal Peers were few, but he received valuable assistance from Lords Redesdale and Tenterden in the Court of Appeal; and since that period Lords Lyndhurst, Cottenham, and other noble and learned Lords had, as a matter of fact, always discharged the duties of Appeal Judges when out of office, although there was no contract between the country on one side and themselves on the other that they should render such assistance in return for their pensions of £5,000 a-year.

Parliament had now thought fit to remove the greatest part of the Appellate business from the House of Lords; and although it would be open to Parliament to grant this pension of £5,000 a-year to the Lord Chancellor without requiring any services in return, yet, inasmuch as the condition of things was altered, and as it was extremely desirable that the

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

BILL.—[Lord's.]—[Bill 154].

(Mr. Attorney General)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 11th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved the insertion, after Clause 12., of the following new clause—

(Pension of Lord Chancellor.)
“No Pension shall be granted on retirement to any Lord Chancellor to be hereafter for the first time appointed to that office unless he shall signify in writing his willingness to serve as an additional Judge of the Court of Appeal: Provided always, That this section shall not apply to any Lord Chancellor who shall retire by reason of his being disabled by permanent infirmity from performing the duties of his office, or who shall have served for ten years as Lord Chancellor, or who shall have served for a period of fifteen years in the whole in all or any of the following offices, namely: Lord Chancellor, a Judge of the Courts of Chancery, Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, Exchequer, Probate, the High Court of Justice, or the Court of Appeal.

Subject to the provisions in this Act contained, Her Majesty may grant to any Lord Chancellor on retirement such pension as is allowed to be granted by the Act of the Session of the second and third year of His late Majesty King William the First, chapter one hundred and eleven.”

New Clause brought up; and read the first and second time.

On Question, That the clause be added to the Bill?

MR. HUNT said, the clause was not expected to have come on so early, and he was taken by surprise when the Question was put for reading it a second time. The clause would require very careful consideration, because it introduced an entirely new principle. It was most important that the Lord Chancellor should always be a most eminent and learned man in his profession; but if the office highest judicial authority should be procured for the Supreme Court, it seemed right to the Government to turn that into an actual obligation which had hitherto not been such. He thought there was nothing unreasonable in saying that if a noble and learned Lord held the high position of Lord Chancellor for a short time, he should, as a matter of obligation, be bound to discharge the duties of Judge of Appeal on consideration of receiving this pension. He did not believe there was any distinguished Lord who would for a moment hesitate to accept the office of Lord Chancellor, because after he had ceased to hold that office he would be bound to do that by law which he had hitherto felt himself bound to do in honour—namely, to give the best services he could to his country. If an ex-Lord Chancellor chose to take £5,000 a-year and not discharge any legal functions for it, he could at present do so, or he might take private arbitration cases and give to private suitors that judicial knowledge which the country would be only too glad to secure for itself. Those noble and learned Lords were the sole judges of their own honour, and if they chose to undertake that business, they had a perfect right to do so. The House of Commons, on the other hand, had a right to its opinion, not so much with regard to the advisability of the course taken in these two instances as to the probability of the practice becoming common. It was therefore, he thought, extremely proper to provide for the future that those who took the office of Lord Chancellor should, as a condition of receiving that pension, if still in good health and fit for duty, act as Judges in the Court of Appeal, and that was what this section of the Bill would provide.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he very much regretted that the hon. and learned Attorney General should have lent himself to reflect upon the course taken by two noble and learned Lords, not for taking private business, but for having undertaken under an Act of Parliament certain duties while in receipt of pensions as ex-Lord Chancellors, which one, at least, refused to undertake unless called upon by Parliament. In the first case—the Albert Assurance Association—he was Chairman of the Select Committee which was appointed to consider the subject. The Courts having failed to meet the difficulties of that case, it was thought advisable to obtain high judicial assistance. There were at that time about 40 causes in different parts of the Court of Chancery, and no decision could be taken which governed the whole of these cases. A Bill was therefore brought in, and it was a little unreasonable in the hon. and learned Gentleman who, as a Member of Parliament, was to a certain extent a party to that Bill and responsible for it, to throw discredit upon the noble and learned Lord who accepted the office imposed upon him by the Act. In the case of the Albert Assurance Society—the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns) who undertook that arbitration was, he believed, in no instance kept from the performance of his duties in the House of Lords by it. It was the Parliament of the country that called upon these noble and learned Lords to discharge these duties, and if they had not done so the sufferings and expense to individuals would have been out of all proportion to the results. Instead of enormous sums being wasted in legislation, tens of thousands were saved by the decisions of these noble and learned Lords. With respect to the clause before the House, the proposal was that every future Lord Chancellor, on laying down his office, should, as a condition of receiving his pension of £5,000 a-year, signify in writing his consent to sink into the position of an ordinary Judge, work like other Judges under a Chief—and, in short, after having filled the highest office of the State, be content to become a Puisne Judge. It might well be that a Barrister of the highest reputation, and earning a large income, and already holding the highest position at the Bar—such a man as was regarded as the natural successor of the Lord Chancellor of the day—would refuse to accept the office when he knew that after perhaps a brief tenure of office he would be reduced to the rank of a Puisne Judge, with such a salary. Some of those who had actually been Lord Chancellors had refused the appointment of Lord Justice, although accompanied by high rank and larger salaries; yet it was now proposed that these great officers should be compelled to accept positions much lower and with salaries much less. He objected to introducing for the sake of a very small economy a system which would not procure the best men for the higher offices in the country, and he thought that the ex-Lord Chancellors, if called upon to serve, ought at least to be placed in positions of pre-eminence.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he could not see that his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had laid himself open to the criticism of the right hon. Gentleman. The question of the pensions of ex-Lord Chancellors was a remarkable one. In no country in the world were Judges in the position of Lord Chancellors pensioned to the extent of £25,000 a-year — a sum which the right hon. Gentleman described as a very small question of economy. The views of the right hon. Gentleman in regard to the subject were magnificent; but those of the Government were more humble and prosaic; and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would learn to regard with more consideration even such insignificant questions as those of public economy. That was, however, only a particle of the whole question. The point was, whether the present scale of pensions was too large, and whether the House was about to see another great legal change by the assumption of lucrative employment in the discharge of the judicial office by those who received pensions for having filled the office of Lord Chancellor. With respect to ex-Lord Chancellors accepting other duties, he denied that his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had, as the right hon. Gentleman opposite suggested, passed any censure on those noble and learned Lords. They had a perfect right to undertake such duties if they thought fit; but it was a matter for the country to consider whether, if that practice should prevail, that magnificent scale of pensions should continue on the same footing as hitherto. The right hon. Gentleman also appeared to propound the theory that because the Attorney General was a Member of Parliament at the time the Act or Acts of Parliament referred to was or were passed, he was responsible for having induced or called upon those noble and learned Lords to undertake those duties. That practically amounted to saying that every Member was personally responsible for every clause in every Act of Parliament which was passed while he had a seat in the House. A more startling doctrine than that he had never heard, and it was the more extravagant when it was understood as proceeding from the mouth of one who had occupied so eminent a position as had the right hon. Gentleman himself. A difference of opinion existed among noble and learned Lords themselves with regard not to the propriety, but to the expediency of their undertaking duties of the kind referred to, and he had been informed that one noble and learned Lord had distinctly declined to serve as an arbitrator in one of these cases, because he received a pension which, in his opinion, prevented him from undertaking any such duty. As regarded the first of the two noble and learned Lords (Lord Cairns) who had been referred to as having been called upon by Act of Parliament to undertake the duties in question, he (Mr. Gladstone) was a Member of the House at the time; but he disclaimed any individual responsibility for that Act, for he had been totally ignorant of the provisions of it; but the right hon. Gentleman, who was, of course, according to the doctrine he had laid down, perfectly aware of everything contained in private Bills, would, no doubt, be ready to accept his share of the responsibility. With regard to the second of these cases, that of Lord Westbury, it was made matter of mention in that House. A Notice was placed on the Paper, and there was a great expectation that general objection would be taken to the proposed provision; but the Notice was withdrawn because, as explained at the time, it was anticipated that some general legislative provision would be made on the subject. The measure, however, passed without further attention being drawn to it. Now, he did not in the slightest degree question the title of these noble and learned Lords, legally or morally, as matters stood at present, to do as they liked with respect to accepting other duties while in receipt of their pensions; but the state of matters would be altered by that Bill. That House, when it enacted the magnificent pensions given to those who had served the office of Lord Chancellor, knew that they were to remain Members of the House of Lords, and the country expected that they would do their duty in the House according to their capacity and accomplishments. As judicial personages of great skill and knowledge, it was expected—and the expectation had been fulfilled—that they highest judicial authority should be procured for the Supreme Court, it seemed right to the Government to turn that into an actual obligation which had hitherto not been such. He thought there was nothing unreasonable in saying that if a noble and learned Lord held the high position of Lord Chancellor for a short time, he should, as a matter of obligation, be bound to discharge the duties of Judge of Appeal on consideration of receiving this pension. He did not believe there was any distinguished Lord who would for a moment hesitate to accept the office of Lord Chancellor, because after he had ceased to hold that office he would be bound to do that by law which he had hitherto felt himself bound to do in honour—namely, to give the best services he could to his country. If an ex-Lord Chancellor chose to take £5,000 a-year and not discharge any legal functions for it, he could at present do so, or he might take private arbitration cases and give to private suitors that judicial knowledge which the country would be only too glad to secure for itself. Those noble and learned Lords were the sole judges of their own honour, and if they chose to undertake that business, they had a perfect right to do so. The House of Commons, on the other hand, had a right to its opinion, not so much with regard to the advisability of the course taken in these two instances as to the probability of the practice becoming common. It was therefore, he thought, extremely proper to provide for the future that those who took the office of Lord Chancellor should, as a condition of receiving that pension, if still in good health and fit for duty, act as Judges in the Court of Appeal, and that was what this section of the Bill would provide.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he very much regretted that the hon. and learned Attorney General should have lent himself to reflect upon the course taken by two noble and learned Lords, not for taking private business, but for having undertaken under an Act of Parliament certain duties while in receipt of pensions as ex-Lord Chancellors, which one, at least, refused to undertake unless called upon by Parliament. In the first case—the Albert Assurance Association—he was Chairman of the Select Committee which was appointed to consider the subject. The Courts having failed to meet the difficulties of that case, it was thought advisable to obtain high judicial assistance. There were at that time, about 40 causes in different parts of the Court of Chancery, and no decision could be taken which governed the whole of those cases. A Bill was therefore brought in, and it was a little unreasonable in the hon. and learned Gentleman who, as a Member of Parliament, was to a certain extent a party to that Bill and responsible for it, to throw discredit upon the noble and learned Lord who accepted the office imposed upon him by the Act. In the case of the Albert Assurance Society—the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns) who undertook that arbitration was, he believed, in no instance kept from the performance of his duties in the House of Lords by it. It was the Parliament of the country that called upon these noble and learned Lords to discharge these duties, and if they had not done so the sufferings and expense to individuals would have been out of all proportion to the results. Instead of enormous sums being wasted in legislation, tens of thousands were saved by the decisions of these noble and learned Lords. With respect to the clause before the House, the proposal was that every future Lord Chancellor, on laying down his office, should, as a condition of receiving his pension of £5,000 a-year, signify in writing his consent to sink into the position of an ordinary Judge, work like other Judges under a Chief—and, in short, after having filled the highest office of the State, be content to become a Puisne Judge. It might well be that a Barrister of the highest reputation, and earning a large income, and already holding the highest position at the Bar—such a man as was regarded as the natural successor of the Lord Chancellor of the day—would refuse to accept the office when he knew that after perhaps a brief tenure of office he would be reduced to the rank of a Puisne Judge, with such a salary. Some of those who had actually been Lord Chancellors had refused the appointment of Lord Justice, although accompanied by high rank and larger salaries; yet it was now proposed that these great officers should be compelled to accept positions much lower and with salaries much less. He objected to introducing for the sake of a very small economy a system which would not procure the best men for the higher offices in the country, and he thought that the ex-Lord Chancellors, if called upon to serve, ought at least to be placed in positions of pre-eminence.

Mr. GLADSTONE said, he could not see that his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had laid himself open to the criticism of the right hon. Gentleman. The question of the pensions of ex-Lord Chancellors was a remarkable one. In no country in the world were Judges in the position of Lord Chancellors pensioned to the extent of £25,000 a-year — a sum which the right hon. Gentleman described as a very small question of economy. The views of the right hon. Gentleman in regard to the subject were magnificent; but those of the Government were more humble and prosaic; and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would learn to regard with more consideration even such insignificant questions as those of public economy. That was, however, only a particle of the whole question. The point was, whether the present scale of pensions was too large, and whether the House was about to see another great legal change by the assumption of lucrative employment in the discharge of the judicial office by those who received pensions for having filled the office of Lord Chancellor. With respect to ex-Lord Chancellors accepting other duties, he denied that his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had, as the right hon. Gentleman opposite suggested, passed any censure on those noble and learned Lords. They had a perfect right to undertake such duties if they thought fit; but it was a matter for the country to consider whether, if that practice should prevail, that magnificent scale of pensions should continue on the same footing as hitherto. The right hon. Gentleman also appeared to propound the theory that because the Attorney General was a Member of Parliament at the time the Act or Acts of Parliament referred to was or were passed, he was responsible for having induced or called upon those noble and learned Lords to undertake those duties. That practically amounted to saying that every Member was personally responsible for every clause in every Act of Parliament which was passed while he had a seat in the House. A more startling doctrine than that he had never heard, and it was the more extravagant when it was understood as proceeding from the mouth of one who had occupied so eminent a position as had the right hon. Gentleman himself. A difference of opinion existed among noble and learned Lords themselves with regard not to the propriety, but to the expediency of their undertaking duties of the kind referred to, and he had been informed that one noble and learned Lord had distinctly declined to serve as an arbitrator in one of these cases, because he received a pension which, in his opinion, prevented him from undertaking any such duty. As regarded the first of the two noble and learned Lords (Lord Cairns) who had been referred to as having been called upon by Act of Parliament to undertake the duties in question, he (Mr. Gladstone) was a Member of the House at the time; but he disclaimed any individual responsibility for that Act, for he had been totally ignorant of the provisions of it; but the right hon. Gentleman, who was, of course, according to the doctrine he had laid down, perfectly aware of everything contained in private Bills, would, no doubt, be ready to accept his share of the responsibility. With regard to the second of these cases, that of Lord Westbury, it was made matter of mention in that House. A Notice was placed on the Paper, and there was a great expectation that general objection would be taken to the proposed provision; but the Notice was withdrawn because, as explained at the time, it was anticipated that some general legislative provision would be made on the subject. The measure, however, passed without further attention being drawn to it. Now, he did not in the slightest degree question the title of these noble and learned Lords, legally or morally, as matters stood at present, to do as they liked with respect to accepting other duties while in receipt of their pensions; but the state of matters would be altered by that Bill. That House, when it enacted the magnificent pensions given to those who had served the office of Lord Chancellor, knew that they were to remain Members of the House of Lords, and the country expected that they would do their duty in the House according to their capacity and accomplishments. As judicial personages of great skill and knowledge, it was expected—and the expectation had been fulfilled—that they would discharge the very weighty, important, and responsible duty of sitting in appeal cases in the House of Lords. Parliament, however, was now going to remove the larger part of the appellate jurisdiction from that House, and whether it might be this year or next, it was probable that they might see the removal of the whole of the appellate jurisdiction from the House of Lords. Was not that a matter which the House of Commons ought to consider when that endowment of £25,000 a-year for providing a sufficient judicial staff was to remain while the whole of the judicial business was going to be removed? The right hon. Gentleman anticipated that the office of Lord Chancellor, with its splendid position, power, patronage, distinction, and opportunities of serving the country, would not be sufficient to attract the best members of the legal profession if those who were invited to take it were told that the condition of their receiving a pension of £5,000 a-year was that they should serve as members of the Court of Appeal, in the position of what the right hon. Gentleman called a subordinate Judgeship. The Government, however, did not regard the position as that of an inferior Judge—it was one of dignity, and no immoderate amount of work; and he had no doubt that the judicial duties devolving upon ex-Lord Chancellors in the House of Lords had been regarded by those persons as equivalent for the pensions they received. It was true, moreover, that ex-Lord Chancellors had declined to accept other judicial positions, and for what seemed to him to be very sufficient reasons. Lord Cairns declined to accept a Lord Justiceship, and for the reason that he regarded his judicial duties in the House of Lords in the light of the duty which the country had a right to demand of him in consideration of his pension. If the system of pension was continued, he thought the performance of a moderate amount of duty ought to be annexed to the receipt of it. When the Bill was introduced into the House of Lords, it was proposed that the pension of the Lord Chancellor should be reduced to £4,000 and increased to £5,000 in case a retiring Chancellor chose to accept a position as one of the Appellate Judges. That, however, did not meet with approval in the House of Lords, and it was now proposed, that instead of there being a double scale of pension the ex-Lord Chancellor should be called upon in consideration of his large pension to undertake the dignified and important, but, at the same time, not too laborious duties of one of the Judgeships of Appeal. He believed it to be altogether visionary that the result of the proposal would be difficulty in obtaining the service of distinguished lawyers as Lord Chancellors. No such difficulty had ever arisen up to the present, and he had no fear of such a result in the future. Should, however, any such case arise hereafter, it would be quite time enough then to consider whether some better arrangement could not be made.

MR. HENLEY said, he still retained the opinion he expressed before, and thought there should be some limit as to the age beyond which a Lord Chancellor should not be called upon to serve before becoming entitled to his pension. Supposing a distinguished lawyer accepted the Great Seal at the age of 65, it would surely be hard upon him to say that he should serve as an Appellate Judge until he had reached the age of 80, before he was entitled to receive a pension. He would suggest 70 as a more reasonable limit.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he very much doubted the wisdom of the proposal which had been made on the part of the Government, and which would make an entire alteration in the conditions under which a distinguished advocate now accepted the office of Lord Chancellor. All that was said by the Prime Minister and the hon. and learned Attorney General in reference to private practice accepted by ex-Lord Chancellors had nothing to do with the main question, because the Bill did not propose to deal with ex-Lord Chancellors now in receipt of pensions. If it was held that ex-Lord Chancellors should not take private practice in addition to their pensions, a Bill should be introduced prohibiting the taking of such a course. Owing to the peculiar political constitution of Parliament, its highest legal Member was a political as well as a legal official, holding office frequently for a short period only; and what was required, therefore, in the interest of the public was, that a course should be followed whereby the highest legal ability in the State could be commanded for the office of Keeper of the Great Seal." He feared that if the clause was passed in its present form, and ex-Lord Chancellors were called upon to fill, as Appellate Judges, positions inferior to those occupied by the Judges who were below them in rank and emolument during their occupation of the office of Lord Chancellor, men of dignity and spirit would decline to accept the Great Seal. To pass the clause would be to degrade the office of Lord Chancellor. He felt certain that the view he was expressing was that originally entertained by the Government, because, as the Prime Minister had stated, it was first intended to reduce the pension of a retiring Lord Chancellor, and then to give him an additional £1,000 on condition of his serving as an Appellate Judge. That was unacceptable to the House of Lords, and it was now proposed to effect the same object by giving to a retiring Chancellor what was nominally a pension, but really a salary for service in an inferior position. The effect of such a proposal would be either to deter lawyers of the highest ability from accepting the office of Lord Chancellor, or cause them, if they took office, to make things particularly uncomfortable for the other Judges with whom they would afterwards serve in the Court of Appeal. If a division was taken he should think it his duty to vote against the clause.

THE CHANCELLOR or the EXCHEQUER said, he did not agree with the view that the proposal now made would have the effect of degrading the office of Lord Chancellor. No doubt when the noble and learned Lord ceased to be Lord Chancellor he could not exactly have the same dignity as he had before; but they had already carried a clause by which the Queen could bestow upon any of the additional Judges any precedence that she thought proper. It was, therefore, quite in Her Majesty's power to place an ex-Lord Chancellor in a position in which he would suffer no diminution of his dignity. The right hon. Gentleman spoke as if all Lord Chancellors were appointed from successful barristers engaged in practice. But Lord Chancellors were constantly appointed from Judges, of whom Lord Cottenham, Lord Truro, Lord Campbell, Lord Hatherley, Lord Lyndhurst, and Lord Eldon were instances. The Lord Chancellor on his retirement received

£5,000 a-year for discharging his legal duties as a Peer of Parliament, which he was always prepared to do, and he thus gave the country some return for his pension. But what was now proposed was that a retired Lord Chancellor should receive £5,000 a-year and give no services in return, however willing he might be to do so. That was a proposal simply intolerable, and so anomalous that he hoped it would not be pressed upon the attention of the Committee.

DR. BALL said, he was unable to see that a Lord Chancellor, if raised from one of the Chief Judgeships, would, under the proposal of the Government, be in a better position than before. Suppose a very distinguished person elevated to the office of Master of the Rolls, and the Minister selected him for the office of Lord Chancellor. As Master of the Rolls he would receive £6,000 a-year; but the moment he ceased to be Lord Chancellor—which might be in a few months—he would then have only £5,000 a-year for doing work as laborious and far more responsible; for the trouble and labour in an Appellate Court was far greater than in subordinate Courts. Again, the salary of a Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench was £8,000 a-year; but if his great attainments should recommend him for the post of Lord Chancellor, he would have only £5,000 a-year on his retirement for far more laborious duties. Sitting at Nisi Prius, owing to the frequent interest of the transactions in controversy was not half so laborious. He could not concur in that arrangement as one likely to get the best men either for the Courts of First Instance or the Supreme Court of Appeal, as he thought one of its consequences would be that men would take the lesser offices at an earlier period of life, rather than wait for the greater ones. There was a great deal in what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley); surely, they were not prepared to require an aged man to serve for 15 years.

Question put, "That the Clause be added to the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 174; Noes 129: Majority 45.

Motion agreed to; Clause added to the Bill.

AYES.

Amcotts, Col. W. C.
Anderson, G.
Ayrton, rt. hon. A. S.
Backhouse, E.
Baines, E.
Baker, R. B. W.
Balfour, Sir G.
Barclay, A. C.
Bassett, F.
Baxter, rt. hon. W. E.
Bazley, Sir T.
Beaumont, H. F.
Beaumont, Major F.
Bentall, E. H.
Bolckow, H. W. F.
Bowring, E. A.
Brassey, T.
Brewer, Dr.
Bright, rt. hon. J.
Brinckman, Captain
Brocklehurst, W. C.
Brogden, A.
Bruce, Lord C.
Bruce, rt. hon. Lord E.
Bruce, rt. hon. H. A.
Buckley, N.
Campbell-Bannerman,
H.
Candlish, J.
Cardwell, rt. hon. E.
Carington, hn. Col. W.
Carter, R. M.
Cavendish, Lord F. C.
Chambers, Sir T.
Childers, rt. hon. H.
Cholmeley, Captain
Cholmeley, Sir M.
Clifford, C. C.
Cogan, rt. hon. W. H. F.
Colebrooke, Sir T. E.
Coleridge, Sir J. D.
Corrigan, Sir D.
Cowen, Sir J.
Cowper, hon. H. F.
Cowper-Temple, right
hon. W.
Cunliffe, Sir R. A.
Dalway, M. R.
Davie, Sir H. R. F.
Davies, R.
Dickinson, S. S.
Dillwyn, L. L.
Dixon, G.
Duff, M. E. G.
Dundas, J. C.
Edwards, H.
Enfield, Viscount
Erskine, Admiral J. E.
Eykyn, R.
Finnie, W.
Fitzmaurice, Lord E.
Fitzwilliam, hon. H. W.
Fletcher, I.
Forster, rt. hon. W. E.
Fortescue, rt. hon. C. P.
Fortescue, hon. D. F.
Fowler, W.
Gavin, Major
Gladstone, rt. hn. W. E.
Gladstone, W. H.
Goldsmith, Sir F.
Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.
Gourley, E. T.
Gower, Lord R.
Graham, W.
Greville, hon. Captain
Grieve, J. J.
Grosvenor, Capt. R. W.
Hamilton, J. G. C.
Harcourt, W. G. G. V. V.
Hardcastle, J. A.
Henderson, J.
Hibbert, J. T.
Hodgson, K. D.
Holms, J.
Hoskyns, C. Wren-
Howard, hon. C. W. G.
Hughes, W. B.
Hurst, R. H.
James, H.
Jardine, R.
Jessel, Sir G.
Johnston, A.
Kensington, Lord
Kinnaird, hon. A. F.
Knatchbull-Hugessen, right hon. E.
Lambert, N. G.
Lancaster, J.
Lawson, Sir W.
Leathem, E. A.
Lefevre, G. J. S.
Leith, J. F.
Lewis, J. D.
Lloyd, Sir T. D.
Lorne, Marquess of
Lowe, rt. hon. R.
Lubbock, Sir J.
Macfie, R. A.
Mackintosh, E. W.
M'Arthur, W.
M'Clure, T.
M'Lagan, P.
M'Laren, D.
Magniac, C.
Massey, rt. hon. W. N.
Matheson, A.
Maxwell, W. H.
Mellor, T. W.
Melly, G.
Merry, J.
Miali, E.
Milbank, F. A.
Miller, J.
Miller, W.
Monk, C. J.
Monsell, rt. hon. W.
Morgan, G. O.
Morley, S.
Morrison, W.
O'Conor, D. M.
O'Conor Don, The
Ogilvy, Sir J.
Palmer, J. H.
Parker, C. S.
Parry, L. Jones-
Peel, A. W.
Pender, J.
Philips, R. N.
Playfair, L.
Potter, E.
Potter, T. B.

Power, J. T.
 Rathbone, W.
 Ronayne, J. P.
 Rothschild, N. M. de
 Russell, Lord A.
 Rylands, P.
 St. Aubyn, Sir J.
 Samuda, J. D'A.
 Samuelson, H. B.
 Seymour, A.
 Shaw, R.
 Sherlock, D.
 Sherriff, A. C.
 Stapleton, J.
 Storks, rt. hon. Sir H. K.
 Strutt, hon. H.
 Stuart, Colonel
 Stuart, hon. H. W. V.
 Talbot, C. R. M.
 Torr, J.

TELLERS.
 Adam, W. P.
 Glyn, hon. G. G.

NOES.

Agnew, R. V.
 Amphlett, R. P.
 Annesley, hon. Col. H.
 Arbutnott, Major G.
 Asheton, R.
 Baggallay, Sir R.
 Bagge, Sir W.
 Ball, rt. hon. J. T.
 Barrington, Viscount
 Barttelot, Colonel
 Bates, E.
 Beach, Sir M. Hicks.
 Beach, W. W. B.
 Bentinck, G. C.
 Benyon, R.
 Booth, Sir R. G.
 Bright, R.
 Brise, Colonel R.
 Brooks, W. C.
 Bruce, Sir H. H.
 Bruen, H.
 Butt, I.
 Cave, rt. hon. S.
 Cawley, C. E.
 Cecil, Lord E. H. B. G.
 Clive, Col. hon. G. W.
 Cobbett, J. M.
 Cochrane, A.D.W.R.B.
 Corry, hon. H. W. L.
 Crawford, E. H. J.
 Cross, R. A.
 Dawson, Colonel R. P.
 Dick, F.
 Dickson, Major A. G.
 Dimsdale, R.
 Disraeli, rt. hon. B.
 Dyke, W. H.
 Dyott, Col. R.
 Ewing, A. Orr.
 Feilden, H. M.
 Fellowes, E.
 Figgins, J.
 Forester, rt. hon. Gen.
 Fowler, R. N.
 Goldsmith, J.
 Gordon, E. S.
 Gore, J. R. O.
 Gore, W. R. O.
 Grant, Col. hon. J.
 Grav, Colonel

Greene, E.
 Grey de Wilton, Visc.
 Guest, A. E.
 Hamilton, Lord C. J.
 Hamilton, Lord G.
 Hamilton, I. T.
 Hardy, rt. hon. G.
 Hardy, J.
 Hardy, J. S.
 Hay, Sir J. C. D.
 Henley, rt. hon. J. W.
 Heygate, Sir F. W.
 Hick, J.
 Hildyard, T. B. T.
 Hodgson, W. N.
 Hogg, J. M.
 Holford, J. P. G.
 Holmesdale, Viscount
 Holt, J. M.
 Hood, Captain hon. A. W. A. N.
 Hope, A. J. B. B.
 Hunt, rt. hon. G. W.
 Kennaway, Sir J. H.
 Laird, J.
 Laslett, W.
 Learmonth, A.
 Leslie, J.
 Lewis, G. E.
 Liddell, hen. H. G.
 Lindsay, hon. Col. C.
 Lindsay, Col. R. L.
 Lowther, J.
 Lowther, hon. W.
 Mahon, Viscount
 Manners, rt. hn. Lord J.
 Manners, Lord G. J.
 March, Earl of
 Matthews, H.
 Milles, hon. G. W.
 Mills, Sir C. H.
 Monkton, hon. G.
 Montgomery, Sir G. G.
 Morgan, C. O.
 North, Colonel
 Northcote, rt. hon. Sir S. H.
 Paget, R. H.
 Parker, Lieut.-Col. W.
 Patten, rt. hon. Col. W.

Phipps, C. P.	Tipping, W.
Pim, J.	Tollemache, Maj. W. F.
Plunket, hon. D. R.	Trench, hn. Maj. W. le P.
Raike, H. C.	Trevor, Lord A. E. Hill-
Read, C. S.	Turnor, E.
Rothschild, Bvn. L. N. de	Wait, W. K.
Round, J.	Walpole, hon. F.
Sackville, S. G. S.	Walpole, rt. hon. S. H.
Salt, T.	Waterhouse, S.
Sandon, Viscount	Watney, J.
Sclater-Booth, G.	Wheelhouse, W. S. J.
Scourfield, J. H.	Wyndham, hon. P.
Smith, R.	Wynn, G. W. W.
Stanhope, W. T. W. S.
Stanley, hon. F.
Straight, D.
Talbot, J. G.
Taylor, rt. hon. Col.

New Clause.—

(Salaries of future judges.)

(Subject to the provisions in this Act contained, with respect to existing judges, there shall be paid the following salaries, which shall in each case include any pension granted in respect of any public office previously filled by him, to which the judge may be entitled:—

To the Lord Chancellor, the sum hitherto payable to him;
 To the Lord Chief Justice of England, the Master of the Rolls, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, the same annual sums which the holders of those offices now respectively receive;
 To each of the ordinary judges of the Court of Appeal;
 To each of the other judges of the High Court of Justice, the sum of five thousand pounds a year;

No salary shall be payable to any additional judge of the Court of Appeal appointed under this Act; but nothing in this Act shall in any way prejudice the right of any such additional judge except a Lord Chancellor to be hereafter for the first time appointed for that office, to any pension to which he may be by law entitled.)

—(Mr. Attorney General.)

—brought up, and read the first and second time.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT moved the omission in line 6 of the words—

“The Master of the Rolls, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer.”

He could understand why the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice of England should have £7,000 a-year; but he could not understand on what ground the future Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and the future Chief Baron of the Exchequer should have more than £6,000, while the Master of the Rolls received no more than that sum. He wished to know distinctly on what principle the Government vindicated such a difference in the salaries of those Judges, and thought some explanation was due from the hon. and learned Attorney General on the point. If the Amendment were carried, he should propose to give the three Heads of the Divisions £6,000 a-year each.

Amendment proposed, in line 6, to leave out the words from “England,” to the words “the same,” in line 8.—
 (Mr. Vernon Harcourt.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that in regard to a salary it was very difficult to argue the question on any principle at all; but he wished to argue it on principles of fairness. He did know why the Chief Justice of England should have £8,000 and the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas only £7,000 except that it was not a desirable thing to have rigid uniformity; and, upon the whole, £1,000 a-year would be well spent to get a first-rate man. If the clause was regarded as a whole, it would be found that the Government had framed a scale of salaries which was not an exaggerated scale, and yet one which would secure the services of eminent men. In his opinion, it was better that there should not be a rigid uniformity, but that some places should be rather better than others. A further consideration in regard to the matter was, that the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and the Lord Chief Baron had to go on circuit, and the Master of the Rolls had not.

Question put, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 205; Noes 62: Majority 143.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, that it appeared to him that in any proposition made by the Government to increase the salaries of Judges they would obtain the support of nine-tenths of hon. Members opposite. The proposition he had now to make was of a different character from the last. He thought it was of all things desirable to have the Appellate Judges of the High Court of Justice well paid. He desired, therefore, to avoid unnecessary waste in small things, in order to be able to expend money well upon large things. The House of Lords had yielded their appellate jurisdiction to a Court composed of men who, as they thought, would be competent to fulfil the high functions which their Lordships were about to relinquish. A Committee of the other House investigated the subject last year, when Lord Hatherley, on the part of the Government, proposed that the salary of each Appellate Judge should be £6,000 per annum. That proposal received the support of Lord Cairns, but, on the other hand, a Motion was proposed by Lord Chelmsford, supported by the Earl of Derby, and the Marquess of Salisbury, and carried, that the salary should be £7,000. That year, however, the Bill had been accepted by the House of Lords, on the basis of £6,000 per annum, which might be regarded as the minimum sum they thought adequate. If the House of Commons made an alteration in the figures, the other House could not, in the event of their deeming the proposal inadequate, revert to the original amount, and consequently they would have no alternative but to reject the Bill. Indeed, the House would be offering to the other an inducement and almost a provocation to throw out the measure. He entreated the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government to consider what might be the result of pursuing such a course. They had diminished its numbers and reduced its dignity; and if, with unwise parsimony the House reduced the salaries of the members of the Court of Appeal, the Lords would be well entitled to refuse to transfer their jurisdiction to such a tribunal. In conclusion, he moved to add to "each of the ordinary Judges of the Court of Appeal" the words "six thousand pounds a-year."

MR. RAIKES said, he believed that his Amendment had precedence. It was in form to leave out the word "ordinary," and insert in its place, the word "other," but the point was this—If the word "ordinary" was retained, they would then have three different kinds of Judges receiving different salaries—namely, ex officio Judges, ordinary Judges, and additional Judges. It would be an injustice and a hardship, and derogatory to the high position of the ex-Lord Chancellors, if they were required to serve in the Appellate Court upon a less salary than was paid to the ordinary Judges. He thought something was due to the Common Law Judges in the matter.

Amendment moved, page 6, line 8, to leave out "ordinary," and insert "other."
—(Mr. Raikes.)

Mr. Vernon Harcourt

MR. VERNON HARCOURT appealed to the hon. and learned Gentleman to withdraw his Amendment, because, if carried, it would entirely defeat the object they had in view.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL expressed a similar opinion.

MR. RAIKES said, he would withdraw his Amendment, and raise it after the clause had been amended.

Amendment; by leave, withdrawn.

Then—

Amendment proposed, at the end of line 10, after the word "Appeal," to add the words "the sum of six thousand pounds per annum."—(Mr. Vernon Harcourt.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, the House had agreed to preserve the present salaries of the chiefs of the Common Law Courts, but the hon. and learned Gentleman now proposed to increase the salary of the 14 Puisne Judges by giving them an additional £1,000 a-year each. He seemed to be proceeding on the old superstition—a belief in which was occasionally discernible within the walls of that House, that you could create eminent men without number if you only gave them high salaries enough. The House had not got, to use a homely phrase, to "fish" for these eminent men; but the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to improve their quality by giving them another £1,000 a-year each. He proposed to gild them, so to speak, with 1,000 additional sovereigns, as a proper mode of adding to their intellectual power in the discharge of their judicial functions. He protested against the way the House of Lords had been held over their heads, and, he might even say, hung in their face, by the hon. and learned Gentleman. "What would the House of Lords say?" "What would the House of Lords do?" There were not two sentences in the speech but contained some reference to questions of that kind; in fact, he had never known an instance in which they were so much threatened with the retributory action of the House of Lords. He would, however, maintain that it was not for the House of Lords, but for the House of Commons, to fix the amount of charge to be laid upon the public; and there could not be a more fatal precedent than to exhort that House to agree to a certain scale of salaries for fear that if they did not do so, the House of Lords would reject this Bill. Coming to the merits of the question, upon which he hoped the subject would be discussed, the question of expense was not a very small matter. The increased cost which would be involved by adopting the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend would not be less than £14,000 a-year, and he said that that sum, and more, could have been saved if the Committee had only listened the other evening to his proposal to trim and clip and pare the allowance of clerks to the Judges. His hon. and learned Friend was vigorous and valiant in dealing with the salaries of little people, but chicken-hearted and slow when he looked at the great ones. He (Mr. Gladstone), however, did not think it desirable in an Assembly which had a much more close connection with Judgeships than with clerkships to take any such course. That was not a desirable course for the Government to take, and it was one they would not be justified in adopting. He considered that the present Judges of the Court below were handsomely and largely paid at £5,000, and he believed that the arrangement of salaries was fair and equitable according to the position of these Judges and the amount of work they would have to discharge. He could not admit that the Judges of the High Court of Appeal were placed in a position of disadvantage as compared with the Judges of the High Court of Judicature, because these latter, though nominally in receipt of equal salaries with the Judges of the Superior Court, would have to bear the expense and suffer the inconvenience of going circuit. The former, too, would have the high honour of being Members of the Privy Council—a dignity which was regarded more than salary. In addition to that, the work of the Appellate Court would be less in bulk and in difficulty, from the fact that it would have undergone the utmost preliminary sifting. Under the circumstances, he hoped the House of Commons, which was assembled for the purpose of imposing only necessary taxes upon the people, would not take upon itself the perilous task of forcing upon the country an expenditure which the Government, acting on the best ability they possessed to judge with regard to it, emphatically declared to be totally unnecessary.

MR. VERNON HAROURT said, he had brought forward the Motion in order to avoid the scene which followed upon the fixing of the salaries to be paid to the new Members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council at £5,000 a-year. On that occasion the appointments went begging in Westminster Hall, on account of the salaries fixed, and it was only after a very singular interpretation had been put upon an Act of Parliament that a Judge was found to accept office. As surely as such a scene was repeated in respect to the present Bill, so surely would the country conclude that Parliament had lowered and degraded the last Court of Appeal in the country. He had not threatened the House of Commons by flourishing the House of Lords in its face—at any rate, he had not intended to do so. He had merely maintained that if the House of Lords was to surrender its jurisdiction, it had a right to consider whether the Court they were substituting in their place was a sufficient one. It was not, moreover, the fact that he was proposing to add the cost of five ex-Lord Chancellors. The hon. and learned Solicitor General, in a tone which was not respectful to those unfortunate octogenarians, had said that of the five only one was fit for service; and if this was so, it would only involve an addition of £1,000 to the cost.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL explained that what he had said was not that those legal Lords were not fit to serve, but that you could not expect them to be fit in November, 1874, when this Bill would come into operation.

DR. BALL hoped his hon. and learned Friend would divide the Committee.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, do what they would, increase the salaries of these Judges as they might, they could never raise the new Court of Appeal to the dignity of the House of Lords.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 59; Noes 125: Majority 66.

MR. BOUVIERE said, the present Judge of the Court of Admiralty, who had important and onerous duties to discharge, held two or three other offices—the office of the Judge Advocate, the Dean of Arches, and the Mastership of Faculties—an office of considerable emolument. He proposed to insert a Proviso, that the Deanery of the Arches and Mastership of Faculties should not be tenable by any Judge of the High Court of Justice.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL hoped his right hon. Friend would not insist on the Amendment. The arrangements of the Bill were prospective, all present holders being left unaffected in their position, and if it should be found that any inconvenience arose under it, steps would be taken to alter it in the direction of the right hon. Gentleman's Motion. The arrangement with reference to the office of Judge Advocate could not be defended as a permanent one. It was merely provisional, and was now under consideration.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MATTHEWS moved, as an Amendment, in line 12, after "year," insert—

"Provided always, That the expenses of the judges who may be commissioned to go circuits as hereinafter provided shall be borne and paid in like manner as the expenses of the judges who go the winter circuit are now borne and paid."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL hoped the Amendment would not be pressed. Six or seven highly competent men had gladly taken the office of Puisne Judge at the present salary and prospective pension after 15 years' service; and he saw no reason why any addition should be made to the terms which had been so accepted with satisfaction to the public.

MR. WHITBREAD said, it was possible that in some instances the circuit expenses of a Judge would not come to £500 a-year. It was therefore objectionable in principle to pay a nominal salary subject to varying deductions. All fixed salaries ought to represent an absolute money payment, for indirect modes of payment were very bad, and for the most part we had got rid of them. Instead, therefore, of calling the salary £5,000 and making deductions, it would be more honest to make the salary £4,500 and to pay circuit expenses. The expenses of the winter circuits were paid for the Judges, and why should not the others be similarly paid for?

MR. RYLANDS said, the payment of expenses in addition to salaries as suggested by the hon. Member for Bedford opened the door to abuse, as in the case of the Lunacy Commissioners, who charged at the rate of 1s. 6d. a mile, and received hundreds a-year more than they spent without the Treasury having power to interfere.

MR. WHITBREAD said, the abuse stated did not invalidate the principle he had advocated.

MR. HENLEY urged that it would be an unfortunate mistake to leave room for any inequality in the payment of the Judges of the High Court of Justice, who ought all to be placed on the same footing by making them pay these expenses of going circuit out of their own pockets. The result of inequality would be the acceptance of the office by inferior men, the unsatisfactory discharge of circuit duties in civil and criminal divisions, and the consequent increase of avoidable litigation in the High Court. The circuit expenses were not personal only, but included those of the staff which the Judge was obliged to take with him on circuit.

MR. HUNT hoped the circuit expenses would not be considered stereotyped. Much of the present expense might be dispensed with—it was due to the observance of customs which had come down to us from remote antiquity. The Judges invited magistrates and grand jurors to dinner; and although he personally knew that Judges were good company, he did not see why they should be called upon to entertain magistrates and members of the Bar when they went circuit. The Judges had to carry round skilled cooks with assistants, and preparations were always made to entertain the grand jury and others. The facilities of locomotion were so great that it was often difficult to get a quorum of magistrates to stay to dine with the Judge; although, however, the company might be small, the contractors' bill might be great. It was a great tax upon the Judges, and he thought they might curtail these hospitalities without giving offence to anyone.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was proposed as soon as the existing race of Judges was extinct, that all the Puisne Judges should be subject to exactly the same duties and receive the same salaries in the High Court of Justice. The Puisne Judgeships were undertaken upon the understanding that these expenses would have to be borne; but he trusted that in the advancement of time some of the charges entailed by higher offices in the country, and he thought that the ex-Lord Chancellors, if called upon to serve, ought at least to be placed in positions of pre-eminence.

Mr. Bourrie

Mr. GLADSTONE said, he could not see that his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had laid himself open to the criticism of the right hon. Gentleman. The question of the pensions of ex-Lord Chancellors was a remarkable one. In no country in the world were Judges in the position of Lord Chancellors pensioned to the extent of £25,000 a-year — a sum which the right hon. Gentleman described as a very small question of economy. The views of the right hon. Gentleman in regard to the subject were magnificent; but those of the Government were more humble and prosaic; and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would learn to regard with more consideration even such insignificant questions as those of public economy. That was, however, only a particle of the whole question. The point was, whether the present scale of pensions was too large, and whether the House was about to see another great legal change by the assumption of lucrative employment in the discharge of the judicial office by those who received pensions for having filled the office of Lord Chancellor. With respect to ex-Lord Chancellors accepting other duties, he denied that his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had, as the right hon. Gentleman opposite suggested, passed any censure on those noble and learned Lords. They had a perfect right to undertake such duties if they thought fit; but it was a matter for the country to consider whether, if that practice should prevail, that magnificent scale of pensions should continue on the same footing as hitherto. The right hon. Gentleman also appeared to propound the theory that because the Attorney General was a Member of Parliament at the time the Act or Acts of Parliament referred to was or were passed, he was responsible for having induced or called upon those noble and learned Lords to undertake those duties. That practically amounted to saying that every Member was personally responsible for every clause in every Act of Parliament which was passed while he had a seat in the House. A more startling doctrine than that he had never heard, and it was the more extravagant when it was understood as proceeding from the mouth of one who had occupied so eminent a position as had the right hon. Gentleman himself. A difference of opinion existed among noble and learned Lords themselves with regard not to the propriety, but to the expediency of their undertaking duties of the kind referred to, and he had been informed that one noble and learned Lord had distinctly declined to serve as an arbitrator in one of these cases, because he received a pension which, in his opinion, prevented him from undertaking any such duty. As regarded the first of the two noble and learned Lords (Lord Cairns) who had been referred to as having been called upon by Act of Parliament to undertake the duties in question, he (Mr. Gladstone) was a Member of the House at the time; but he disclaimed any individual responsibility for that Act, for he had been totally ignorant of the provisions of it; but the right hon. Gentleman, who was, of course, according to the doctrine he had laid down, perfectly aware of everything contained in private Bills, would, no doubt, be ready to accept his share of the responsibility. With regard to the second of these cases, that of Lord Westbury, it was made matter of mention in that House. A Notice was placed on the Paper, and there was a great expectation that general objection would be taken to the proposed provision; but the Notice was withdrawn because, as explained at the time, it was anticipated that some general legislative provision would be made on the subject. The measure, however, passed without further attention being drawn to it. Now, he did not in the slightest degree question the title of these noble and learned Lords, legally or morally, as matters stood at present, to do as they liked with respect to accepting other duties while in receipt of their pensions; but the state of matters would be altered by that Bill. That House, when it enacted the magnificent pensions given to those who had served the office of Lord Chancellor, knew that they were to remain Members of the House of Lords, and the country expected that they would do their duty in the House according to their capacity and accomplishments. As judicial personages of great skill and knowledge, it was expected—and the expectation had been fulfilled—that they would discharge the very weighty, important, and responsible duty of sitting in appeal cases in the House of Lords. Parliament, however, was now going to remove the larger part of the appellate jurisdiction from that House, and whether it might be this year or next, it was probable that they might see the removal of the whole of the appellate jurisdiction from the House of Lords. Was not that a matter which the House of Commons ought to consider, when that endowment of £25,000 a-year for providing a sufficient judicial staff was to remain while the whole of the judicial business was going to be removed? The right hon. Gentleman anticipated that the office of Lord Chancellor, with its splendid position, power, patronage, distinction, and opportunities of serving the country, would not be sufficient to attract the best members of the legal profession if those who were invited to take it were told that the condition of their receiving a pension of £5,000 a-year was that they should serve as members of the Court of Appeal, in the position of what the right hon. Gentleman called a subordinate Judgeship. The Government, however, did not regard the position as that of an inferior Judge—it was one of dignity, and no immoderate amount of work; and he had no doubt that the judicial duties devolving upon ex-Lord Chancellors in the House of Lords had been regarded by those persons as equivalent for the pensions they received. It was true, moreover, that ex-Lord Chancellors had declined to accept other judicial positions, and for what seemed to him to be very sufficient reasons. Lord Cairns declined to accept a Lord Justicehip, and for the reason that he regarded his judicial duties in the House of Lords in the light of the duty which the country had a right to demand of him in consideration of his pension. If the system of pension was continued, he thought the performance of a moderate amount of duty ought to be annexed to the receipt of it. When the Bill was introduced into the House of Lords, it was proposed that the pension of the Lord Chancellor should be reduced to £4,000 and increased to £5,000 in case a retiring Chancellor chose to accept a position as one of the Appellate Judges. That, however, did not meet with approval in the House of Lords, and it was now proposed that instead of there being a double scale of pension the ex-Lord Chancellor should be called upon in consideration of his large pension to undertake the dignified and important, but, at the same time, not too laborious duties of one of the Judgeships of Appeal. He believed it to be altogether visionary that the result of the proposal would be difficulty in obtaining the service of distinguished lawyers as Lord Chancellors. No such difficulty had ever arisen up to the present, and he had no fear of such a result in the future. Should, however, any such case arise hereafter, it would be quite time enough then to consider whether some better arrangement could not be made.

MR. HENLEY said, he still retained the opinion he expressed before, and thought there should be some limit as to the age beyond which a Lord Chancellor should not be called upon to serve before becoming entitled to his pension. Supposing a distinguished lawyer accepted the Great Seal at the age of 65, it would surely be hard upon him to say that he should serve as an Appellate Judge until he had reached the age of 80, before he was entitled to receive a pension. He would suggest 70 as a more reasonable limit.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he very much doubted the wisdom of the proposal which had been made on the part of the Government, and which would make an entire alteration in the conditions under which a distinguished advocate now accepted the office of Lord Chancellor. All that was said by the Prime Minister and the hon. and learned Attorney General in reference to private practice accepted by ex-Lord Chancellors had nothing to do with the main question, because the Bill did not propose to deal with ex-Lord Chancellors now in receipt of pensions. If it was held that ex-Lord Chancellors should not take private practice in addition to their pensions, a Bill should be introduced prohibiting the taking of such a course. Owing to the peculiar political constitution of Parliament, its highest legal Member was a political as well as a legal official, holding office frequently for a short period only; and what was required, therefore, in the interest of the public was, that a course should be followed whereby the highest legal ability in the State could be commanded for the office of Keeper of the Great Seal." He feared that if the clause was passed in its present form, and ex-Lord Chancellors were called upon to fill, as Appellate Judges, positions inferior to those occupied by the Judges who were below them in rank and emolument during their occupation of the office of Lord Chancellor, men of dignity and spirit would decline to accept the Great Seal. To pass the clause would be to degrade the office of Lord Chancellor. He felt certain that the view he was expressing was that originally entertained by the Government, because, as the Prime Minister had stated, it was first intended to reduce the pension of a retiring Lord Chancellor, and then to give him an additional £1,000 on condition of his serving as an Appellate Judge. That was unacceptable to the House of Lords, and it was now proposed to effect the same object by giving to a retiring Chancellor what was nominally a pension, but really a salary for service in an inferior position. The effect of such a proposal would be either to deter lawyers of the highest ability from accepting the office of Lord Chancellor, or cause them, if they took office, to make things particularly uncomfortable for the other Judges with whom they would afterwards serve in the Court of Appeal. If a division was taken he should think it his duty to vote against the clause.

THE CHANCELLOR or THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not agree with the view that the proposal now made would have the effect of degrading the office of Lord Chancellor. No doubt when the noble and learned Lord ceased to be Lord Chancellor he could not exactly have the same dignity as he had before; but they had already carried a clause by which the Queen could bestow upon any of the additional Judges any precedence that she thought proper. It was, therefore, quite in Her Majesty's power to place an ex-Lord Chancellor in a position in which he would suffer no diminution of his dignity. The right hon. Gentleman spoke as if all Lord Chancellors were appointed from successful barristers engaged in practice. But Lord Chancellors were constantly appointed from Judges, of whom Lord Cottenham, Lord Truro, Lord Campbell, Lord Hatherley, Lord Lyndhurst, and Lord Eldon were instances. The Lord Chancellor on his retirement received

£5,000 a-year for discharging his legal duties as a Peer of Parliament, which he was always prepared to do, and he thus gave the country some return for his pension. But what was now proposed was that a retired Lord Chancellor should receive £5,000 a-year and give no services in return, however willing he might be to do so. That was a proposal simply intolerable, and so anomalous that he hoped it would not be pressed upon the attention of the Committee.

DR. BALL said, he was unable to see that a Lord Chancellor, if raised from one of the Chief Judgeships, would, under the proposal of the Government, be in a better position than before. Suppose a very distinguished person elevated to the office of Master of the Rolls, and the Minister selected him for the office of Lord Chancellor. As Master of the Rolls he would receive £6,000 a-year; but the moment he ceased to be Lord Chancellor—which might be in a few months—he would then have only £5,000 a-year for doing work as laborious and far more responsible; for the trouble and labour in an Appellate Court was far greater than in subordinate Courts. Again, the salary of a Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench was £8,000 a-year; but if his great attainments should recommend him for the post of Lord Chancellor, he would have only £5,000 a-year on his retirement for far more laborious duties. Sitting at Nisi Prius, owing to the frequent interest of the transactions in controversy was not half so laborious. He could not concur in that arrangement as one likely to get the best men either for the Courts of First Instance or the Supreme Court of Appeal, as he thought one of its consequences would be that men would take the lesser offices at an earlier period of life, rather than wait for the greater ones. There was a great deal in what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley); surely, they were not prepared to require an aged man to serve for 15 years.

Question put, "That the Clause be added to the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 174; Noes 129: Majority 45.

Motion agreed to; Clause added to the Bill.

of the noble and learned Lord who put forward the claim, and therefore I say there is nothing on the Journals of the House of Lords to support or substantiate it, and there is nothing on the records of this House acknowledging or even referring to it. I must say, therefore, I think it would be most undesirable that there should be placed on our records any evidence at all of there having been such a preposterous demand made as that which was put forward by the noble and learned Lord. Well, now, I wish the House to remark, that if we take the course which was suggested the other evening in reference to this question by my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, we shall practically upon our records, by sending up an imperfect Bill, be admitting this claim of the House of Lords, and we shall be giving them an opportunity of putting on their records a statement of their claim, and the fact that we have furnished them with incontrovertible evidence of the justice of such claim. Sir, I think it is most undesirable on both hands that that should be the case. We know by surreptitious means—because reports of debates in the House of Lords are irregular—that some ambitious and able lawyer in that House, of great eminence and distinction, has in the course of a speech there put forward a claim of that kind. But as a body—as the House of Commons—we know nothing of that; and I own I think it would be taking a very unwise and imprudent course if we were to lose sight of our great object, and risk the loss of this great measure by entering into a contest with the other House on this subject. I think the House should take no notice of it whatever. The Motion for the re-committal of the Bill, of which Notice must be given in the course of the evening, has only one object—to extend to Irish and Scotch appeals the appellate jurisdiction of the new Court. That is a most important object to keep in view, and it is one which I ventured to suggest to this House. I think it is impossible for anybody with a grain of sense to contend that, when you have removed from the House of Lords their appellate jurisdiction in English cases, which form the great bulk of the appeal business, the Scotch and Irish cases should still be permanently submitted to their jurisdiction. All the arguments in favour of taking away the English appellate jurisdiction from the House of Lords apply with ten-fold force to the Irish and the Scotch appeals. Men of sense even in the other House—and there are a great many men of sense there—would never seek to maintain their appellate jurisdiction merely over Scotch and Irish appeals, unless; indeed, some side issue were raised or their prejudices were excited by a question of Privilege. This is only a matter of time, and of a very short time. The new Appellate Court is not to come into operation until November in next year. There is, therefore, ample time, without running the risk of engaging the House in these useless controversies on this question of Privilege, to succeed in the object we have in view and provide that that great Appellate Court should deal with appeals from the three kingdoms. As a Scotch Member, I feel the strength of the proposition that the same Court should hear both English and Scotch appeals; but I also feel the reasonableness of the demand which Englishmen may fairly make—namely, that the chance of establishing a good Appellate Court for England shall not be lost merely for the satisfaction of making an attempt to extend its jurisdiction to Scotch appeals. I wish, therefore, to urge upon my right hon. Friend and his Colleagues that, as far as my humble judgment goes, the judicious and proper course is not now to re-commit the Bill, with a view to extend the appellate jurisdiction of the new Court, but allow this promising opening to a quarrel to drop altogether, and thus set an example of good sense and temper to the other House—an example which I hope they are always ready to follow. I invite my right hon. Friend, therefore, to give an undertaking that early next Session this defect in the Bill will be remedied by the introduction of a supplementary one, and that he will then be ready to propose the extension of the appellate jurisdiction to Ireland and Scotland. There is, however, one Amendment on the Paper of the hon. and learned Attorney General, for extending the qualification of the Judges in the Appellate Court from barristers in this country to Irish barristers and Scotch advocates. That Amendment should, I think, be made; but the Bill does not require re-committal for such a purpose, and I trust that, if the course I have suggested be taken that Amendment may be made upon the Report.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I must express my entire concurrence in the suggestion made by my right hon. Friend, which I strongly recommend her Majesty's Government to accept. I listened with great satisfaction the other night to the observations made by my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government on the subject of Privileges, which cannot be said with accuracy to be claimed by the House of Lords, but as to which we had notice that the House of Lords will be invited to assert them if this Bill is sent up, depriving the House of Lords of the appellate jurisdiction over Scotch and Irish appeals. The more one looks at this possible claim of Privilege on the part of the House of Lords, the stronger appear to be the precedents against the validity of such a claim. I therefore think the House would be perfectly justified in sending up the Bill, with the Amendments of the hon. and learned Attorney General; but I am perfectly satisfied that it would not be consistent with our dignity to enter into such a contest with the other House. My right hon. Friend, therefore, showed good sense in the course which he proposed to take—namely, to avoid any possible collision with the House of Lords on the question, thereby risking the loss of a very valuable Bill upon the consideration of which great time has been spent. At the same time I think the course which he indicated was a dangerous course with reference to this question of Privilege! We are invited to send the Bill up to the other House in an imperfect state, indicating our wishes, but not inserting the clauses which are necessary to give effect to those wishes. But in adopting this course should we not be saying in effect that we shrink from doing what we think we have a right to do, because we should thereby come into collision with the other House; and should we not be inviting the other House to do what they say they have a right to do? It seems to me that we should thus be creating a precedent against ourselves, and should be practically surrendering the very question of Privilege which we assert. There are other considerations which appear to me to make it desirable that the question of the Irish and Scotch appellate jurisdiction should receive more consideration than has yet been given to it. I am not authorized to speak on behalf of anyone, but the Scotch and Irish Members with whom I have communicated concur in that opinion, and say that nothing will be lost by delay; on the contrary, that good will result from delay, because in the next Session a Bill may be brought forward containing provisions to obviate any of the inconveniences which might arise under the present measure. It would not be right to call upon my right hon. Friend for any opinion at present, nor ask him to pledge himself to take any particular course; but I do ask him to consider whether it would not be better to send up the Bill as it stands, with any Amendment which may be needful upon the Report, reserving till next Session the question of extending the appellate jurisdiction of the new Court to Ireland and Scotland. I agree with my right hon. Friend (Mr. Bonar) that it is impossible that if the House of Lords surrender their appellate jurisdiction in English cases, they can retain it for the comparatively few cases that come to them from Scotland and Ireland. The loss of the appellate jurisdiction in those cases must necessarily follow. We may safely rely upon the result, and I should, therefore, be glad if my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government would abstain from moving the re-committal of the Bill, reserving to himself the right next Session of introducing a new measure to carry out the object he has in view.

MR. BUTT joined in the appeal which had been made to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government to postpone for the present the extension of the new jurisdiction to Irish and Scotch appeals, but upon grounds differing from those already urged. He hoped the question of extending the operation of the Bill to Ireland would not be pressed during the present Session; for he had found that there was a strong opinion against it in that country founded on very valid objections. After carefully considering the provisions for transferring Irish appeals to the English Courts, he entertained a strong objection to such a transfer. That, however, was not the time for stating the grounds to that objection. He was prepared to do so, but the proper time would be if the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General persevered in the Motion for re-committing the Bill. One objection, however, lay upon the surface. It was a mistake to suppose that that was a Bill for substituting another tribunal for the House of Lords. It was really a Bill to substitute another tribunal for the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and so to supersede the necessity for appealing to the House of Lords. There was at present in England an appeal from the Judges to the full Court; from the full Court to the Exchequer Chamber; and afterwards to the House of Lords; and what was proposed was to make one Court of Appeal only—the Court of Exchequer Chambers. It was not proposed, however, to do that in Ireland. The Court of Exchequer Chamber there was to be left untouched, and there were still to be three appeals; but an English Court was to be set up as a Court of Appeal for Ireland instead of the House of Lords. The scheme of the Bill for Ireland was to strengthen the intermediate Court of Appeal, making it so strong as to supersede the necessity of appealing to the House of Lords. The Bill for Ireland, therefore, would become a totally different Bill from that which was applicable to England. After the predominant opinion expressed on the other side, he was almost afraid to say that, in his opinion, a great mistake had been made in taking from the House of Lords its appellate jurisdiction. He did not believe it would be possible, by any new tribunal, to replace the great traditions and the prestige which belonged at present to the House of Lords. Apart from that question, however, the House was not in a position now to deal with the Irish appellate jurisdiction, as they were doing with the English. It was proposed by the Bill that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland and the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland should sit on appeals in this country; but how could they leave the business of their own Courts, without the substitution of a new Court for the Irish Exchequer Chamber. The Lord Chancellor of Ireland and the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland would come to sit as strangers in a Court to which they were unaccustomed. They would feel that they were inferior members of that Court. He was not sure that the Irish people would be satisfied with the proposition of the Bill to transfer from the present highest Court of Appeal for the three kingdoms the jurisdiction which it had hitherto exercised in the case of appeals from Ireland to an English Court only co-ordinate with the Courts in Ireland from which those appeals were to come. That proceeding had been tried in the time of Lord Mansfield, with an unfavourable result; and he was not sure that the people of Ireland would be satisfied if the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland were reversed by Judges in England. He had no right to speak on behalf of any one but himself; but he believed the objection he entertained to the Amendment introduced with reference to this matter was very largely shared by people in Ireland. Why should there be any hurry on this subject of dealing with appeals from Ireland? The people of Ireland had suffered under grievances for many a generation, and for a Session or two more they could contentedly wait to see how this plan as to the hearing of English appeals worked before asking that it should be extended to Irish appeals. He would say—“Fiat experimentum in corpore vili;” but for once let an experiment on a vile body be made in England. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would accede to his request, that so far as concerned Ireland the proposition about a transfer of jurisdiction in the matter of appeals—or, in other words, an attempt to place a sort of excrescence upon the Irish system of judicature—would be delayed for a Session or two.

DR. BALL said, he did not agree in the views which had been expressed by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, for one of the main reasons which induced him to consent to a transfer of Irish Appeals to the same Court as that which the Bill proposed should be constituted to hear English appeals was, that such transfer would further consolidate an intimate union between the two countries. With that object in view, he thought it was most undesirable that there should be proclaimed such an essential difference between the two countries as was implied in the demand that there should be one tribunal for hearing English appeals and another for hearing Irish appeals.

A large majority of the Irish Members were ready to vote with him on this question, and he was supported in it not merely by Members on his own side of the House; on the contrary, he had the support of hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Liberal side. He deeply regretted that the hon. and learned Member for Cork (Mr. Downing), who knew well the feeling of the Irish people, and particularly of the legal portion of that people, was absent. That hon. and learned Gentleman felt deeply on this question; and in the very last conversation he had with him he urged him not to give way on this subject. He (Dr. Ball) did not like delay. He was satisfied with the terms which had been offered by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, who had offered everything which Ireland or the Irish Bar ought to demand. There was no certainty that the right hon. Gentleman would be at the head of the Government another year, or, if he was, he might not be disposed to offer the same terms again. In opposition to the suggestion that the question concerning the hearing of Irish appeals should be delayed, he must say that he recollects the promise solemnly made by his noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland that he would introduce a Bill relating to Labourers' Dwellings in Ireland, and from that day to this not only had he not brought in such a Bill, but he (Dr. Ball) did not believe that there was a draft or a sketch of it in the well-supplied pigeon-holes of the Irish Office. The fact was, no Government wished to embark on Irish questions unless pressure was exercised. There was an opportunity now of pressing the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government; good terms had been offered by the right hon. Gentleman, and if the offer of those terms were not accepted, hon. Members would act very short-sightedly with reference to the interests of Ireland.

MR. VERNON HAROURT said, he thought the very candid speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball) would explain the situation in which they were placed with reference to the House of Lords. The Government, by accepting the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouvierie), had created all the difficulties in which the House of Commons was placed. They accepted it, because the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock was supposed to represent the Scotch Members, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin the Irish Members. It was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock who asked the House to commit this dreadful breach of the Privileges of the House of Lords, and it was well he was going to be supported by the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for Buckinghamshire. The only mistake which was made by the Government was that they did not take a division on the subject, because if a division had been taken on the Motion of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock, it would have been seen that the Scotch Members voted with him, that the majority of the Irish Members voted with the right hon. Member for the University of Dublin, and that the Conservative party voted under the direction of their Leader to do the very act for which the House of Commons was now attacked as a gross breach of Privilege of the House of Lords. That was the view taken by the Leaders on either side nobody could doubt for a moment. His right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) was not now present, but he made a very elaborate and ingenious speech objecting to the course taken. He referred to almost every possible topic. The one topic which was conspicuous by its absence was the question of a breach of the Privilege of the House of Lords. Now, could it be conceived to be possible that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, whose great reputation had been built up in the House of Commons, would have willingly and intentionally consented to that House committing a breach of the Privilege of the House of Lords? Certainly not. The right hon. Gentleman was much too tender of the honour and reputation of the House of Commons to have taken any such course, and if he did not urge an objection about a breach of the Privilege of the House of Lords, it was because he thought such an objection could not be well founded. There had been a speech made by an eminent and learned Lord on this subject, and there had been a speech by the Prime Minister and Leader of the House of Commons. As to those two speeches, one was an assertion and the other was a counter-assertion. One assertion was as good as another "and a great deal better." But he must venture to ask the attention of the House, as that question of breach of Privilege had been raised, to a precedent which occurred at a very important epoch. In 1675, the House of Commons sent up a message to the House of Lords objecting to the exercise of their judicial functions, and requesting a conference between the two Houses on the subject. The message which the Lords sent in reply—28th of May, 1675—was as follows:—

"That the Lords did not agree to a conference when the whole matter concerned the judicature of the Lords, on which they could admit no debate nor grant any conference. But this present Message being for a conference as to the privileges of their House—that is, House of Commons—the Lords have agreed, always provided that nothing be offered at the conference that may any way concern their Lordships' judicature."

The answer of the House of Commons to this claim of the House of Lords was as follows:—

"That the House of Commons do agree with the Lords that conferences between the two Houses are essential to Parliamentary proceedings when they are agreed in the usual and Parliamentary way, but the manner of the Lords' agreement to the Conference to have been on Friday, the 28th of May, in the Painted Chamber with limitation and proviso, did necessitate the House of Commons to forbear to meet at that Conference, and gave the first interruption to Parliamentary proceedings in conferences between the two Houses. For that the Conference desired by the Commons was upon their Privileges concerned in the Answer of the Lords to a Message of the House of Commons, sent to the Lords the 17th of May, in the case of Mr. Onslow, to which the Lords did not agree, but did only agree to a Conference concerning their Privileges in general, without reference to the case of the said Mr. Onslow, which was the only subject-matter of the desired Conference. The limitation in the Lords' agreement to a Conference, with proviso that nothing be offered at the Conference that may in any way concern the Lords' judicature, is in effect a denial of any Conference at all upon the subject upon which it was desired which ought not to be. The judicature which the Lords claim in appeals against a Member of the House of Commons, and the privilege of that House in that case is so involved that no conference can be upon the matter without some way touching the former. That this manner of agreeing to a conference with any limitation or proviso is against the course of proceedings between the two Houses in coming to conferences, and doth seem to place a power in the managers of such conferences to judge whether such provisos be broken or not, and accordingly to proceed or break off the conference upon their own judgments. The House of Commons doubt not, but that, when the Lords have considered of what is delivered at this Conference, the good correspondence which the Lords express their desire to continue between the two Houses (which the Commons are no less careful to maintain) will induce them to remove the present interruption of coming to conferences, and therefore to agree to the conference as it was desired by the House of Commons, upon the privileges of their House concerned in the Lords' Answer to the Message of the House of Commons in the Case of Mr. Onslow: That the particular limitation, that nothing be offered at the Conference, that may any way concern the judicature of the Lords, appears unreasonable; for that their Lordships' judicature in Parliament is circumscribed by the laws of the land as to their proceedings and judgments: and is, as well as all other Courts, subjected to Parliament."—[Parl. History, iv. 732-3.]

That was the language of the House of Commons when the question of Privilege in respect of their judicature was raised, and that language formed an important item in our constitutional history. The result of this difference between the two Houses appeared to have been the dissolution of the first Parliament of Charles II., which had then sat for 15 years. Two days after the occurrence to which he had just referred, the King came down to Parliament and, with the ready wit and sharp-sightedness that distinguished him, he made a speech that accurately described the situation, and which was somewhat germane to the situation in which the House now found itself. He said—

"My Lords and Gentlemen: You may remember, that, at the meeting of this Session, I told you no endeavour would be wanting to make the continuance of this Parliament impracticable. I am sorry that experience hath so quickly showed you the truth of what I then said; but I hope that you are well convinced, that the intent of all these contrivances is only to procure a Dissolution."—[Ibid. 737.]

Probably, the same observation might be equally applicable at the present moment to a quarrel which seemed to have been most unnecessarily attempted to be picked between the two Houses of Parliament. It was for those reasons that he entirely concurred in the view that had been taken of the matter by the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock. It appeared to him that the House of Commons had two things to do, and that they must try and combine them—first, pass the Bill; and secondly, not to admit the claim of Privilege which had been set up by the Lords. The question was, how could those objects be best attained. If, in order to pass the Bill, it were necessary to admit the Lords' claim to Privilege, he would rather lose the Bill than admit their claim. He did not, however, think that that was necessary. In the first place, this was a claim advanced not by the House of Lords—the claim did not appear upon the records of either House of Parliament, and if it were passed by as an idle wind nothing would remain of it beyond the speech of the noble and learned Lord who had set it up, and the speech of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government in that House in reply to it. By adopting the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock the Bill would be saved, while the claim of the Lords would not be admitted; whereas if the Bill containing imperfect clauses were to be sent up to the other House, in order that it might be perfected there, it might be construed as a yielding to the claim of the Lords. Under those circumstances he joined with the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock in appealing to the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister not to pursue the course he had indicated the other day, but having got the Bill out of Committee, to go on with the Report, and to send it up to the House of Lords, and so remove all pretext whatever for advancing that dissolution in the manner to which King Charles II. had referred.

Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he had given Notice, at an earlier part of the evening, of a Motion which would distinctly raise the question of Privilege, which ought to rest upon some sounder footing than the mere dicta of text writers and doubtful precedents. He advised the House to decline to take upon themselves at this period of the Session the responsibility of altering the whole of the law of Irish and Scotch appeals. It appeared to him that this claim of the House of Lords, which had been somewhat ostentatiously made, not by the House of Lords, but by a single Member of that House, amounted to this—that it was not competent for the House of Commons, in the most minute degree, to alter any Bill sent down from the House of Lords touching its appellate jurisdiction. That appeared to him to be a most dangerous proposition, and one which it would not be consistent with the dignity of the House of Commons to pass over in silence. If there was one thing more than another in which the people were interested, and over which it was the duty of that House, as guardians of the rights of the people to watch, it was the administration of justice, and if that House were to hesitate to express its opinion on the judicial functions of the House of Lords, it would not only be surrendering one of its greatest Privileges, but be committing a great national wrong. The passage relied on by Lord Cairns in Blackstone did not apply, because it was written by him in reference to the Lords not in their judicial capacity, but as Members of the Legislature, and if it were not, the point was far too important to be settled by a text writer, however eminent. To re-commit the Bill would be a grave mistake, for, supposing the Bill to be passed by the Lords in the shape in which it was now proposed to be sent up to them, they would actually create two new Judges with nothing to do. He, therefore, thought the House was bound before parting with the Bill, to enter its emphatic protest against the claim set up by the House of Lords. It was said that what was good for England was good for Scotland and Ireland, and earlier in the Session such an argument would be unanswerable; but just now the shadow of the long vacation was upon the House, and the question in every man's mind was—"How soon can we get out of this place?" It would be absolutely necessary to deal ultimately with this question of Irish and Scotch appeals; but when that time came it ought to be considered as a whole, and clauses for Scotland and Ireland ought not to be pitchforked into a Bill for England. Take away the English appeals, and the House of Lords would die of inanition.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Question is, that this Bill, as amended, be considered on Thursday next. The whole of this discussion has been, according to my judgment, somewhat premature. It would have been more properly raised on the question of the re-committal of the Bill, which has not yet been proposed. I submit this observation to the House that, on the Motion that this Bill be considered on Thursday next, no Amendment could be moved, except as to the time at which the consideration of the Bill should be taken; and therefore any discussion not relevant to an Amendment of that kind is out of place.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, after that intimation from the Chair he would not, of course, continue his remarks; but in making them, he was only following the example of other hon. and right hon. Members. He would only express a desire that the Prime Minister would accede to the universally expressed opinion of the House.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN, as an Irish Member, did not concur in the observations of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt). His impression was, that one of the Irish Judges at all events, and that was the Lord Chancellor, would have no particular difficulty in attending any Appeal Court in England. He deprecated delay; but at the same time, the passing of a Bill for the United Kingdom or for any portion of it that year was a comparatively unimportant matter; the more important question was, whether, on a great question of Imperial policy, the one Bill should not embrace the three kingdoms. The questions of Irish and Scotch judicature could not be postponed in the nonchalant manner assumed by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), who addressed them as a monitor from the dépôt centre of Oxford. Was that an occasion on which they ought to legislate for England? ["Hear, hear!"] That cheer of his hon. and learned Friend was not a cheering cheer. He supported the views of his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Dr. Ball) and he believed his opinions were shared by Irish Members generally. [Mr. MITCHELL HENRY: No, no!] It was all very well for his hon. Friend, who wrote a letter to The Times once a week, to say, "No, no;" but he (Sir Patrick O'Brien) had had experience in that House for 20 years, while his hon. Friend had only been in it about two—so that his interruption was out of place. As he had said before, he believed Irish Members generally were in favour of there being only one Court of Appeal for the United Kingdom. He therefore wished to advance as far as he could the view of the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin, that this great question ought to be considered in the Imperial Parliament as one affecting the United Kingdom, whether it was considered now or next year, or by a new Parliament.

MR. GLADSTONE: In the few remarks which I am about to make I shall endeavour to bear in mind the observations that have fallen from the Chair; but I think, after so much has been said, and with so much ability and authority, in reference to the future course of this Bill, to be considered on Thursday next, perhaps I ought not to pass altogether unnoticed the appeal made to the Government. I am bound to say with regard to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), whether or not we may ultimately agree with his conclusions, we shall arrive at them upon grounds totally and diametrically opposite to his. I am sorry, however, he has thought it necessary to avow the opinions he has declared with regard to the best arrangements in regard to the Irish judicature. With respect to the speeches which have been made upon the subject, I have the good fortune to agree with their main principle. As far as I am concerned, I have no doubt there ought to be one final Court of Appeal for the three kingdoms; and I have also no doubt, after listening to the very manly statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Ireland (Dr. Ball), there will be one Court of Appeal for the three kingdoms, and that the just claim of Ireland has received a recognition which I believe will be permanent and effectual at the proper time, whether it be found practicable or not to give effect to it during the present Session. I think it only just to say so much in answer to what has fallen from the right hon. and learned Gentleman. There has been no difference expressed among the speakers to-night with regard to the supposed Privilege which has threatened to be an impediment to our proceedings, and for my own part, all reflection confirms me in the conclusion that that Privilege is as purely visionary as any claim in the history of Parliament that ever was set up. On the other hand, those who share that opinion agree with the Government in thinking it is not desirable we should enter into controversy with the other House of Parliament upon the subject. It has been our desire to frame our course with reference to this principle—it might be, if the House of Commons were weaker than it is, it could not afford to pass by an occasion when its rights are challenged; but it is because it is strong in the breadth and depth of its popular base, as well as in great historical traditions, that we come freely to that conclusion which the public interest dictates as the best, on the whole, with reference to the circumstances before us, and do not trouble ourselves about the question—what observations or criticisms may be made upon the apparent surrender of rights, which, if we had thought fit, we might have proceeded to urge? The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) has most justly laid the ground of the proceedings we should take in this case; when he says that we have two objects to reconcile as well as we can. One is to promote the passing of this Bill, and the other is to hold ourselves clear from an acknowledgment of the claim which has been set up. On all these matters of principle the House is not likely to be disturbed by serious differences. The point at which I should part company with the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock is in the very great preference which he has expressed for one mode of proceeding over the other. He thinks if we were to pass a Bill constituting a complete Court of Appeal and send it to the Lords, leaving it to them to insert the transference of appeals from the House of Lords, we should seriously compromise the rights of this House; but if we simply withdrew from the purpose, which certainly had been entertained, and which appeared at one time to meet, if not with the unanimous, at least with the general approval of the House, in that case no harm would be done. I say frankly this is a matter in which the Government is ready to be prompted and led by the general conviction of the House. When we accepted the Motion of my right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock on a former night, Member after Member in different parts of the House rose to express satisfaction with the course we had taken, and when, in pursuance of our announcement, we placed Amendments on the Notice Paper of the House we were no longer free to act and to recede from them, unless we ascertained in the first instance the feeling of the House. But I frankly own my opinion is that we shall not—I mean the House will not—escape criticism, whatever course may be taken. In the one case, as was most justly stated by my right hon. Friend, there will be a record in the official and authentic documents of this House; in the other case there will be none. But in either case it will remain as matter of history—as a matter admitting of no moral doubt whatever—that a claim of Privilege had been raised—I need not say by whom, not by the House of Lords—which might have affected the proceedings of the House of Lords; that that claim had been firmly, promptly, and generally repudiated by the House of Commons, but still that the House of Commons had thought it well, on the whole, to waive any controversy at the time and under the circumstances. I am quite ready, for my own part, to incur whatever disadvantage may arise from our decision. And I found myself distinctly and expressly on this one ground—that the House of Lords have sent us a Bill in which they have patriotically given up a great Privilege and power of their own; and it is the consideration of that conduct on the part of the House of Lords which I think renders it right for us to meet them with courtesy and conciliation, even although the act which we perform might in the minds of persons not thoroughly informed lead to the suspicion that we have not been so jealous of our Privileges as we ought to be. I have said we were very willing to follow the feeling of the House on the choice of those two courses, the difference between which does not touch the essence of this question. There is advantage, no doubt, in fixing at once the principle that a single Court of Appeal shall be established for the three kingdoms; but I feel the force of the observation that undoubtedly there is also some disadvantage in postponing the consideration of the intermediate appeals to a period different from that at which you are fixing the standard and tribunal of final appeal. The discussion we have heard has certainly gone far in my mind to show that we need not consider ourselves under any obligation of honour or courtesy to the House of Commons to persevere in the course we had proposed. Not only as to the speeches which have been made, and the authority of the speakers, but likewise the manner in which they have been received, justifies me, I think, in saying as much as that. I feel the general desire of the House is to place us in a position of perfect freedom, without reference to any supposed pledge either to my right hon. Friend, or to anyone else, to take the course which may seem on the whole to be the best. I will, therefore, with the permission of the House, act upon the suggestion of my right hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth, and will not, without an opportunity for further consultation with my Colleagues, proceed at this moment to announce any positive intention. At the same time, I think it is desirable at this period of the Session that we should make known our intention as early as possible, and, therefore, unless some unexpected difficulty arises, I will this evening and in the early part of to-morrow endeavour to ascertain their opinions on the matter; and I hope at the meeting of the House to-morrow, I may probably be in a position to state whether we think it requisite or not to proceed with that part of the measure. But I again assure the right hon. Gentleman opposite and those interested, especially either in the case of Ireland or of Scotland, that if we are released from any obligation to proceed at this moment with that portion of the Bill, we do not deem ourselves released from the obligation to give that just consideration to the claims of those two countries which we had intended to give if we had dealt with them this year. In any case we shall act on the suggestion of my right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock, and propose, not on the re-committal of the Bill—for it does not require re-committal—but on the Report, one or more of those Amendments which relate to the qualifications of those who should be chosen to become members of the Court of Final Appeal. With those observations I shall cease to trouble the House any further; but I hope to-morrow—probably when the House meets at 2 o'clock—to be in a position to announce whether we shall act on the suggestions that have been made.

MR. DISRAELI: I desire, Sir, to offer a few observations. I shall not offer them in opposition to any ruling you may have made when I was unfortunately absent, because I think my first duty is to obey your ruling in every respect. But I have heard enough since my return to the House, and also learnt enough of what was expressed when I was absent, to induce me to believe that I shall be acting entirely according to the Orders of the House and to your decision if I make some remarks on those which have preceded me. This, Sir, is a singular occasion. We are really acting in circumstances not easily paralleled in Parliamentary history, and it is of great importance on occasions like the present, that there should be clear conclusions arrived at by the House, whatever those conclusions may be, so that hereafter, when these cases are referred to as precedents, they may be referred to, so as to guide and not to confuse us. It has often occurred to me during the last fortnight, how extraordinary it is that, considering the circumstances in which this Bill for the reform of the judicature of the country was introduced to Parliament and the concurrence of sentiment in its favour among the most eminent men of both parties, we should have arrived nearly at the end of the Session, and only just terminated our labours in the Committee, leaving them, too, in a sort of provisional state; that we should have become embarrassed with so many difficulties, when it was expected that the measure would pass with such facility; and that such a question as a possibility of a collision between the two Houses should be raised; and that it should be rumoured on authority that the House of Lords might have to vindicate its Privileges in the conduct of a measure which came from the House of Lords itself, and was carried by that Assembly with so much unanimity—I say all this appears to me to constitute one of the most extraordinary situations that ever presented itself in Parliament. Sometimes we say—probably with some degree of rhetorical affectation of a measure we may be discussing, it is not a party question, while it is possible that beneath the surface of sentiment there may be some party animosity, and perhaps even some party manœuvres. But this I can say, as to the Bill for the reform of the judicature of the country, that none of these imputations can be made. It was brought forward by Her Majesty's Government in the other House; it was supported in the other House by the most eminent Leaders of the Opposition; it met with no resistance there; it elicited, I think, from the Leaders in both Houses—and certainly from the Leader of the other House—the acknowledgement that a generous support had been given to it. When the second reading was moved here, no opposition was offered. No doubt, when it got into Committee it provoked a considerable degree of criticism, which, having listened to with impartial attention, I thought was valuable and useful. But the greater part of that criticism emanated from the supporters of the Government, and I regret that many of the propositions made by them on those occasions were not adopted by the House. As far as the great principles of the measure are concerned, I am not aware that any difference of opinion was expressed in either House. The mature opinion of the country was in favour of the proposed reform of the judicature, and both Houses, generally felt it to be their duty to support the Government on the occasion. The country had adopted the two great principles that in that reform there should be a Court of Primary Decision, and a Court of Conclusive Appeal. There might have been a difference as to the means by which those principles should be carried into effect. For my own part, I never disguised my opinion that it would have been well to have proceeded on the old lines, and that you could have effected the required development of your judicature within the House of Lords. But the Government having considered the case and brought forward a measure founded on principles that we acknowledge, I, and others too, waived our opinions in regard to the means by which the object might be attained, and felt that it was our duty to support the Government. This was the opinion—I may say without reserve—of my noble and learned Friend, who has taken so active a part in the matter, and his view agreed with mine. I had long ago spoken with Lord Cairns on the subject, and he always thought that, if possible, we ought to proceed on the old lines; and we all know that last year he himself brought forward a proposition, by which a single Court of Appeal might be established in this country, and yet that it might be found within the precincts of the House of Lords. Lord Cairns, nevertheless, gave the present Bill his hearty and sincere support, and possibly but for that support the Bill might not have reached us with such facility as it did.

It is remarkable, under these circumstances, that such difficulties should occur. When the Bill was introduced two objections were urged against it, even by those who supported its principles. It was said—and, indeed, no one could deny it—that it did not furnish a Court of general and universal Appeal, and that it was to be regretted that two kingdoms of Her Majesty were not under the jurisdiction of the new tribunal. The second objection to the measure of the Government was, that the Court was so constructed that it lacked some of the vigour and authority which had been promised to the people of this country, and which they expected in the new tribunal, and which alone had brought them to consent to the abolition of the jurisdiction of the House of Lords. With these two objections urged against the measure, the House was yet still prepared to support the scheme of the Government. What then occurs? The Government resolved to meet the first great objection to the scheme—namely, that it did not establish a system of general and universal jurisdiction, that it did not regulate the affairs of the United Kingdom in the Appellate Court; and they proposed, by accepting the Motion made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock, to remove that difficulty, and to extend the Bill to Scotland and Ireland. But in so doing, it must be observed they increased and aggravated the objection that had been brought against the new tribunal as lacking in the vigour and authority that had been promised to the country, because it must be quite clear that in this amended Bill it was quite possible you might establish an Appellate Court as a substitute for the jurisdiction of the House of Lords, in which the affairs of an English suitor might be decided upon by Scotch and Irish and provincial and colonial Judges. With the utmost confidence that no person would be appointed a Judge who was not entitled to the respect, and, in a certain degree, to the confidence of the country, that cannot be candidly described as a fulfilment of the promise held out that the Court should be pre-eminent for its strength, its sagacity, and the high character and profound learning of its Members. In this state of affairs, notwithstanding the general feeling, we were resolved to carry the measure of the Government, and however I might have regretted some of the means by which they carried their principles into effect, and however I might have regretted that some of the Motions—most of them proposed by hon. Gentlemen opposite—to strengthen the new tribunal had failed, I thought, on the whole, it was our duty to support the measure. Well, what happened? Suddenly it was intimated to the House that the course proposed by Her Majesty's Government interfered with the Privileges of the House of Lords. It was described by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister as "a supposed Privilege," "purely visionary," and the announcement of it is described by him as "a challenge to the House of Commons." Now, it is of the utmost importance, after the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), and of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), and after the speech just addressed to us by the right hon. Gentleman, that there should be a clear conception what is the Privilege asserted by the House of Lords. Whatever course the Government may decide upon to-morrow, there ought, so as far as the House of Commons is concerned, to be a clear conception of the Privilege claimed, of the answer which this House has made by its most eminent representative, and of the position in which, in consequence of that answer, we are placed; otherwise we may find ourselves in a position of embarrassment, in a position of discomfiture and disaster, not merely, as I shall show, for this House, but even for the other House.

I understand the Privilege claimed by the House of Lords is this—that where their Privileges are concerned—and, of course, their jurisdiction, which is perhaps their highest privilege—no Bill can be brought in to alter or amend them unless it originates in the House of Lords, and that such a Bill cannot be altered in respect of those Privileges in the House of Commons. An hon. Gentleman who addressed us the other night, commenting on an observation or two I had made, said I had refrained from vindicating the Privilege claimed by the House of Lords. Well, I was not sent to the House of Commons to vindicate the Privileges of the House of Lords. In the first place, the case was not before us, nor is it before us now, except incidentally, after the speeches of hon. Gentlemen endorsed by the First Minister. I am sent here to support the Privileges of the House of Commons, and I am not in any way prepared to say that I am ready to admit the Privilege asserted by the House of Lords in this respect, and I find fault in the first instance with the right hon. Gentleman for taking a course which is practically a precipitate admission of the Privilege claimed by the House of Lords. No doubt, he declared the Privilege to be purely "visionary;" no doubt, he has indulged in very high language upon this assertion of Privilege; but his language, though we always listen to it with pleasure, will not practically have the slightest effect upon the question. The speeches of the right hon. Gentleman are not enrolled in our Journals. What will appear in our Journals will be extraordinary vicissitudes of conduct on the part of Her Majesty's Government and great caprice in the management of this House and when the matter is examined it will be discovered that all this has arisen from a certain mesmeric influence exercised by another House of Parliament. In short, when a few years have passed, the conduct of the Government will be quoted as evidence of the existence of this alleged Privilege of the House of Lords, and there will, under those circumstances, be great difficulty in proving that it is, as he now calls it, purely visionary. Although, however, I am not here to vindicate the Privileges of the House of Lords, if a Privilege is claimed by that House, and if the Leader of this House denies its existence and attempts to disprove its validity by precedents which do not apply, and by arguments which are fallacious, it is my duty to notice those statements, otherwise the House, under such leading, will find itself led into a quicksand. I cannot, therefore, allow this occasion, after all that has occurred, to pass without some comment on the statements of the right hon. Gentleman, and particularly after the observations made to-night by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford and the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock. It is necessary that the House should calmly consider this case, and not be hurried away into conclusions which, if they have no given to it. When the second reading was moved here, no opposition was offered. No doubt, when it got into Committee it provoked a considerable degree of criticism, which, having listened to with impartial attention, I thought was valuable and useful. But the greater part of that criticism emanated from the supporters of the Government, and I regret that many of the propositions made by them on those occasions were not adopted by the House. As far as the great principles of the measure are concerned, I am not aware that any difference of opinion was expressed in either House. The mature opinion of the country was in favour of the proposed reform of the judicature, and both Houses, generally felt it to be their duty to support the Government on the occasion. The country had adopted the two great principles that in that reform there should be a Court of Primary Decision, and a Court of Conclusive Appeal. There might have been a difference as to the means by which those principles should be carried into effect. For my own part, I never disguised my opinion that it would have been well to have proceeded on the old lines, and that you could have effected the required development of your judicature within the House of Lords. But the Government having considered the case and brought forward a measure founded on principles that we acknowledge, I, and others too, waived our opinions in regard to the means by which the object might be attained, and felt that it was our duty to support the Government. This was the opinion—I may say without reserve—of my noble and learned Friend, who has taken so active a part in the matter, and his view agreed with mine. I had long ago spoken with Lord Cairns on the subject, and he always thought that, if possible, we ought to proceed on the old lines; and we all know that last year he himself brought forward a proposition, by which a single Court of Appeal might be established in this country, and yet that it might be found within the precincts of the House of Lords. Lord Cairns, nevertheless, gave the present Bill his hearty and sincere support, and possibly but for that support the Bill might not have reached us with such facility as it did.

It is remarkable, under these circumstances, that such difficulties should occur. When the Bill was introduced two objections were urged against it, even by those who supported its principles. It was said—and, indeed, no one could deny it—that it did not furnish a Court of general and universal Appeal, and that it was to be regretted that two kingdoms of Her Majesty were not under the jurisdiction of the new tribunal. The second objection to the measure of the Government was, that the Court was so constructed that it lacked some of the vigour and authority which had been promised to the people of this country, and which they expected in the new tribunal, and which alone had brought them to consent to the abolition of the jurisdiction of the House of Lords. With these two objections urged against the measure, the House was yet still prepared to support the scheme of the Government. What then occurs? The Government resolved to meet the first great objection to the scheme—namely, that it did not establish a system of general and universal jurisdiction, that it did not regulate the affairs of the United Kingdom in the Appellate Court; and they proposed, by accepting the Motion made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock, to remove that difficulty, and to extend the Bill to Scotland and Ireland. But in so doing, it must be observed they increased and aggravated the objection that had been brought against the new tribunal as lacking in the vigour and authority that had been promised to the country, because it must be quite clear that in this amended Bill it was quite possible you might establish an Appellate Court as a substitute for the jurisdiction of the House of Lords, in which the affairs of an English suitor might be decided upon by Scotch and Irish and provincial and colonial Judges. With the utmost confidence that no person would be appointed a Judge who was not entitled to the respect, and, in a certain degree, to the confidence of the country, that cannot be candidly described as a fulfilment of the promise held out that the Court should be pre-eminent for its strength, its sagacity, and the high character and profound learning of its Members. In this state of affairs, notwithstanding the general feeling, we were resolved to carry the measure of jesty's Government for the mode in which they have acted. I say it was most indecorous and indiscreet in the Leader of the House of Commons to come forward and denounce the House of Lords, declaring that their alleged Privilege was entirely fallacious, and then yield to it without a struggle, leaving behind him a precedent which may be hereafter quoted in favour of a Privilege of the House of Lords which the House of Commons has never yet acknowledged.

Then, there is another class of precedents quoted by the right hon. Gentleman which might be described as cases in which the House of Lords had, either by initiating measures such as the Septennial Act, or by amending measures such as the two Reform Bills—that of Lord Grey and that of 1867, legislated so as to affect the constitution of the House of Commons. But these only show that the House of Commons either has not, or has never claimed the privilege in question. It is a complete error to assume that the Privileges of both Houses are the same. The Privileges of the two Houses are not and need not be identical. We have peculiar Privileges. Witness the catena of Privileges of the House of Commons as to Money Bills. The House of Lords have peculiar Privileges, and the passage in Blackstone which has been referred to is valuable in itself as a proof and an illustration of what in his time was the settled general opinion of legal and constitutional authority upon the question at issue. He limits it to the Peerage. It proves that in his time this Privilege was supposed to be peculiar to the House of Lords and not to the House of Commons. But it is upon this last class of measures, where it is supposed that the House of Lords have legislated so as to effect the Privileges of the House of Commons, the right hon. Gentleman has delivered an opinion of a character so strange and so dangerous—one which both sides of the House are so much interested in completely comprehending and guarding themselves against—that I must call particular attention to it. The right hon. Gentleman says that the House of Lords having hitherto dealt with Bills which affected the constitution of the House of Commons with impunity, if they again take that course we must ourselves assert a privilege of a similar character and defend ourselves against the House of Lords. Why, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman should know—must know—that it is totally impossible for either House of Parliament to set up a new Privilege. It is part of the Constitution of this country. The most solemn Resolution at which Parliament has ever arrived—arrived at by both Houses, recorded in our Journals so far back as the beginning of the 18th century, at a time when the Constitution of England may be said to have become settled—declared that it should not thenceforth be in the power of either House of Parliament to set up a new Privilege. Our predecessors knew the value of Privilege of Parliament. By Privilege they had established the Parliamentary Government of England and secured their rights and liberties; and they knew well that Privilege was a delicate and dangerous weapon, and therefore they resolved that the armoury should not be increased in that respect, and they arrived at that Resolution. It is upon our Journals, and is perhaps the most important Resolution on the Journals of the House of Commons. And yet we have the Leader of the House of Commons, in a moment of difficulty and danger, protecting the House from the assertion of a Privilege on the part of the House of Lords which, at least, is an ancient Privilege, and telling them that the only efficient mode in which they can guard themselves is to devise a new Privilege to vindicate their rights against the claims of the House of Lords. And this is the constitutional conduct of the Prime Minister of the country! I say with respect to this second group of cases that the House of Commons never asserted the Privilege in question, and no doubt, because the Privilege never existed.

Then there is another class of cases, such as the Temporalities Act, which suppressed some, and the Irish Church Act, which abolished all the Irish Bishoprics; and the right hon. Gentleman brings forward those precedents to show that we have a right to deal with the Privileges of the House of Lords. Now, what I would say generally is this—that in none of these Acts is there any interference with the Privileges or jurisdiction of the House of Peers. There are several things which the House of Commons may do. They may amalgamate two Sees or abolish one, in each case dealing with the number of the other House. It is also in the power of the House of Commons at all times to present an attainder of a Bishop. For example, we sent up an attainder against the Bishop of Rochester (Atterbury) but the Lords claimed no Privilege in that matter. They never supposed that in dealing with an individual, we were interfering with the rights of an order, and the attainder was passed. The House of Commons might even to-morrow abolish the office of Lord Chancellor, and deprive the House of Lords of their Speaker. It would be no interference with their Privileges and the Act would immediately be recognized. None of these Acts on the part of the House of Commons would be an interference with the status, power, or jurisdiction of the Lords Spiritual or Temporal. They would remain the same. I am not upholding the claim of Privilege now asserted for the House of Lords, and so far as I am concerned, I am not prepared to enter on that subject in the haphazard manner of the right hon. Gentleman, and without ample time for investigation. When the claim is made, I will not shrink from discussing it; but what I want to show to the House is this—that all the arguments and all the precedents urged against this claim of Privilege by the right hon. Gentleman are utterly void, that there is nothing in them, and that if the House of Commons in any possible struggle with the House of Lords depends upon those precedents and arguments, they will find themselves in a position of humiliation, of discomfiture, and disgrace.

I come now to the largest and most important group of these precedents, and they are precedents which refer to Scotland and Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman stated that the jurisdiction as to these two countries being given by statute is not like the English jurisdiction, which is customary, traditional, and inherent, and moreover, that these statutes, the statutes of Union, originated in the House of Commons.

Mr. GLADSTONE: If I should not be interrupting the right hon. Gentleman I would wish to explain. I am quoted quite correctly by the right hon. Gentleman. I certainly did treat the jurisdiction of the House of Lords with regard to English Appeals as traditional; but I was entirely wrong. It undoubtedly rests upon statutory foundation.

MR. DISRAELI: Well, there is a statute of Edward which remits and confirms the right of appeal in England to the House of Lords; that is a tolerably long time ago, and the subject is one of those moot points in archaeological polities into which I am not disposed now to enter. I believe the right hon. Gentleman never expressed himself with greater truth and felicity than when he said that the jurisdiction of the House of Lords in England was customary, traditional, and inherent. But I will deal with the modern circumstances upon which the right hon. Gentleman insisted with so much vigour, and which are peculiarly the subject of consideration at this moment, because the course of the right hon. Gentleman and his Government, which is not decided with regard to Scotland and Ireland, depends upon accurate information in this matter. The statement of the right hon. Gentleman, as I took it down at the time, was that the jurisdiction in regard to Scotland and Ireland being given by statute, was not like the English jurisdiction, which was traditional and inherent, and, moreover, that the statute of union originated in the House of Commons. Well, Sir, I entirely contest that statement of the right hon. Gentleman. I will first of all treat of Scotland. The union between England and Scotland was effected by Treaty. The Treaty was negotiated in a very peculiar manner—not by the Prerogative of the Crown, but by Commissioners appointed by the Parliaments of the two countries. During the negotiations considerable conferences were held upon all those points which were afterwards reduced to the form of a Treaty, and executed as a great public document. Among those subjects—subjects of grave importance, trade, taxation, and other matters—the judicature of the two countries was considered, and particularly the judicature of Scotland. The judicature of Scotland was respected and retained. The Privileges of the Peers of Scotland were acknowledged to be identical with the Privileges of the Peers of England. All the powers and Privileges which the Peers of England then exercised were to be exercised by the forms us to-day, in a very long epistle in the leading journal of the country, printed in those colossal proportions which indicate the importance of the writer, that this matter of bankruptcy is the one that entirely decides the question at issue at present. I do not know who is the writer, because style is deceptive, and if I raised the visor of this anonymous knight perhaps I should see only a mask, and on that mask might be perhaps written "Historicus."

Now, Sir, I have put before the House these facts for its consideration. I presume to say that questions of this kind are not to be carried by bluster and by the bravado of rhetoric. [A Laugh.] Yes, I repeat it, they are not to be carried by the bravado of rhetoric. Opinions, however adroitly or strongly expressed, are nothing when you come to questions of law and Privilege. Precedents which do not apply are always ultimately discovered to be what they are—essentially futile and deceptive. Upon real precedents we alone can rest. I have endeavoured to place before the House what really is the imputed claim of Privilege of the Lords. It is a very large claim—that no Bill affecting the Privilege of the other House shall be introduced into Parliament except in their own House, and when sent down to this House, it shall be susceptible of no change. That is a very large Privilege which I, whether sitting on this side of the House or on the other, would pause long before I should acknowledge. It has been acknowledged with dangerous, I will not say pusillanimous, precipitation, upon the present occasion. No one will deny that, as far as the House of Commons is concerned in relation to this alleged Privilege of the House of Lords, we do not stand as we did a month ago. The right hon. Gentleman has made admissions to-night and before to-night on this subject; and, whatever may be our ultimate decision, at least the ultimate decision of this matter in the Cabinet will be referred to hereafter as a precedent which supported this alleged Privilege. Nor can it be denied that the conduct of the House of Commons has been arrested and altered in this great matter of the reform of the judicature of England by the rumour of the existence of a Privilege of the House of Lords which the Government of England has acknowledged as valid. The precedents I have placed before the House refer to another branch of the subject. I give no opinion of my own; I am not called upon to give any opinion in regard to the Privileges of the House of Lords. If it fall to my lot to consider them, I will consider them with candour, and in the spirit of truth and justice, and a love for the Constitution. But when a Minister rises and inveighs against the alleged Privilege, and having showered upon you precedents and arguments to prove that the Privilege is entirely visionary, yet at the same time quite changes his conduct in consequence of the mere rumour of the assertion of the Privilege, it becomes my duty to show you that the precedents upon which he depends are utterly futile and vain; nay, more; that were you to proceed in the course which he recommended, as far as Scotland and Ireland are concerned, you might find yourself in a position which you cannot uphold, and even the Parliament of England might find itself in a false position. These are the remarks which I have to make, and I hope that I may receive, if not at the present moment, on some fit occasion an answer to them. I do not think that it is a fit answer to the statements I have made to be told that I have not brought forward a "rag of an argument." In the first place, that is not a polite expression when addressed by the right hon. Gentleman who leads the House of Commons to one who, with all his deficiencies, still, by the kind indulgence of his friends, occupies the position that I now do. But the observation, which is not polite under these circumstances, when it is followed up by the opinions of his own Law Officers that every remark I made deserved attention, and that every point which I put forward was matter for consideration, but that upon the whole they had only a choice of difficulties to select from, ceases to be discourteous and becomes absurd. I commend these remarks and these precedents to the House of Commons. No one can be more deeply interested in the House of Commons, in its honour, its Privileges, and its integrity than myself. When the House of Lords claims a Privilege which I believe to be constitutional and true I should be ashamed not to acknowledge it. But whatever course I may take, this is one

I will not pursue—I will not denounce the assertion of the Privilege by the House of Lords, and then yield to it.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE: We have just listened to two very remarkable speeches on the subject of Privilege, although, strictly speaking, the only question before the House is the appointment of a day for the consideration of the Report of the Bill which has just passed through Committee. I take leave to suggest that we shall get ourselves into great difficulty, if on an occasion like the present we proceed to discuss questions not before the House, whether they relate to the extension of the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal to Scotland or Ireland, or whether they relate to the Privileges of the House of Lords. Both the right hon. Gentleman opposite and the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, have assumed that the question of Privilege has been claimed by the House of Lords in a form which requires this House to take notice of it; but I take leave to say that the Question of Privilege has not been raised in the House of Lords in a way that this House either can or ought to notice it at present. It is not merely because a noble and learned Lord, however able and however eminent he may be, may question in the House of Lords upon grounds of Privilege the proceedings in this House—in a way, perhaps, that is somewhat out of order—that any such claim can properly be considered. The only mode in which such claim can properly be considered is when it comes before us in a tangible shape. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has justly observed that this is an unparalleled case in the history of the country, and what I wish to press upon the House is this, that until a claim for Privilege is actually made by either House and communicated to the other, it is impossible to come to any determination upon it. In that, and that way only, the matter may be discussed, and the question may be settled. We had, therefore, better wait until the day is appointed for considering the Bill on the Report, in order that we may have specifically before us any Motion which may be made either as to the propriety of extending the jurisdiction of the new Court to Scotland and Ireland, or as to the mode in which any supposed Privilege of the House of Lords may properly be dealt with. In saying this I beg to disclaim at the same time any intention of doing anything which may tend to maintain a difference between the two Houses of Parliament.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill, as amended, to be considered upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 237.]

TURNPIKE ACTS CONTINUANCE

BILL—[BILL 199.]

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Stanfeld.)

COMMITTEE. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [3rd July].

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to make provision for rendering compulsory in England and Wales the Highway Acts 1862 and 1864."—(Lord George Cavendish.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH said, that bearing in mind what had taken place the other evening on his Motion for an Instruction, and considering the pledge of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Local Government Board that the Government would be prepared to introduce a measure on the subject early next Session, he would not further press his Instruction. He did not wish to put hon. Members to inconvenience, and feeling that they could not have it all their own way in this world—and certainly not in this House—he would by permission of the House withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. COLLINS said, he was sorry the noble Lord had allowed himself to be frightened from his Resolution and Instruction by the persistence of a minority—he should have thought better of the noble Lord if he had exhibited the "courage of his opinions." He had himself given Notice to move that the House should go into Committee on the Bill on that day three months; but as the noble Lord had withdrawn his Instruction he should follow his example and withdraw his Notice.

Bill considered in Committee.

After long time spent therein,

Bill reported, as amended, to be considered this day, at Two of the clock,

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC
BILL—[BILL 171.]

(Mr. Chichester Fortescue, Mr. Childers, Mr. Arthur Peel.)

LORDS AMENDMENT.

Motion made, and Question,

"That this House doth not insist on its disagreement to the Amendment made by the Lords in page 11, line 3, and which Amendment was leave out (may also, if they think fit), and insert (shall)," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

To insert after the word "shall" in the said Lords Amendments, the words "in all proceedings before them under sections 5, 10, 11, and 12 of this Act, and may, if they think fit, in all other proceedings before them under this Act."—(Mr. Chichester Fortescue.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out the figure "10."—(Mr. Rathbone.)

Question put, "That the figure '10' stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

The House divided:—Ayes 88; Noes 14: Majority 74.

Words inserted.

CIVIL BILLS, &c., (IRELAND) [SALARIES]

[BILL 187.] COMMITTEE.

(Mr. Downing, Sir Colman O'Loughlen, Mr. Smith Barry, Mr. William Shaw.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of the Consolidated Fund, of any increase of Salaries provided for under any Act of the present Session to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to Civil Bills and Courts of Quarter Sessions in Ireland."—(Mr. Downing.)

Whereupon Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress,"—(Mr. Glyn.)—put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress."—(Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 21; Noes 26: Majority 5.

Original Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 18; Noes 28: Majority 10.

[No Report.]

SALMON FISHERIES BILL—[BILL 93.]

(*Mr. Dillwyn, Mr. William Lowther,
Mr. Asheton, Mr. Alexander Brown.*)

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration."

The House divided:—Ayes 39; Noes 7: Majority 32. Bill considered.

New Clause (Part of the Solway within limits of this Act,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

The House divided:—Ayes 13; Noes 30: Majority 17.

New Clause (Penalty on selling trout or char during close time,)—(Mr. Borrowing.)—added.

Amendments made.

Clause 19 (Amendment of "Salmon Fishery Acts, 1861 and 1865.")

Amendment proposed,

In page 8, line 32, after sub-section 3, to insert the words "The fifteenth section of 'The Salmon Fishery Act, 1861,' shall be construed as if the words '(except with rod and line, and otherwise in accordance with the provisions of the Salmon Fishery Acts, 1861 to 1873)' were inserted after the word 'destroy,' in the first sub-section, and after the word 'injure,' in the fourth sub-section of the First Part thereof, and as if the words 'otherwise taken' were added to the second sub-section after the word 'salmon.'"—(Mr. Walsh.)

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 10; Noes 29: Majority 19.

Other Amendments made.

Clause 37 (Power of conservators and water bailiffs).

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The House divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 5: Majority 25.

Other Amendments made.

Bill to be read the third time Tomorrow, at Two of the clock.

PENALTIES (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of The Marquess of HARTINGTON, Bill to amend the Law relating to Small Penalties in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by The Marquess of HARTINGTON and Mr. Secretary BRUCE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 239.]

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT (1872) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. SPENCER WALPOLE, Bill to amend so much of Section Four of "The Public Health Act, 1872," as relates to the Cambridge Commissioners, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SPENCER WALPOLE, Mr. BERESFORD HORN, Sir ROBERT TORRENS, and Mr. WILLIAM FOWLER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 238.]

And the other Orders of the Day, 40 in number, having been disposed of—

House adjourned at Four o'clock in the morning.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 15th July, 1873.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament— The Earl De La Warr, after the death of his brother; The Lord Stourton, after the death of his father; The Lord Manners, after the death of his father.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading— Public Works Loan Commissioners (School and Sanitary Loans)* (193); Militia (Service, &c.) (206). Committees—Report—Gas and Water Works Facilities Act, 1870, Amendment (201); Public Schools (Eton College Property)* (204).

Report— Law Agents (Scotland) (207-213).

Third Reading— Blackwater Bridge (Composition of Debt)* (199); Colonial Church* (208); Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 6)* (157), and passed.

CHURCH ASSOCIATION—CONFESSION
IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, he desired to offer a personal explanation to their Lordships on a matter that had arisen out of the debate of last night, that the Question on his Motion was put so quickly that he had no opportunity of replying to the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Winchester) who charged him with making a tissue of mistakes. With every respect for the right rev. Prelate, he must deny having done so. What he stated with reference to Mr. Maguire was, not that Mr. Maguire had been licensed by two successive Bishops of London to deliver lectures in his church—which he, of course, knew to be unnecessary—but that he delivered the lectures with their sanction. The two Prelates referred to were present last night, and did not contradict this statement, and he believed it to be correct. He stated also, not that the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Winchester) inhibited Mr. Maguire, but that he forbade Mr. Curling to allow Mr. Maguire to deliver these Protestant lectures in St. Saviour's Church. He (Lord Oranmore and Browne) believed this also was entirely correct, and he hoped the right rev. Prelate would allow his official communications and the correspondence to be published, that the public might judge what had really occurred.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER: My Lords, I do not apprehend that in what the noble Lord has just stated there is the slightest contradiction to what I said yesterday. I found fault with the noble Lord's assertion that I had inhibited a gentleman who wanted to deliver certain lectures in my diocese. I stated that, being applied to by one of the churchwardens on behalf of the other of the two vicars, I told the vicar who had given the permission that he must not allow those controversial lectures to be delivered in that church. I accompanied that intimation with a statement that I acted from no sort of difference as to the nature of the lectures or from disapprobation of them, but invited him, as there was a public hall not far off suitable for such occasions, to deliver them in another place in the diocese. When, therefore, this was invidiously cited, after the lapse of a year, to represent that I had some dislike to anti-Roman lectures being delivered in my diocese, it was a mis-statement not of a very ordinary character, and I think I was justified in characterizing the statement as a tissue of mistakes. I repeat that the ground of my action was an ecclesiastical objection which had nothing whatever to do with the nature of the lectures. That a gentleman of another diocese, against the will of one of two vicars, and against the will of the laity as represented by the churchwardens, should come and deliver lectures in a church without my permission, is contrary to ecclesiastical régime, and as such I prohibited it, and would prohibit it again to-morrow. The noble Lord wants me to publish correspondence with my clergy. Now, I never will correspond with a clergyman in my diocese who is corresponding with me in order to send the letters to the newspapers. There would be an end to all the very useful power possessed by a Bishop in his diocese if he once allowed it. The intercourse between me and my clergy is confidential and affectionate—filial on the one side, fatherly on the other. If letters written in that spirit are at any moment of irritation to be thrown into what are called the "religious newspapers," and the world be brought in to criticize every single word of them, there must be an end to all that open, kindly, free correspondence upon which a Bishop's influence for good depends. I therefore—not in this instance only, but in every instance—refuse to communicate, except through my secretary, with any gentleman whose appetite for print is of that voracious character that he writes letters in order to publish them in the newspapers, and I refuse to break my rule in this instance. I have to complain of the noble Lord for saying it was some tendency towards Roman doctrines that had led me to act. That is a most serious charge—as serious an imputation as to charge an officer in the Army with disloyalty to his Queen. I hate and abhor the attempt to Romanize the Church of England, and I will never hear anyone make such a charge without telling him to his face that he is guilty of gross misrepresentation; especially when such charges come from one who has been endeavouring to his utmost in Ireland to get the Prayer Book of the Church of England altered in order to make it suit his views.

LAW AGENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.
(The Lord Chancellor.)
(No. 207.) REPORT.

Amendment reprinted (according to Order).

LORD COLONSAY said, he would again bring forward the clause which their Lordships had negatived in Committee by a small majority. He thought the question was of much importance, because by the provisions of the Bill, the Writers to the Signet who had had the right to practise in the Superior Courts of Scotland at least since 1532, and who by that position were entitled to practice as law agents, were required, if they desired to be enrolled as law agents, to submit to the same examination, both as to their knowledge of the law and their general knowledge, as was required from persons of inferior position. He thought this requirement degrading to a class of gentlemen of such high standing, and that it tended to degrade the requirements demanded of the Writers to the Signet to the level of those required from the law agents. The Bill, as he understood it, was intended to open the practice of law in the Courts to a larger class of persons who had not hitherto enjoyed the privilege, and he could not at all see why it should give this advantage with one hand and with the other take away the right which had been possessed for over 300 years by a numerous and highly trained body of legal practitioners.

The Bishop of Winchester

Amendment moved to insert after clause 40 the following new clause:—

"Every person who shall hereafter be admitted a member of the Society of Writers to the Signet shall be enrolled as a law agent by the registrar on producing a certificate of his admission by an officer authorised by the Society to grant such certificate."—(The Lord Colonsay.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he must continue his opposition to the clause. The question was not whether the Society of Writers to the Signet should continue to exist and retain a special connection with the administration of justice in Scotland, but whether they should retain certain special privileges in regard to the right to grant admission to practise as law agents under a Bill which proposed in the case of other bodies of men to abolish similar rights and privileges. He thought upon general principles that it was not expedient, when they were endeavouring to establish a uniform system of admission for the whole country, to go on, and retain the concurrent privileges of an independent body, however respectable that body might be. Since the matter was last before their Lordships, he had received several representations from other legal bodies in Scotland, to the effect that they should be very much dissatisfied if, when other ancient rights and privileges of this kind were abolished, those of the Writers to the Signet were retained. He very much doubted whether the result predicted by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Colonsay) would result from the operation of the Bill, even if, for the purpose of admission to practise as law agents, Writers to the Signet might be able to qualify themselves by a less difficult examination than they had already passed for that position. He thought it more probable that a just emulation would induce many law agents to attempt to pass the higher examination of the Society of Writers to the Signet, rather than lower the latter to the level of the minimum required for admission to practise.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERRY said; that if it was proposed to level at all it should be by levelling up instead of levelling down. They would not reform their legal system by sweeping away the best part of it. He should support the clause moved by the noble and learned Lord.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 60; Not-Contents 40; Majority 20.

Resolved in the Affirmative; and Clause inserted in the Bill.

Then, on the Motion of the Duke of RICHMOND, new clause added giving the same right to the members of the Society of Solicitors in the Supreme Court.

Further Amendments made.

Bill to be read 3rd on Thursday next; and to be printed as amended. (No. 213.)

GAS AND WATER FACILITIES ACT
(1870) AMENDMENT BILL. (No. 201.)

(The Earl Cowper.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

LORD REDESDALE said, that the object of this Bill was not to make good any genuine losses which might have been incurred on account of unforeseen circumstances, but to meet circumstances to which every trading company was exposed, and its practical effect would be to fix a minimum dividend of 5 per cent. This was a dangerous principle to introduce into legislation with regard to public companies, and he felt bound to caution their Lordships respecting it. He thought that an Amendment should be introduced into some of the clauses which would confine the operation of the Bill to genuine unforeseen losses. With that object in view, he would move in Clause 7, page 2, line 25, after ("where"), to leave out ("with a view to prevent undue loss"), and insert ("upon proof given that notwithstanding the exercise of careful economy in the manufacture of gas loss must arise.") Should that Amendment be accepted, he would further move in lines 26 and 27, to leave out ("or to the prevention of undue accumulation of profits by undertakers"); in line 38, after ("Act"), insert ("such addition being in the opinion of the Board necessary to prevent loss"); and in page 3, lines 1 and 5, to leave out ("five"), and insert ("two").

EARL COWPER said, he did not consider such an Amendment as this necessary. He thought it would not be fair to make companies manufacture gas at reduced profits when the causes of such reduction were no fault of theirs. The proposition was that dividends should be sustained at 5 per cent. Considering that the usual dividend among the shareholders of gas companies was 10 per cent, he did not think this too much of a concession. The public would suffer great inconvenience if these companies, owing to the increased price of materials, suspended operations.

LORD REDESDALE explained that what he objected to was the principle involved.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY would like to extract through the Confessional or otherwise the noble Lord's idea of a shareholder. He appeared to think that the last farthing should be wrung from him, and that he should be allowed no profit. It was only fair that when gas companies had been obliged to give the public the benefit of profits exceeding a certain sum they should be allowed a fair profit when prices altered.

House in Committee accordingly.

Bill reported without Amendment; to be read 3rd on Thursday next.

MILITIA (SERVICE, &c.) BILL.

(The Marquess of Lansdowne.)

(NO. 206.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time said, its object was to extend the term of service in the Militia from five years to six. The Committee last year on clothing had, in the first place recommended this as a more economical period. The contemplated arrangements for stoppages, which would be applied to the Militia again made it desirable to adopt a plan which would slightly diminish the cost to the public. Six years, moreover, was the normal term of service in the Regular Army. The Bill substituted one form of oath for the various forms of oath now required to be taken in the different parts of the United Kingdom; and provided that where local circumstances rendered it convenient that Militia recruits should be trained with Line soldiers they should, for the purposes of discipline, be under the command of the officers of the Line regiment and should be tried by them in Court martials. The Bill likewise repealed a stipulation in an Act of George III. forbidding the adjutant and permanent staff of the Militia to absent themselves from the place where the arms or stores were kept. Now that the county organization had been abolished, this restriction was undesirable. The fifth clause provided that when a commanding officer was on leave the command devolved on his second in command in accordance with the usual custom of the service. At present the Queen had to sign a warrant in each case. The eighth clause entitled a borough which had contributed to a county Militia armoury to a share of the purchase money. These were the principal provisions of the Bill, which he would be glad to explain further if necessary.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>."
—(The Marquess of Lansdowne.)

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH asked whether the Militia bounty would be altered. He thought six years a more convenient term, but doubted whether the disgraceful rubbish now issued to the Militia in the way of clothing would hold together for that time.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, this measure might be for the good of the Militia force, but he rather doubted it. The Bill had only been delivered that morning, and he suggested that the Committee should be fixed at a distant date, in order that the Bill might be fairly considered by those noble Lords who took an interest in the question, which was of some importance. He did not think the proposal to place Militia recruits when out for training under the command of officers of the Line, instead of their own officers, would have a good effect. His own idea was that if Militia were to be well drilled, they must be trained by their own officers. There were one or two curious clauses in the Bill. Clause 5, for instance, provided that—"when the commanding officer of any regiment of militia is absent on leave, the command of such regiment shall devolve on the officer next in rank who may, for the time being, be present with such regiment, and be capable of assuming the command."

He thought every officer of Militia was capable of assuming command if he had passed through drill, unless there were others senior to him, in which case they would be preferred. With regard to the alteration of the period of service, he had no objection to it; only he thought the same principle should be applied to the Regular Army.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE disclaimed any intention on the part of the War Department to cast even the slightest reflection upon the value of the Militia as a force; nor did the Bill in any way ignore its just claims. As to clothing, the Department had the best hopes as to the result of the new arrangement, which was made in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee on Clothing. As to the command of Militia recruits, where a small body of Militia might, for convenience sake, train with a Line regiment, Line as well as Militia officers were to have the power of enforcing discipline. That, he thought, was at once a simple and necessary arrangement. Clause 5 was not intended to make any change with regard to the present devolution of the command, and as to the word "capable" it was not difficult to conceive cases where the commanding officer being absent his second in command might, from physical causes perhaps be "incapable" of replacing him.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>o</sup> accordingly and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday, the 24th instant.

ARMY—MEDICAL OFFICERS OF THE ARMY—ROYAL WARRANT, 1858. MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

EARL DE LA WARR rose to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to take into her consideration the present position as regards rank and pay of the medical officers of the Army who volunteered and served on the West Coast of Africa between the years 1859 and 1867, in order that they may receive the benefit of the Royal warrant, signed the 1st of October 1858, of which they have hitherto been deprived. The noble Earl said, that towards the close of the year 1867 the Medical Regulations of the Army were promulgated, containing a portion of a Royal Warrant, dated October, 1858, which stated—

The Marquess of Lansdowne

"Each medical officer volunteering for the West Coast of Africa will be required to serve there continuously for a period of twelve months; every such year of service on the Coast to count as two years for promotion and retirement."

On the faith of this Warrant many medical officers volunteered for service in this unhealthy climate, believing, as one of them wrote, "that the double service would count towards the rank of Surgeon-Major." After some time, however, another Warrant was issued, stating, as before, that each year of such service should be allowed to reckon double for promotion and retirement; adding, however, these words, "but shall not so reckon towards increased pay;" and another later Warrant added, "or qualify for the rank of Surgeon-Major." Neither of these qualifications appeared in the first Warrant, under which 76 medical officers had volunteered their services upon the West Coast. Of those gentlemen a large number had died, others were invalided, others had retired from the service, and there now remained about 30, whose cases were, as he submitted, a hard one. It might be objected on the part of men of older standing that these 30 medical officers should not be promoted over their heads. It was still harder, however, that the 30 should have served for seven years under the impression that their service would count as double, and should then be told that it would count neither for pay nor promotion. He was quite content to leave this subject in the hands of Her Majesty's Government with the assurance that it would receive a fair consideration.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to take into her consideration the present position as regards rank and pay of the medical officers of the Army who volunteered and served on the West Coast of Africa between the years 1858 and 1867, in order that they may receive the benefit of the Royal Warrant signed the 1st of October 1858, of which they have hitherto been deprived.—(The Earl De La Warr.)

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, that promotion was transfer from one grade to another grade. A surgeon becoming a surgeon-major was not so transferred. The Royal Warrant of the 1st of October, 1858, regulating the grades of Medical Officers in the Army, ordered that those grades should be four—namely, 1st, the Inspector-General of Hospitals; 2nd, the Deputy-Inspector-General of Hospitals; 3rd, the staff or regimental Surgeon, who, after 20 years' full-pay service in any rank shall be styled Surgeon-Major; and 4th, the staff or regimental Surgeon, the attainment of the style of surgeon-major was therefore not promotion within the meaning of the words in question, and he contended that these officers had received all to which they were entitled by the Royal Warrant of 1858. This case had been brought forward in Parliament more than once; and he believed the interpretation which he now put on the Royal Warrant had never been seriously contended to be a wrong one. Under these circumstances, he hoped the noble Earl would not persist in his Motion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

SPAIN — CONVEYANCE OF CHINESE COOLIES INTO CUBA.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE asked, Whether any representations have been made by Her Majesty's Government to the Government of Spain with respect to the importation of Coolies from China into Cuba; or whether any communications on the subject have been received from Her Majesty's Consuls in Cuba since the receipt of Consul Dunlop's despatch of 24th December 1872 presented in pursuance of Commons' Address June 16, 1873. Their Lordships might be aware that a Paper containing the Correspondence relating to the treatment of Chinese Coolies at Macao and during their passage to Cuba and after their arrival there, had been recently presented to Parliament pursuant to an Address of the other House on the 16th June last. This Correspondence contained such a fearful narrative of the horrors of the Chinese Coolie traffic that he was desirous of bringing it under their Lordships' Notice, and of commanding it to the immediate attention of Her Majesty's Government. On the 9th of November, 1872, the Earl of Kimberley wrote to Sir Arthur Kennedy the Governor of Hong Kong as follows:—

"It has at different times been represented to me that foreign vessels engaged in the shipment of coolies from Macao are equipped in the port of Hong Kong, or furnished with supplies or stores from that Colony, and my attention has recently been directed to the following paragraph extracted from a Hong Kong newspaper:—

'The Spanish steamer 'Bueno Ventura,' a sister to, and belonging to the same owner as the steamship 'Yuruc Bat,' which vessel fitted up here and left a few days back for Macao, for a cargo of coolies, has arrived here to fit up for the same purpose.'

"2. You are probably aware that during the late Session of Parliament an Act (three copies of which I inclose) was passed for the purpose of repressing the abuses connected with the movement of natives from their islands in the Pacific Ocean to labour on plantations.

"3. Although great cruelties have been perpetrated in connection with this traffic in South Sea islanders, they can hardly have been greater than those which have led to the disgraceful and horrible occurrences from time to time reported as having taken place on board ships conveying Chinese coolies from Macao.

"4. Her Majesty's Government, which has been under the necessity of making repeated remonstrances to the Portuguese Government on the subject of the Macao coolie trade, cannot permit that there should be even the shadow of a justification for any such imputation as that British subjects in Hong Kong partake in, and profit by, a traffic which the Queen's Government deplored and protests against. And I see no reason why British subjects resident in Hong Kong should not as well as those in Australasia be subjected to the punishment prescribed in Section 9 of the 'Kidnapping Act, 1872,' for the offences specified in that section, if committed within the territorial jurisdiction of the Colony.

"5. I request you to give particular attention to the 'Kidnapping Act, 1872,' and to consider whether some of its provisions might not with the necessary alterations be made applicable to Hong Kong. If you are of opinion that they might be, I request you to transmit to me, as soon as possible, the draft of an Ordinance for that purpose."—[Correspondence C.—797. p. 1.]

On the 2nd of November, 1872, Mr. Wade wrote from Peking to Earl Granville to say that—

"The Chinese Government is doing something to stop the slave trade at Macao, but, as usual, its action for good is greatly hindered by its incurable corruptions."

Consul Dunlop, writing to Earl Granville from Havannah on the 24th of December, 1872, said, that—"It would appear from this evidence that the 'Fatchoy' is really engaged in slave trading, with the knowledge and concurrence of her German owners at Hong Kong. The Chinese, on arrival here, are immediately 'contracted,' or sold to the planters, and are as much 'slaves' as the negro bondmen throughout Cuba. This will be their real condition so long as negro slavery, in any shape, exists here."

The following extract appeared in an American newspaper:—

"Chinese labourers continue to arrive. The steamer 'Fatchoy' brought over 900 of this unfortunate people, and official notice has been published of the expected arrival of the 'Irurac Bat' with the same number. Other vessels now in China are engaged in the same traffic, which yields an immense profit to shipowners and all engaged in it. A passenger of the 'Fatchoy' has informed your correspondent that the vessel went from point to point kidnapping Chinese: others were inveigled on board by speculators or 'vagabonds,' as they are called there, who received 30 dollars for each one of their victims. As soon as they arrive on board they are stowed away below in irons until the full complement was received, which was ten times the number the capacity of the vessel allowed. The horrors of the traffic and the voyage of the 'Fatchoy' can easily be imagined. Three mutinies and an attempt to burn the steamer took place during the voyage. The crew and all hands on such occasions fired into the Chinese and adopted other severe measures, such as hard knocks and scalding water, until the tumults were quelled. The loss on the voyage of the 'Fatchoy' on this account and deaths from sickness and suffering was over eighty Chinese."—[p. 3.]

The following declaration was made by one of the men employed in the engine-room on board the Fatchoy:—

"The steamer 'Fatchoy,' formerly 'Vixen' (British), was sold at Hong Kong in July 1872, and placed under the German flag. The purchasers, Messrs. Paul Ebler and Co., had her then put under the Spanish flag by nominal transfer to a Spaniard. She was then fitted out at Hong Kong with iron grating on the hatches, and round the hatches, and in the between decks, and at the side ports, iron barricades were also fitted out in deck. After this work had been done, she took in water and coal and proceeded, on the 1st of last August, to Macao. On or about the 15th of August she commenced loading coolies; they were sent off in lots, three times a week, generally on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, sometimes from 40 to 100 in a lot, but seldom above 50. The coolies are never considered to be finally secured until they are once on board, then their case becomes one of desolation and despair. While 'Fatchoy' was lying at Macao, the steamer 'Roseta d'Nina,' which had been dispatched some six weeks previously, returned to Macao in distress, and her cargo of 700 coolies was transferred to the 'Fatchoy'; these coolies were in a sad state, many of them had been cruelly flogged and otherwise ill-used on board the 'Roseta d'Nina.' With this large accession, the cargo was soon completed to the number of 1,000 coolies. Every one of these men gave indications that the vilest deception had been practised upon them, and once having 'realized' the utter hopelessness of their situation, gave themselves up to frantic despair. Some would throw themselves overboard whenever an opportunity offered, but two boats were constantly alongside to pick them up and return them on board. The price paid the 'coolie-catchers,' as they are called, is 50 dollars per head (delivered at the barracoons), but the amount is not paid over until the coolie is on board ship. Thus the 'catcher' or 'kidnapper,' insures the delivery of the coolie, although he is sent off in the ship's boats. The 'Fatchoy' left Macao on the 26th August, with the 1,000 coolies on board; all went well until the fourth day out. On this day, at about 3 P.M., a cry of 'Mutiny forward' was raised. The coolies had attacked the guards; one of the guards went overboard, probably thrown over by the coolies; the other guard took to the rigging. The coolies had made a rush to the Chinese 'galley' (for cooking), probably to try to get knives or weapons. The mate and second mate, from the bridge, shot into the crowd and wounded three of the coolies. This checked the mutiny. The officers then rallied, and succeeded in catching a number of the coolies and tying them by their long hair to the iron 'barricade,' or to the iron gratings, and driving the rest below. About 150 were put in irons. The next morning the Spanish captain had them brought up. Some bags of rice were placed on deck and the prisoners were laid across the bags, then unmercifully flogged and beaten by two men keeping time with their whips or sticks. In a short time the deck was covered with blood. As each coolie was flogged, he was washed with salt and water and sent below. We arrived at Anger, Batavia, on the 9th September, remained there two days, and thence proceeded to the Mauritius, and there took in water and coal, the ship remaining in quarantine. From the Mauritius we went to the Cape of Good Hope. In all these ports the coolies were kept below; and while coaling was going on, the hatchets were put on, and the 'hospital' bulkheads for the sick were closed. The heat was intolerable even in the open air. The voyage for the coolies was one of the most unimaginable sufferings: they were struck, kicked, flogged, and otherwise treated with the greatest brutality. The filth and stench was something horrible. The hospitals were not cleaned during the whole voyage. I often turned away my eyes when I witnessed such dreadful scenes. I venture to say that in the annals of the African Slave Trade all the horrors of the 'middle passage' never surpassed those of this China slave-ship. The deaths on this direful and murderous voyage reached eighty, or about 8 per cent. of the number taken on board at Macao. Their deaths were, doubtless, caused by the blows they received, by general ill-usage, and by the filthy condition of the ship."—[p. 3.]

Governor Sir Arthur Kennedy, in writing to the Earl of Kimberley from Hong Kong on the 25th of April, 1873, said, that that statement was "fully corroborated by sworn testimony in the colony." He thought that the importance of this subject would be his excuse for having troubled the House with this statement, and he trusted that Her Majesty's Government would address a strong representation with reference to the matter to the Spanish Government.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the noble Earl need not make any apology for having brought this subject under the notice of the House. It was impossible to pretend that there was the least exaggeration in the statement the noble Earl had made with regard to the treatment of the Coolies in their passage from China to Cuba. Strong representations on the subject had been made last year to the Spanish Government, but without success, the Spanish Minister having declared that in the then state of Cuba it was impossible for any effective steps to be taken to put a stop to the evil. Owing to the state of affairs in Spain those representations had not been renewed during the present year. The Spanish Government, however, had shown considerable anxiety to put an end to slavery in Cuba, and Mr. Layard who had been entrusted with the management of the subject had displayed the greatest firmness and judgment. No further report had, he might add, been received on the subject.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, to Thursday next,
Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 15th July, 1873.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Langbaugh Coroners* [242].
First Reading—Statute Law Revision* [240].
Second Reading—Ecclesiastical Commissioners* [235].

Committee—Rating (Liability and Value) (re-comm.) [205]—R.P.

Committee—Report—(£1,600,000) Exchequer Bonds* [230]; Treasury Chest Fund* [233]; Infanticide Law Amendment* [42-241].

Considered as amended—Turnpike Acts Continuance, &c.* [199]; Revising Barristers* [221].

Third Reading—Military Manceuvres* [215]; Medical Act Amendment (University of London)* [224]; Salmon Fisheries* [193], and passed.

Withdrawn—Civil Bills, &c. (Ireland)* [187].

The House met at Two of the clock.

METROPOLIS—NEW COURTS OF JUSTICE—THE REVISED DESIGNS.

QUESTIONS.

MR. WAIT asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the revised designs and plans prepared by Mr. Street for the New Courts of Justice have been received and approved; and, whether he anticipates being in a position to announce to the House before the close of the Session that the contract has been signed and the building handed over to the architect?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, said, that the Treasury had approved of the contract being entered into to carry out the revised designs and plans proposed by Mr. Street for the New Courts of Justice; but he was not prepared to state the exact time when the contract would be signed. He was not able to fix the day when the building would be handed over to the contractor, and still less was he able to fix the day when the Session would be brought to a close; so that he could not say whether he should be able to state before the close of the Session that the building had been handed over to the contractor. The best opinion, however, that he could form was that the contract would be signed in about a month from this day. It took a long time to complete a contract for very elaborate specifications.

MR. WAIT said, he wished to know whether there would be any objection to place the plans and designs in the Library of the House?

MR. AYRTON said, the subject would be brought, again under the consideration of the House when the Estimate was moved; and, in the meantime, he would consider the suggestion of the hon. Member, with a view to see what could be done.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE BILL—SCOTCH AND IRISH APPEALS.

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise, Sir, for the purpose of answering a Question put to me last night by my right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), and by other hon. Members, with regard to the course the Government propose to take with reference to the Supreme Court of Judicature Bill. I have to say that it is not our intention to move the re-committal of the Bill in order to insert the clauses relating to Scotland and Ireland. The motive I will not state in detail. It is a very simple one and—though this is a sort of matter to which I am not accustomed to refer—was stated in very few words and very fairly in a leading article in one of the public journals this morning—namely, that it was better to have the greater certainty of an imperfect Bill than to run extended risks for the sake of a better and more complete Bill. I may say, with respect to that apprehension, I do not refer solely, or indeed principally, to the risks which the Bill might run in the House of Lords. These risks I am not well able to appreciate. They might exist or they might not; but what I do refer to is this: it is quite evident, from the declarations of opinion we have already heard in this House, that if the re-commitment were proposed, it would be the subject of serious and probably lengthened debates, which, quite irrespectively of what the House of Lords might or might not do, would, I am afraid, on the question of time, be fatal to the Bill during the present Session. From these prudential motives we have thought it our duty to abandon our intention of re-committing the Bill.

Mr. Wait

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS— VALUATION BILL—QUESTIONS.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS inquired what course would be taken with respect to this Bill?

MR. STANSFIELD, in reply, said, that he had placed upon the Paper Amendments in reference to several of the clauses of the Bill, so as to enable the Rating (Liability and Value) Bill to come into operation, without reference to the Valuation Bill, and which he would move on the Report. He could not state to the House at that moment that it would not be possible to pass the Valuation Bill, because he did not recognize any serious objection to the Bill in the Amendments on the Paper. One of the Amendments had regard to the importation of the provisions with respect to the Surveyor of Taxes into the Rating Bill. He had no doubt in his own mind that there was sufficient justification for this proposal, and that he should be able to satisfy the House that this conclusion was a right one. He was not disposed at that moment to give up all hopes of proceeding with the Valuation Bill this Session; but still he had thought it prudent to place upon the Paper Amendments that would make the Rating Bill a perfect Act in itself, without any reference to the Valuation Bill.

In reply, to Mr. VANCE,

MR. STANSFIELD said, the valuation and rating of Government hereditaments in Scotland and Ireland was otherwise provided for. Suggestions were made that they should extend principles contained in other parts of the measure to Scotland and Ireland—such, for instance, as the repeal of certain exemptions from rateability, and the conclusion at which the Government arrived was, that, considering the lateness of the period of the Session which they had reached, it would not be prudent so to widen the scope of this Bill; but they expressed the opinion that the same principles ought to be applied to the rateability of property in Ireland and Scotland as those they had applied to the rateability of property in England; and it would be the duty of the Government at the beginning of the next Session to deal with these subject-matters in separate Bills.

LOD JOHN MANNERS said, he understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he would import the provisions with respect to the Surveyor of Taxes from the Valuation Bill into the Rating Bill, and at the same time keep the Valuation Bill on the Paper. But would it not be far more convenient if the right hon. Gentleman were to be content with the importation of the necessary clauses of the one Bill into the other, and to move that the Valuation Bill be taken off the Paper?

MR. STANSFELD explained that it was in the view of the Valuation Bill not being carried that it was necessary to take care the clauses to which he had referred should be imported into the Rating Bill; but these clauses did not relate to the Surveyor of Taxes. He expected shortly to be able to state whether they would proceed with the Valuation Bill this Session.

REGISTRATION OF BIRTHS AND DEATHS BILL—QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. F. S. POWELL,

MR. STANSFELD said, that taking all things into consideration, the Government could hardly hope to proceed with this Bill during the present Session.

RATING (LIABILITY AND VALUE) BILL—[BILL 205.]

(*Mr. Stansfeld, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Goschen,
Mr. Hibbert.*)

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

MR. CRAUFURD rose to a point of Order. He understood that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board was about to import into this Bill certain clauses which stood on the Notice Paper and would more properly form part of the Valuation Bill. But these clauses appeared to him to be such as could only be introduced in Committee. He should like to know whether it was competent for the right hon. Gentleman to move those clauses on the Report?

MR. SPEAKER: If the clauses to be proposed by the right hon. Gentleman impose any new charge they must be moved in Committee of the Whole House. But perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will think fit to explain the objects of his new clauses, and to state how far they affect the rating of property to which they apply.

MR. STANSFELD said, that upon the best advice which he had been able to obtain, he was satisfied that in bringing these Amendments forward upon Report he would be acting in accordance with the Rules of the House. The House would remember that during the passing of the Bill through Committee certain Amendments were moved with regard to the rating of plantations and woods; and he was desirous to obtain the general view of the Committee upon this particular question. The Government listened to the suggestions which were made on both sides of the House, and they came to the conclusion that they would accept the Amendments; but they also determined to put them into a practicable shape. The House must be perfectly aware that they could not accept suggestions made during the progress of the discussion in Committee without reserving the right, and indeed the duty, of correcting the method of their legal expression. It was to the method of their expression as a matter of drafting that his Amendments were confined, though it was perfectly true they were in the shape of two new clauses. He proposed to omit the proviso moved by the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), at the end of Clause 3, and also to omit Clause 19, and to move instead two new clauses. The new clauses did not impose any new charge; they merely carried out in a legal form the decision already arrived at as to the method of assessing the value of rateable property.

MR. CRAUFURD again appealed to the Speaker. It was admitted that the clauses were new, and he must ask whether it was not a case which trench'd so closely upon the Rules that, as a matter of Order, the Bill should be re-committed for the consideration of these clauses.

MR. SPEAKER: If the new clauses proposed by the right hon. Gentleman involve any new charges such as were not embraced by the clauses agreed to by the Committee, undoubtedly it would be out of Order to proceed with such clauses in the House; they must be dealt with by the Committee of the House. If I apprehend correctly the observations of the right hon. Gentleman, these are not new charges. If that is so, it is competent for the House to deal with them without referring them to a Committee of the Whole House. Of course, it would be open to the House, if it thought proper, to take this course—to proceed with the Bill as it stands; and if, upon further consideration of the clauses, it is found that they involve a violation of the Rules of the House, undoubtedly the Bill must be re-committed in respect of such clauses.

MR. CRAUFURD said, the right hon. Gentleman had stated that the new clauses would not impose any new charge. He wished to know how and in what manner that question was to be determined?

MR. T. HUGHES said, that perhaps the hon. and learned Member could tell the House in what respects the clauses were out of Order.

MR. STANSFIELD suggested that the hon. and learned Member could do so when they came to discuss the clauses, and then it could be decided whether he made out his case. He moved that the Bill be now considered.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration."

MR. GRAHAM desired to say a few words in explanation of certain Amendments to this Bill as regarded Scotland, which he had placed on the Paper. The original intention of the Government in introducing this measure was that it should apply to England only; but it having been represented that it would be well that it should be extended to the sister kingdoms, certain clauses had been introduced by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Stansfeld), more or less adapted to meet the particular circumstances of these two countries. With one exception, these clauses were unobjectionable, so far as Scotland was concerned and so far as they went; but it was found, in the opinion of those who were entitled to express an opinion that they did not truly meet the case of Scotland, as they failed to abolish certain exemptions in that country which the Bill proposed to abolish in England, and to deal with other exemptions in Scotland which did not exist at all in England; and not only so, but a conviction existed in the minds of the rating authorities of Scotland that the Bill did not make any provision—or at least made insufficient provision—to remedy some very serious abuses that had arisen in Scotland in the application of the 37th clause of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. Besides this, an objection was taken in Scotland to the plan proposed by the Government for valuing Government property. He had been applied to to give expression to these opinions, and had put certain Amendments on the Paper to be proposed at this stage of the Bill. The Amendments were of three kinds. Those on the 6th clause proposed to remove exemptions from rating enjoyed by literary and scientific societies, which had been abolished in England, but which, from an error in the wording, the Bill did not deal with in Scotland; and also to abolish an exemption enjoyed mostly under private Acts by buildings used by municipal corporations and other public bodies for public purposes. To these Amendments no serious objection was, he believed, to be apprehended. Another object of his Amendments referred to the repeal of the 37th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and as to which they should, no doubt, have to contend against very powerful interests—but he desired nothing but what was fair. His third Amendment had reference to an alteration in the system of valuing and arbitrating on Government property. These Amendments found, he believed, very general approval and support from the Members for Scotland. The Lord Advocate, he believed, was favourable to their principle; nor did he think any formidable opposition was to be apprehended from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, except possibly upon the question of the valuation of Government property, on which he was aware the right hon. Gentleman entertained a strong opinion. But soon after Notice of these Amendments had been put upon the Paper, his attention was called to the fact that, in accordance with the Standing Orders of the House, it would not be competent to him to move them upon the Report—the question, in fact, as had been raised by the objection of the hon. and learned Member for Ayr. It seemed therefore that the only course open to him was to put an Amendment upon the Paper to re-commit the Bill in regard to the clauses on which the Amendments had arisen—namely, the 4th, 6th, and 12th clauses. In ordinary circumstances no objection could be taken to that course; but his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board had complained of his conduct in the matter as though it was of an unfriendly and hostile character; and had represented to him that the effect of the re-commitment of the Bill would in all probability be to throw very serious difficulties in the way of its passing. He had suggested that all the Amendments requisite in regard to Scotland might be embodied in a simple Bill, to which no objection could be taken; but there seemed little probability of the draft of such a Bill being agreed upon in time to pass it this Session. He therefore felt unable to accept the responsibility of so dealing with this Bill as to risk throwing away the large amount of time and labour the House of Commons had already expended upon it. Nor could he allege to himself any advantage from opposing this Bill. The Bill itself would give the people of Scotland a substantial gain. It established an important extension of the rating area, as regarded Government property and mines, and if it fell short of their just claims in regard to literary societies and municipal buildings, he believed that omission to be wholly accidental, and they had already heard from the right hon. Gentleman that it was the deliberate intention of the Government to complete the measure for Scotland in these points at the very earliest period next Session. As regarded the 37th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, he felt that it would be utterly hopeless to attempt to deal with a question of that kind, involving the interests of the great railway companies, at this late period of the Session. The only other Amendment was in regard to the scheme of valuation, and the character of the tribunal to be appointed to arbitrate, and that was one which could be discussed on this stage of the Bill. That being so, and having taken the best advice, he thought it was not his duty to press the Motion that the Bill should be re-committed.

MR. CAWLEY said, he did not concur in the course taken by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Graham), nor in his reasons in support of it. He should therefore move the Amendment of which he had given Notice—that the Bill be re-committed. The Amendments proposed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Stansfeld) were of such a serious character, and the measure itself was of such importance, that he felt it was impossible they could be adequately dealt with on the consideration of the Report. There was no doubt the Bill was intended to lay the foundation of future legislation in regard to local taxation, as distinguished from Imperial taxation. If the right hon. Gentleman declared otherwise, then he must call it a mere "meddling and muddling" of the law in respect to local taxation. The right hon. Gentleman might, perhaps, be technically right in the course he intended to adopt; but the right hon. Gentleman was certainly not acting in accordance with the spirit of the Rules of the House. It was of vital importance that the House should consider this Bill in all its details before it was allowed to pass to "another place." The Bill originally contained 19 clauses, to which four were added during its progress through Committee. Of those 23 clauses it was now proposed to omit one; five new clauses were to be proposed by the author of the measure; and no fewer than 44 verbal Amendments were intended to be introduced. These figures were sufficient to show that the Bill had not been fully and fairly considered in Committee. If these had been mere verbal Amendments, he should have interposed no obstacle to the passing of the Bill; but the fact was that the proposed new clauses raised the whole question as to whether certain descriptions of property should be now, for the first time, made rateable. Although it might be true that the right hon. Gentleman had not actually taken out clauses from the Valuation Bill in order to insert them in this, yet it was certain that the clauses about to be proposed were clauses which, according to the right hon. Gentleman's definition of the distinction between the two measures, ought to have been in the Valuation Bill. The title of the present Bill, which appeared to be the original title of the two Bills when combined in one, remained; so that, in point of fact, every clause of the Valuation Bill came under the title of the present Bill, and therefore might technically be introduced in it; but whether this were a fair way of dealing with the House was another question. His own opinion was that the two measures ought to have been proceeded with concurrently, and that neither of them ought to have been passed without the other being complete. There was one most important point to be borne in mind in dealing with the clauses in respect to the extension of rateability—namely, that the scheme be a practicable one, otherwise a rate might be invalid. The Bill extended rateability to three classes of property — namely, mines, land occupied for growing woods and saleable underwood, and to fowling, shooting, sporting, and fishing, when severed from the occupation of the land. He would remind the House in connection with the Act of 1840, that some one objected to the validity of a rate because every inhabitant of the parish was not rated, as he was bound to be under the Act of Elizabeth, and the decision of the Court was fatal to the rate. A Bill was then brought in to remove the difficulty by exempting persons from rateability in respect of their ability derived from their stock-in-trade; but after passing the House of Commons, it was discovered in the House of Lords, when it was too late to amend it, that it contained words which would carry the exemption further than was intended, and the Bill was consequently withdrawn. It was again introduced into this House without those words and passed through all its stages without discussion, and became law. What would be the result if the Bill before the House passed in its present form? What legal definition would be given to the words "right of sporting?" Fox-hunting was a sport which many took great delight in; but how could it be assessed? There were also persons who enjoyed the sport of rat catching, and to show how valuable it was, he would mention the fact that when the reservoir burst at Sheffield a few years ago a claim for compensation was put in by a rat-catcher because the rats in the valley were drowned by the calamity, and the rat-catcher lost his occupation, but the claim was refused on the ground that the applicant had no beneficial interest in the rats as such.

How were they, then, to rate a sport like that, in which there was no beneficial occupation? There were many persons, too, who considered rook-shooting sport, and the Bill made it rateable when severed from the occupation of the soil; but what that meant it was difficult to decide. It either meant that when not severed from the occupation of the soil it was not rateable, or else it meant that it was rated already. These matters were small in themselves; but when it came to a question as to the validity of the rate, they became very important. With regard to the right of fishing, was fishing in lakes to be rated, and how was it to be done? If it were not done legally it would invalidate the rate, and all for the sake of bringing in these things which were most unimportant as regarded the ratepayers, whilst great questions were left untouched and unsettled. The Bill if passed in its present form could not remain permanent or unaltered for more than a year or two; for the question of what was to be, and what was not to be rated, must be finally decided ere long. With regard to the question of whether the exemption of stock-in-trade should or should not include all machinery, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government used the argument that stock-in-trade was exempted, not because it was not rateable as such, but because it could not be got into the net. If that were so there would be no difficulty in rating machinery, and if the right hon. Gentleman's argument were sound it ought certainly to be rendered liable in some form or other. He did not consider that the Bill could be fairly and properly discussed on the Report, and if there was no chance of making it a perfect and permanent measure it ought not to be persisted in during the present Session. He agreed with those who thought the Bill possessed value, because it proposed to deal with Government property; but he took it to be a delusion to suppose that the liability of Government property depended upon the present measure. The Bill now under consideration would only lay the foundation of such liability, which must hereafter be dealt with in a distinct and separate measure. He proposed, therefore, that the Bill, which was most clumsily drafted, should be re-committed, in order that it might be thoroughly considered.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the words "Bill be" to the end of the Question, in order to add the word "re-committed," —(Mr. Cawley,)—instead thereof.

MR. M'LAREN said, the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Graham) had intended to propose that this Bill should be re-committed with respect to certain clauses—not for the purpose of making any alteration in the Bill, but of making it more perfect, and of making the same rule apply to Scotland and Ireland that was applicable to England. He cordially approved of the views which the hon. Member expressed in the first part of his speech; but the second part was quite independent of the other. The hon. Member with great force urged that there were great defects in the Bill, arising from the fact that the Bill originally only applied to England, but in its progress it was made applicable to both Scotland and Ireland. But then having urged this matter very logically, and having conclusively shown that the right thing would be to re-commit the Bill in order that any Amendment might be introduced, he went on to the second part of his speech, in which he spoke against all that he had previously advocated, and showed that it would be inconvenient and obstructive to delay the progress of the Bill, and he concluded without moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice. It was therefore impossible for him (Mr. M'Laren) to support the hon. Member, part of whose speech was logically true, but part was altogether fallacious. The question now before the House was to re-commit the Bill as a whole. He approved of the Motion to re-commit the Bill as regarded the four matters which had been mentioned, as that would take up a very short time indeed; but he declined to re-commit the whole Bill, fearing that it would take up more time than could be reasonably demanded from the House. He approved of the Bill as a whole, and thought it an admirable one. All his objection was that it did not carry out in Scotland that which it enacted in Ireland. He had himself given Notice to omit from the 4th clause the words "so far as relates to England" which would have made the exemption universal; and he regretted that it would not be in his power to move it.

MR. BRUEN said, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would assent to the Motion for re-commitment. As far as the extension of Clause 6 to Scotland and Ireland was concerned, he thought the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) would have received the unanimous support of Members on both sides of the House, and though there would not have been the same unanimity in reference to Clause 4, he doubted not that a majority of hon. Members would have been found to support the proposal to remove the exemption as far as Ireland was concerned. In Ireland the question of exemption was looked upon with considerable disfavour, and in the City of Dublin so extensive were those exemptions in respect to property held by public bodies, that the rates on private property were increased as much as 9d. in the pound. The right hon. Gentleman asked the Irish ratepayer to be left at that disadvantage, when, by consenting to this Motion, the injustice of the case might be got rid of.

MR. MACFIE said, he had no doubt as to the wisdom of the course taken by his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Graham) in withdrawing his Amendment. To have re-committed the Bill at this late stage of the Bill, and at this late period of the Session, would have been unwise. He thanked his hon. Friend for putting on the Paper some excellent Amendments, and he must express the gratification which he shared with many outside this House at the encouragement which Government had given him in the preparation of those Amendments. In reference, however, to the Amendment of Clause 6, he thought his hon. Friend might have gone further, and should not have confined himself to Scotland. At present, docks and harbours were frequently exempted, much to the injury of ports, such as Leith, Liverpool, and other places. He could give illustrative instances, but would just state how Leith was affected. Goods were landed there, or shipped, and they had to pass over the streets of Leith to the detriment of the pavements. In the various stages of their progress through the town those goods were protected at the expense of the rates of Leith; yet towards those rates nothing was contributed by the owners of that property or by the owners of the ships which brought it to the port. Nothing could be more unfair to the inhabitants, who had to pay for the protection of their property and houses. Somehow or other, in various parts of the country exemptions were frequently smuggled in; but this Session he had hoped to receive from the Government a measure which would remove all such inequalities, and would be a great measure of justice. He was glad to find that the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. McLaren) was not opposed to the Bill.

MR. STANFIELD said, his appeal to the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Graham) was made simply on the score of time, and the Government had to thank the hon. Member for the consideration he had shown by withdrawing his Amendment. At that advanced stage of the Session he could not entertain any reliable hope of the passage of a Bill full of technicalities if it were re-committed. The question before the House was whether the Amendments that were proposed should be considered upon the Report, and should pass into law during the present Session. He would remind the House that the Bill was introduced purely as an English Bill. It was not usual to deal with such a subject as this with regard to the three countries in one and the same Bill, because such a proceeding would greatly complicate the measure. It was urged that there should be no delay in extending to Scotland and Ireland the advantages of removing the exemption of Government property from rating which the Bill proposed to give to England. The Government thought that a fair appeal, and divided the Bill into three parts, the second of which they proposed by certain clauses to apply to Scotland and Ireland. With regard to the rating of Government property he contended that great delay would arise if the Bill was not passed, because it proposed to give legislative power to proceed to arbitration on the question of the value of Government property, and until this had been done nothing effectual could be achieved in regard to the rating of this class of property. Therefore, he could not agree with the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) in thinking that no harm could be done if the Bill did not pass at all in the present Session. He had merely, as far as he could consistently with the scope and object of the Bill, prepared new clauses to meet the wishes of Members and the general opinion of the Committee. There was no new matter in them, and there was no reason why they should not be discussed on the Report. The clauses were re-drawn in fulfilment of a pledge he gave the Committee. He hoped the House would be content to negative the Motion of the hon. Member, and allow the Bill to be considered as amended.

MR. HUNT said, that the right hon. Gentleman at the commencement of his observations predicted that if the Bill were re-committed it would be lost for the Session, and then at the close of his speech he informed the House that the Amendments he proposed were merely to give effect to the decisions the House had already arrived at, and that they introduced no new matter. Those two statements did not appear quite consistent one with the other. For his own part, while he approved of the principle of the Bill, he confessed that if the Bill were to be hurried through the House, and were to be an imperfect measure, he would rather prefer postponing legislation on the subject for another year. At the same time, he would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that the new clauses of the Government might be discussed in Committee of the House without the loss of an unreasonable amount of time. Had the Government been anxious to pass the Bill this Session, they would surely have introduced it earlier than they had done, so as to enable the House to consider it fully before May, instead of which the Bill was not printed until the 7th of May. He regretted that it was not referred to a Select Committee. They were now, on the 15th of July, discussing the question whether they should re-commit the Bill or discuss it on Report. Since it was read a second time, the Bill had grown from six pages to ten, not because of Amendments arising out of the original propositions of the Government, but because of additions which the Committee had found necessary to introduce; and now the Government proposed to take out of the Bill nearly all those additions made by independent Members, and carefully discussed in Committee, in order that they might substitute other wording which the right hon. Gentleman said would more effectually carry out the intentions of the Committee. The Amendments occupied six pages and the Bill only about nine; so ~~the~~ proposal to re-commit the Bill was not an unreasonable one. Sir Erskine May stated that it was always advisable when numerous Amendments were to be proposed to re-commit the Bill. He hoped, therefore, the Government would accede to the proposal, and lose no more time.

Mr. DODSON wished to ask, as a point of Order, whether it would not be necessary to re-commit the Bill, at all events so far as concerned the proposed new clause, which was to follow Clause 3 in the Bill. It was provided that the law of rating should extend to "rights of fowling, shooting, sporting, and fishing, when severed from the occupation of the soil," but in no part of the Bill was it declared upon whose shoulders the burden should fall. This new clause imposed a burden on certain persons; and was, therefore, a rating clause, which ought to be considered in Committee.

Mr. STANSFIELD said, he thought that his right hon. Friend was under a misapprehension, and that no new burden was charged by the new clause. As to the charge on the occupier of the land, it was involved in the 19th clause, and the clause only put into a legal and practical shape what had been embodied in Clause 19.

Mr. HUNT contended that as the clause provided that the occupier of any rights of fowling, sporting, or shooting, might deduct the rates from the owner, there was a new charge placed upon the owner.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL held that the clause did not impose any new charge, because the Bill by another clause—Clause 19—provided that all these rights should be assessed, and that where the owner was not occupier, the occupier should be entitled to deduct the rates from his rent.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question raised upon the point of Order is one of great difficulty and complexity; but, according to the best judgment I can give on the matter, it appears that the Amendments of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld), so far as they relate to matters affecting the rating of property other than the rights of sporting, do not infringe upon the rules of the House. With regard to such Amendments, therefore, there is no necessity to re-commit the Bill; but it appears to me that there is great force in the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr.

Dodson), and that the incidence of the rate with respect to the right of sporting, as imposed by the Committee, is varied by the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board. Therefore, according to the Standing Orders of the House, the Bill should be recommitted in respect of Clause 3. I submit that view to the judgment of the House.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was anxious to "get on." He would therefore, suggest that the hon. Member for Salford should withdraw his Motion, and that the Bill should be recommitted with regard to Clauses 3 and 19 and the new clauses.

Mr. HENLEY said, he thought it desirable that Bills should go up from that House to "another place" in as good a form as possible, and he did not believe that these Amendments could be discussed as they ought to be, except in Committee. The Committee had been discussing this matter for nearly two hours, and it was unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) had not sooner consented to the re-committal. It was quite certain that much difficulty, litigation, and misunderstanding must arise upon the clauses as they stood, and the House must take care that summary justice was not done upon the Bill by its summary rejection in "another place."

Mr. STANSFIELD said, it was desirable to act upon the opinion of the Speaker, and he therefore proposed to accept the suggestion of the hon. Member (Mr. Cross) that the Bill should be recommitted upon the withdrawal of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Salford. He proposed, therefore, to omit part of Clause 3, and to omit Clause 19, and he should then propose the new clauses as a rider to Clause 3.

Mr. CAWLEY said, he was in the hands of the House, and had no objection to withdraw his Amendment, although it seemed to him that the Amendments involved the whole Bill.

Mr. CRAUFURD objected to the withdrawal of the Amendment. He had before urged upon the right hon. Gentleman, in the interest of this Bill, that he would expedite it if he would consent to its re-committal. The right hon. Gentleman however declared that he would not consent to re-commit the Bill, because that would endanger its becoming law. He thought that Scotland and Ireland had been rather hardly used. The President of the Poor Law Board had given what nearly amounted to a pledge, in order not to retard this measure, that he would bring in a Bill for Scotland and Ireland. [Mr. STANSFIELD: No.] He was in the recollection of the House whether the right hon. Gentleman had not said he would do his best to table such a Bill, and if the House was about to re-commit the Bill it ought either to include Scotland or Ireland or else the right hon. Gentleman ought to bring in a Bill applicable to the United Kingdom. Would not the right hon. Gentleman facilitate his object if he would drop that portion of the Bill which did not apply to Ireland and Scotland and proceed only with so much of the Bill as had been made applicable to the whole United Kingdom? The right hon. Gentleman told the House there was no precedent for dealing with rating questions for the whole of the three kingdoms, yet by this very Bill he proposed, with regard to England, to repeal the Act of Victoria which exempted literary and scientific institutions throughout the United Kingdom from liability to rates. He thought that Clauses 4, 6, and 12 should be re-committed.

MR. CLARE READ sincerely desired that the Bill should pass in the course of the present Session, and that it should be as perfect as it could be made; but he could not see why, if the debatable parts of the measure were to be re-committed, the whole Bill should not follow the same course. The Bill had been brought in in a skeleton form, and had been built up in a most confused and confusing manner. It began at the wrong end of the subject; and he hoped that before it was got rid of there would be an assurance on the part of the Government that in the course of the next Session something real and substantial would be attempted to be done.

MR. STANSFIELD wished to explain, in answer to the hon. and learned Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd), that he had only expressed an opinion that the general re-committal of the whole Bill would be attended with, perhaps, fatal delay.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he could not see that practical delay in dealing with the rating question would result from postponing the whole matter until next Session, inasmuch as Clause 7 only provided that the Treasury should at some future time bring in a measure.

Mr. Craufurd

THE O'CONOR DON said, he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill would not consent to recommit Clauses 4 and 6, because he felt sure that they could be usefully added to the Bill without loss of time.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, he thought the Government were to blame for the difficulty in which the House found itself, because they did not sufficiently think out all the questions before they brought them under consideration. He hoped the Bill would be proceeded with at once, as far as the rating of mines, woodlands, and Government property was concerned. The Bill, as it at present stood, was in a state of confusion; but it contained ample materials for the construction of a good and satisfactory measure this Session, as far as the three matters to which he had referred were concerned.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it appeared that they were not able to get at the propositions about which there was a general concurrence, because it was insisted by some hon. Members that the whole Bill should be re-committed for the purpose of dealing with Scotland and Ireland. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Stansfeld) objected to the re-committal of the whole Bill, on the ground that if they entered into that re-committal every point that had been considered and settled with reference to England itself must necessarily pass through the ordeal of being put from the Chair, and therefore every Member would be entitled to raise a discussion on it, as if the Bill had never been committed. In the first place, was it desirable to pass this Bill or not? And, in the second place, was the forcing upon the authors of the Bill that they should deal with the three kingdoms in one and the same measure a useful and equitable method of proceeding? As to the first question, he believed it was felt by both sides of the House that it was desirable this Bill should pass. Certainly, if it were desirable for the Government, it was undoubtedly desirable for the House, and for those who wished to bring the Government fairly in face of the other main portions of the subject of local taxation. In the view of the Government this was a portion of the question of local taxation which required first to be dealt with. When a simple proposition was submitted to them, the House could, as in the case of freeing a literary institution from taxation, do it at once; but when they came to deal with the law of rating as applicable to various kinds of property, such precipitation was not convenient. He did not think either Scotland or Ireland would lose anything by the House consenting to the partial re-committal of the Bill, as contemplated by the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross), and to which his right hon. Friend in charge of the measure was willing to consent. His hon. Friend near him (Mr. Hibbert) had Bills in relation to Scotland and Ireland—one ready, the other almost ready—which could be introduced next Session. The main question was whether the House wished the Bill to pass this Session or not.

MR. PELL shared most fully in the desire to see this Bill passed; but he must observe that those measures of the Government never would have been brought forward except for the Notice of Motion of his hon. Friend (Sir Massey Lopes), and when brought forward they were laid on the Table in a very imperfect shape, as if there was no idea of their becoming law. He hoped the Government would consent to re-commit the Bill in reference to the 3rd and the 19th clauses; and he even thought they might include the 17th clause also, which would not lead to any prolonged discussion.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING, having been assured that there were Bills in preparation for Ireland and Scotland, thought it would be indiscreet for the Irish and Scotch Members to oppose the Government.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That the word 're-committed' be added," instead thereof.

MR. HUNT inquired whether that would include any new clause?

MR. SPEAKER said, if the Bill were ordered to be re-committed with respect to Clauses 3 and 19, that Order would not apply to other new clauses.

MR. HUNT: Then I will move to add, instead of "with respect to Clauses 3 and 19," "with respect to any new clauses."

MR. DODSON said, that no new clause could be received unless it were ordered that the Bill be re-committed in respect to it.

MR. GLADSTONE said, what he understood was that all new matter relating to Clauses 3 and 19 could be moved and dealt with on the re-committal of the Bill, but not other new clauses on all manner of different subjects totally unconnected with Clauses 3 and 19.

MR. GRAHAM considered that the Members for Scotland had not been treated with becoming fairness, as they were deprived of the privilege which had been accorded to the English Members of re-committing the Bill. It was in deference to the President of the Local Government Board that he withdrew his Amendment in favour of a limited re-commitment, and now he found the Government were ready to accede to a limited re-commitment as far as England was concerned only.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS suggested that the Bill should be re-committed in respect of Clauses 3 and 19, and any new clauses relating to the subject-matter of those clauses.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to add the words "in respect of Clauses 3 and 19, and of any new Clauses relating to the subject-matter of those Clauses."—(Mr. Cross.)

MR. CRAUFURD said, he wished to vindicate himself, and to reply to the remarks of the Prime Minister. There was an old saying that England's difficulty was Ireland's opportunity. Unfortunately, the Scotch Members had always supported the Government, and had never asserted themselves. In his opinion, however, the time had now come when they should do so. They were a small minority in the House; but, if they acted together, they were a power. They had been always confiding in the Liberal Government which they followed, and, in his opinion, they had very often been too confiding, and what had been the consequence? Scotch legislation had not kept pace with either English or Irish legislation. The Irish Members acted wisely; they looked after their own interests, and they made their influence felt. Session after Session Irish business took precedence of other business; and it was time for Scotch Members to assert themselves in regard to what they considered ought to be done for their country. This Bill and Ireland had been rather hardly used. The President of the Poor Law Board had given what nearly amounted to a pledge, in order not to retard this measure, that he would bring in a Bill for Scotland and Ireland. [Mr. STANSFIELD: No.] He was in the recollection of the House whether the right hon. Gentleman had not said he would do his best to table such a Bill, and if the House was about to re-commit the Bill it ought either to include Scotland or Ireland or else the right hon. Gentleman ought to bring in a Bill applicable to the United Kingdom. Would not the right hon. Gentleman facilitate his object if he would drop that portion of the Bill which did not apply to Ireland and Scotland and proceed only with so much of the Bill as had been made applicable to the whole United Kingdom? The right hon. Gentleman told the House there was no precedent for dealing with rating questions for the whole of the three kingdoms, yet by this very Bill he proposed, with regard to England, to repeal the Act of Victoria which exempted literary and scientific institutions throughout the United Kingdom from liability to rates. He thought that Clauses 4, 6, and 12 should be re-committed.

MR. CLARE READ sincerely desired that the Bill should pass in the course of the present Session, and that it should be as perfect as it could be made; but he could not see why, if the debatable parts of the measure were to be re-committed, the whole Bill should not follow the same course. The Bill had been brought in in a skeleton form, and had been built up in a most confused and confusing manner. It began at the wrong end of the subject; and he hoped that before it was got rid of there would be an assurance on the part of the Government that in the course of the next Session something real and substantial would be attempted to be done.

MR. STANSFIELD wished to explain, in answer to the hon. and learned Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd), that he had only expressed an opinion that the general re-committal of the whole Bill would be attended with, perhaps, fatal delay.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he could not see that practical delay in dealing with the rating question would result from postponing the whole matter until next Session, inasmuch as Clause 7 only provided that the Treasury should at some future time bring in a measure.

Mr. Craufurd

THE O'CONOR DON said, he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill would not consent to recommit Clauses 4 and 6, because he felt sure that they could be usefully added to the Bill without loss of time.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, he thought the Government were to blame for the difficulty in which the House found itself, because they did not sufficiently think out all the questions before they brought them under consideration. He hoped the Bill would be proceeded with at once, as far as the rating of mines, woodlands, and Government property was concerned. The Bill, as it at present stood, was in a state of confusion; but it contained ample materials for the construction of a good and satisfactory measure this Session, as far as the three matters to which he had referred were concerned.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it appeared that they were not able to get at the propositions about which there was a general concurrence, because it was insisted by some hon. Members that the whole Bill should be re-committed for the purpose of dealing with Scotland and Ireland. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Stansfeld) objected to the re-committal of the whole Bill, on the ground that if they entered into that re-committal every point that had been considered and settled with reference to England itself must necessarily pass through the ordeal of being put from the Chair, and therefore every Member would be entitled to raise a discussion on it, as if the Bill had never been committed. In the first place, was it desirable to pass this Bill or not? And, in the second place, was the forcing upon the authors of the Bill that they should deal with the three kingdoms in one and the same measure a useful and equitable method of proceeding? As to the first question, he believed it was felt by both sides of the House that it was desirable this Bill should pass. Certainly, if it were desirable for the Government, it was undoubtedly desirable for the House, and for those who wished to bring the Government fairly in face of the other main portions of the subject of local taxation. In the view of the Government this was a portion of the question of local taxation which required first to be dealt with. When a simple proposition was submitted to them, the House could, as in the case of freeing a literary institution from taxation, do it at once; but when they came to deal with the law of rating as applicable to various kinds of property, such precipitation was not convenient. He did not think either Scotland or Ireland would lose anything by the House consenting to the partial re-committal of the Bill, as contemplated by the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire (Mr. Cross), and to which his right hon. Friend in charge of the measure was willing to consent. His hon. Friend near him (Mr. Hibbert) had Bills in relation to Scotland and Ireland—one ready, the other almost ready—which could be introduced next Session. The main question was whether the House wished the Bill to pass this Session or not.

MR. PELL shared most fully in the desire to see this Bill passed; but he must observe that those measures of the Government never would have been brought forward except for the Notice of Motion of his hon. Friend (Sir Massey Lopes), and when brought forward they were laid on the Table in a very imperfect shape, as if there was no idea of their becoming law. He hoped the Government would consent to re-commit the Bill in reference to the 3rd and the 19th clauses; and he even thought they might include the 17th clause also, which would not lead to any prolonged discussion.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING, having been assured that there were Bills in preparation for Ireland and Scotland, thought it would be indiscreet for the Irish and Scotch Members to oppose the Government.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That the word 're-committed' be added," instead thereof.

MR. HUNT inquired whether that would include any new clause?

MR. SPEAKER said, if the Bill were ordered to be re-committed with respect to Clauses 3 and 19, that Order would not apply to other new clauses.

MR. HUNT: Then I will move to add, instead of "with respect to Clauses 3 and 19," "with respect to any new clauses."

MR. DODSON said, that no new clause could be received unless it were ordered that the Bill be re-committed in respect to it.

MR. GLADSTONE said, what he understood was that all new matter relating to Clauses 3 and 19 could be moved and dealt with on the re-committal of the Bill, but not other new clauses on all manner of different subjects totally unconnected with Clauses 3 and 19.

MR. GRAHAM considered that the Members for Scotland had not been treated with becoming fairness, as they were deprived of the privilege which had been accorded to the English Members of re-committing the Bill. It was in deference to the President of the Local Government Board that he withdrew his Amendment in favour of a limited re-commitment, and now he found the Government were ready to accede to a limited re-commitment as far as England was concerned only.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS suggested that the Bill should be re-committed in respect of Clauses 3 and 19, and any new clauses relating to the subject-matter of those clauses.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to add the words "in respect of Clauses 3 and 19, and of any new Clauses relating to the subject-matter of those Clauses."—(Mr. Cross.)

MR. CRAUFURD said, he wished to vindicate himself, and to reply to the remarks of the Prime Minister. There was an old saying that England's difficulty was Ireland's opportunity. Unfortunately, the Scotch Members had always supported the Government, and had never asserted themselves. In his opinion, however, the time had now come when they should do so. They were a small minority in the House; but, if they acted together, they were a power. They had been always confiding in the Liberal Government which they followed, and, in his opinion, they had very often been too confiding, and what had been the consequence? Scotch legislation had not kept pace with either English or Irish legislation. The Irish Members acted wisely; they looked after their own interests, and they made their influence felt. Session after Session Irish business took precedence of other business; and it was time for Scotch Members to assert themselves in regard to what they considered ought to be done for their country. This Bill was a first step in local taxation, which affected Scotland equally with England, and yet Scotland was not to be dealt with on the same footing. This was a consequence of there not being a Scotch Minister in the Cabinet. He must earnestly protest against the doctrine laid down by the Prime Minister that it was unprecedented or unusual that any Member or any section of that House should attempt to force important modifications or changes in a measure of which a Member of the Government had charge. In pursuance of his duty to his constituents, he should take every advantage of the position in which the Bill now stood to obtain the full extension of its provisions to Scotland. He would never be deterred from the fulfilment of that duty by any observations of any Minister of the Crown.

Question, "That those words be added to the proposed Amendment," put, and agreed to.

MR. GRAHAM moved, as an Amendment, to add, "and also in respect of Clauses 4 and 6."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, as amended, to add, at the end thereof, the words "and also in respect of Clauses 4 and 6."—(Mr. Graham.)

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The House divided:—Ayes 136; Noes 193: Majority 57.

Words "re-committed in respect of Clauses 3 and 19, and of any new Clauses relating to the subject matter of those Clauses," added to the words "That the Bill be," in the Main Question.

Main Question, so amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3 (Extension of Poor Rate Acts to other property).

MR. STANSFIELD said, he had placed on the Paper several Amendments to this clause. He should, on coming to Clause 19, propose to omit the proviso which had been accepted on the Motion of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read). In the meantime, he would ask the Committee to add the new clauses of which he had given Notice on the Report, and to make them an addition to Clause 3. In point of form the first step he intended to take now was to substitute "for" for the word "as." This was a merely verbal Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. STANSFIELD then moved to leave out the word "underwood," in order to insert the words "or for both such purposes and." The object of the Amendment, he explained, was to omit the proviso moved by the hon. Member for South Norfolk.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. STANSFIELD said, that in point of form the next step for him to take would be to move the omission of Clause 19.

MR. G. MONCKTON moved, in page 2, line 6, to leave out "sporting," because it was a word which would simply serve to puzzle the assessment committee.

MR. J. LOWTHER moved to omit the word "fowling," and said that the words "shooting and fishing" would really cover all that the Government wanted to rate.

MR. J. S. HARDY was of opinion that it would be necessary to retain the word "fowling."

MR. WEST pointed out that the exact words in the Bill, "sporting, shooting, fowling, and fishing," were commonly inserted in deeds. It was safer to stand by the old words, which had been used for a very long time.

MR. CLARE READ doubted whether they would cover the catching of rabbits in a warren.

MR. CAWLEY said, he was not sure as to "fowling," but he thought "sporting" was too wide and general a phrase. The value for rating purposes would be a bagatelle.

MR. GOLDSMID said, he thought it would be better to omit the word "sporting," which might include rat-catching; for he knew places where rat-catching was a favourite sport, and was largely practised. He thought, however, coursing might be included.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he did not think it worth while to make such objections. The object of the Government was to include everything which formed the subject of a lease. Did the hon. Member ever see a lease of the right of rat-catching? All the rights referred to in the Bill were sometimes of value, and he did not see why they should not be rateable.

Mr. Crawford

MR. HUNT said, he would like to know whether it was intended to rate the right of a master of foxhounds to ride to cover.

MR. J. LOWTHER doubted whether the words would cover the case of a rabbit warren, about which there was no element whatever of sport.

MR. STANSFIELD said, the words would include the case of a free warren.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH suggested that the word "sporting" should be omitted, and the words "killing game and rabbits" substituted, as this, he thought, would include coursing, &c.

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH said, it appeared to him that by the course they were taking in this matter, hon. Gentlemen opposite were manifesting a great want of faith in their constituents and in the assessment committees. There was no reason whatever why they should treat them as their enemies.

MR. BEACH remarked that although he should have the greatest confidence in the assessment committee, they would have to apply the law as it was laid down in the Bill.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that of course the Government had no intention or desire to rate masters of foxhounds. He agreed that the words suggested by the hon. Member opposite (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), "the killing of game or rabbits," would answer every purpose.

MR. PELL preferred to retain the word "sporting," as they did not know what "game" was.

MR. CLARE READ felt sure that the words proposed by the hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire would meet every difficulty.

Amendment (Mr. J. Lowther) negatived.

The words "taking or killing game or rabbits" inserted in lieu of "sporting."

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 19 (Definition of "occupier") struck out.

MR. STANSFIELD moved the insertion of the following new clause, after Clause 3—

(Valuation of land used as plantation, &c.)

"The gross value of any land used for a plantation or a wood, or for the growth of saleable underwood, or for both such purposes, shall be estimated as follows:—

(a.) If the land is used only for a plantation or a wood, the gross value shall be estimated as if the land were in its natural state, and let for agricultural or grazing purposes without any trees growing thereon.

(b.) If the land is used only for the growth of saleable underwood, the gross value shall be estimated as if the land were let for that purpose.

(c.) If the land is used for the growth of trees and of saleable underwood, the gross value shall be estimated either as if the land were used only for a plantation or wood, or as if the land were used only for the growth of the saleable underwood growing thereon, as the assessment committee may determine."

MR. GOLDSMID said, he wished to know what was meant in the clause by the expression "the natural state of the land." Something must have been done with the land at some time or other since it was created; and that being so, who could tell what its natural state was? The right hon. Gentleman had adopted the words from the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), and he should like to have some explanation of their meaning.

MR. HUNT proposed to omit the word "only" in the first line of sub-section (a) "if the land is used only for a plantation," &c. The land might be used for the purpose not only of growing wood, but of preserving game, and those words would seem to imply that the land was assessed only for agricultural purposes.

MR. STANSFIELD explained that the word "only" in sub-sections (a) and (b) was used with reference to a provision contained in sub-section (c).

MR. HENLEY observed that if land in its natural state were assessed, some allowance ought to be made for the expense necessarily incurred in clearing it. Some of the ancient forests had remained uncleared because it was thought the land would not repay the cost of clearing.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL promised to consider the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman before the bringing up of the Report. If the owner of a wood used it as a game cover, it might be necessary to make him pay for his game as well as for his wood.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK was in favour of retaining the word "only" in the sub-section.

MR. HUNT said, his object in moving the omission of the word "only" was to obtain the opinion of the Committee on the point. He would suggest that the Chairman should report Progress in order that the Government might have time to consider the point.

MR. STANSFIELD said, it was unnecessary to report Progress, as the question raised would be considered before the bringing up of the Report.

Amendment negatived.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM moved in paragraph (a), line 1, to leave out "a plantation or" after paragraph (a) insert the following paragraph—

"If the land is used only for plantation the gross value shall be estimated either as if the land were let for planting purposes, or as if the land were in its natural state and let and used for agricultural or grazing purposes without any trees growing thereon, as the Assessment Committee may determine."

His object was to encourage the plantation of land unsuitable for agricultural or grazing purposes, but which, though too poor for those purposes, might be made useful for the growth of larch and other trees.

MR. HIBBERT said, that if these words were adopted by the House they would be departing from the understanding which had already been come to with respect to the rating of plantations and woods, and the Government therefore could not accept the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

MR. GOLDSMID moved the omission of the words "in its natural state." These words had been defined to mean that as a man without his clothes was in his natural state, so land without trees was in its natural state; and if that were so it would be better to omit the words.

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH said, that the more they went into this matter the greater mess they seemed to make of it.

MR. STANSFIELD said, these words had been inserted to carry out the view which was generally expressed by the Committee, that land covered by plantations or woods should be assessed as if the plantations and woods were not there, and as if the land were let for ordinary agricultural purposes.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Friday, at Two of the clock.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS

BILL—[Lords]

(Mr. Winterbotham)

[BILL 235.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading, read.

MR. GLADSTONE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time said, that as its title did not convey any very clear idea of its objects, he wished shortly to explain them. By the existing regulations the salaries of Deans were fixed at £1,000 a-year, and no more. To the Deanery of Lichfield, however, there had been attached since 1706 the important and valuable living of Tattenhill, Staffordshire, which was within the diocese of Lichfield, but at some distance from the Cathedral city, and therefore not coming within the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 94 which forbade that any Dean should hold with his deanery any benefice not situate within his Cathedral city. The question, therefore, was whether by the provision of the general law he was disabled from the possession of that living. The Government thought it fair to submit the matter without delay to the decision of the proper tribunal, and the Court had decided that the Dean of Lichfield had taken the living absolutely when he accepted the Deanery. The Bill provided prospectively for the severance of the living from the Deanery, and left it to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to lay down the conditions under which it should be divided after the severance had been carried out. Previous to the annexation of the rectory to the Deanery Her Majesty had been seized of the advowson in right of the Duchy of Lancaster. The Bill provided that after the severance the advowson should be vested in Her Majesty as formerly.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

And it being now Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

WINDWARD ISLANDS AND TRINIDAD —ECCLESIASTICAL POLICY.

RESOLUTION.

MR. CHARLEY rose, pursuant to Notice, to call attention to the Ecclesiastical Policy applied by Her Majesty's Government to the Windward Islands and to Trinidad; and to move "That this House disapproves of the Ecclesiastical Policy of Her Majesty's Government in the Windward Islands and in Trinidad." The hon. and learned Member said, that Her Majesty's Government since 1869, had been engaged in disestablishing the Church of England in the West Indies, and his first object was to show that in carrying out that ecclesiastical policy, they had violated the principles which they had themselves laid down upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall), for the disestablishment of the English Church. Her Majesty's Government had also been engaged in endowing the Church of Rome in the West Indies; and his second object was to show that in carrying out that ecclesiastical policy, they had violated the principles which in 1868 carried them to place and power. The right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) not long ago said, that concurrent endowment was dead; but at that time the despatches of Lord Kimberley had not been laid on the Table; and he (Mr. Charley) submitted that concurrent endowment still survived and flourished under the auspices of the Colonial Office. He confined his Motion to the Windward Islands and Trinidad, because it was difficult to gather from the Returns which had been presented what had been precisely the policy of Her Majesty's Government in the other West Indian colonies. The most important of the Windward Islands was Barbadoes, and it was the seat of the Bishop of those Islands. In 1869, Lord Granville, then Colonial Secretary, instructed the Governor of those Islands to disestablish the Church of England in Barbadoes. Governor Rawson was surprised at the revolutionary policy of Her Majesty's Government, and wrote a despatch to Lord Granville, in which he said it was no light task which had been imposed upon him; that he approached it under a great sense of responsibility, and that the people of Barbadoes were almost exclusively members of the Church of England.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. CHARLEY, resuming, said, that Governor Rawson gave some interesting statistics founded upon the religious Census of 1861; from which it appeared that the population of Barbadoes consisted of 152,727 persons, of whom 135,000 were members of the Church of England; 10,500 were Wesleyans; 3,000 were Moravians; 230 (chiefly military) were Roman Catholics having a military chaplain; and 30 belonged to other denominations. In his despatch, alluding to the intention of the Government to disestablish the Church of England in the island, Governor Rawson said—

"I see no reason for making any change in the existing arrangement. The supremacy of the Church of England ought not to be theoretically or practically interfered with in this island," and he added that the Wesleyans very generally brought their children to the Church to be baptized, claimed the offices of the clergy of the Church at the burial of their dead, and many of them attended the services of the Church as well as their own religious meetings. It appeared from the Returns before the House that on the 6th of July, 1871, a conference of the clergy and laity of the Church was held in Barbadoes, at which, among other things, they recommended that a Petition should be presented to the Legislature, praying that it should contribute to the salary of the Bishop of Barbadoes. Lord Kimberley seemed to have been greatly shocked at that proposal, for in his despatch to the Governor, he directed him to make it clearly apparent to the Legislature that to contribute to the salary of the Bishop would not be in accordance with the principles on which Her Majesty's Government desired to act in reference to the ecclesiastical affairs of the West India islands; and that whatever aid the Legislature desired to extend to the Church should be paid in a bulk sum to the Church Body. On the 10th of October, 1871, the Governor replied, stating that the proposals of Her Majesty's Government would make so entire a change in the ecclesiastical condition of the island, and would uproot the foundations of a system which had been cemented by ages, and yet showed no signs of decay, that he thought it prudent before communicating with the Legislature to consult his Council. Having consulted his Council, the Governor found them unanimously opposed to the change.

They expressed their opposition in a document, which was set forth in the Papers in which they said they were aware of what had occurred with respect to the Irish Church. They noticed, they said, with great satisfaction the distinction which the Prime Minister drew between the Irish Church and the Church of England, the one being the Church of the minority and the other being the Church of the great majority of the people; and they respectfully but confidently claimed the benefit of the distinction thus drawn for the Church in Barbadoes, and on similar grounds. There was scarcely a word which fell from that distinguished champion of the English Church which would not apply to the Church in that island, and with the more point and greater force, because of the greater unanimity which prevailed respecting it among the people. Indeed, such was the harmony that existed there on the subject, that it was questionable whether even among the comparatively small body of Nonconformists, to whom there was every desire to do justice, a Mr. Miall could be found to propose its disestablishment. They added that it was connected with their early history; that it was interwoven with the social and political life of the people of the island; that it was one of the permanent institutions of the country; and that the carrying out of the policy of Her Majesty's Government would create great and inevitable confusion. Such was the opinion of the Governor, the Council, the Legislature, and the people of Barbadoes. Her Majesty's Government had since consented to the payment of a salary of £1,000 a-year to the Bishop; but that graceful act did not in his opinion at all derogate from the feeling with which their deliberate attempt to disestablish the Church of Barbadoes should be regarded, an attempt founded on what principle he could not conceive, but should like to be told. He passed on to Tobago, and asked on what principle the Government proposed to disestablish the Church of that island? With respect to that island, 9,000 of its 16,000 inhabitants were members of the Church of England. There were three rectors in the island, each with charge of about 3,000 Churchmen, and each having a salary of £320 a-year with an allowance of £100 a-year for a curate, payable from the Legislature. The Governor proposed that the revenue of the Church should be reduced from £1,060 to £800, but the Earl of Kimberley insisted that there should be a strictly proportionate concurrent endowment, and that the Church of England should only have £625, the exact proportion to which it was entitled as calculated upon the number of its members. That was what was done in islands with only a small Roman Catholic population, and he now came to islands on which the Roman Catholics were in a great majority. In St. Lucia, where there was a majority of Roman Catholics among the population, a despatch of Governor Rawson's, dated October 30th, 1871, stated that—"There had been no complaint or jealousy on the part of the Roman Catholics, neither had there been any religious dissension or dissatisfaction. The members of the several Churches have for a long time lived together in uninterrupted harmony."

A spirit of discontent, however, was infused into the island by the attempt to introduce the principle of proportionate concurrent endowment, and the Roman Catholic Archbishop wrote to Lord Kimberley insisting that the principle should be thoroughly carried out according to the respective numbers of Roman Catholics and Protestants, when the former would receive £1,600 and the Protestants £100.

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present. House counted, and 40 Members being found present.

MR. CHARLEY resumed:—The attempt by Lord Kimberley to extend to Her Majesty's subjects in St. Lucia the principle of religious equality, had simply introduced discontent among Roman Catholics who were perfectly contented before, though their endowments had meanwhile been increased. In Grenada, where there was also a majority of Roman Catholics, the Legislative Council proposed to give £1,000 to the Church of England and £1,000 to the Roman Catholics, instead of giving £2,000 to the former. The Governor reported that there was no ill-will on the part of the Dissenters to the Church; but Lord Kimberley, however, would not hear of the arrangement, insisting that no grant should be given to any religious body which was out of proportion to its numbers, and that the scheme of proportionate concurrent endowment should be carried out. The Legislature thereupon passed a resolution declaring that they would disestablish the Church of England as soon as possible, but afterwards they changed their minds, and resolved that the present religious position of the several Churches should continue as at present. A Church Disestablishment Bill was subsequently introduced into the Legislature by the Lieutenant Governor and was rejected, being blow No. 2 to the Earl of Kimberley. Governor Freeling then wrote a despatch in which he stated that it was useless to press the subject of concurrent endowment further at that time. Governor Rawson, however, on the 9th of May, 1873, penned an extraordinary despatch to the Earl of Kimberley, in which it was proposed that mass meetings should be held, and a newspaper established in the island over which he presided, in support of disestablishment, and, curious to say, Lord Kimberley favourably entertained that proposal. In the island of St. Vincent there were 17,000 Anglicans and 17,000 Dissenters, including Roman Catholics. The Government insisted upon disestablishment there, and required that when vacancies occurred in livings the amount of the incomes was to be handed over to other religious denominations. In Trinidad the Church of England was disestablished in 1870 by Lord Granville. At that time the revenue stood thus—The Church of England had £5,136 income, and the Church of Rome £5,300; and when a despatch was sent to the Governor by Earl Granville to know what changes he would suggest, the reply was that no changes were required. The Earl of Kimberley, however, in a remarkable despatch, dated the 6th of January, 1871, laid down the general principle upon which he desired the Governors to act. On a Roman Catholic incumbency becoming vacant the last stipend should be paid to the Roman Catholic Body; but when a Church of England incumbency became vacant, two-thirds of the last stipend should, until equality was arrived at, be paid to the Roman Catholic Body. The Archbishop of Port-au-Spain, not satisfied with that slow mode of carrying out the object in view, and wanting the money down at once, wrote a despatch to the Earl of Kimberley, in which he expressed his wishes very forcibly, and the noble Earl at once acceded to his request, and concurrent endowment was carried by main force through the Legislature of Trinidad. In conclusion, he called upon all hon. Members of the House who were opposed to disestablishment to vote in favour of the Motion which he had brought forward, whatever might be their views with regard to concurrent endowment. He also called on all hon. Members who were opposed to concurrent endowment, whatever their views might be with regard to Establishment, to vote in favour of his Motion, because they could not be in favour of a system of concurrent endowment which had been well described as a system which obliged almost everyone in the community to contribute to the support of one or more religious systems which he deemed entirely incorrect. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in seconding the Motion, said, he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman had made out a case which required explanation from the Government. It appeared from the Parliamentary Papers which had been issued, that there had been not only an unprecedented tampering with the free legislation of the Colonies, but that there was some influence at work upon the Ministry, not apparent, adverse to the Church of England and violently stripping her in the Colonies of the revenues she derived from local resources. That influence had, it appeared, been brought to bear upon the Government immediately after the disestablishment of the Irish Church, pressing them to disestablish the Church in the Colonies; but although the idea was mooted it found no sympathy in that House. It had apparently, however, taken effect upon the Government, being admitted by them as a necessary corollary to the disestablishment of the Irish Church. He believed, however, that the House, if it had known the steps taken, would never have supported the course which the Government had consequently pursued, and the subject was one of the gravest possible kind in its constitutional as well as in its religious and moral aspect. Formerly, the Colonial Church was supposed to form a portion of the Established Church of England; but it having been formally decided to the disadvantage of the Colonial Church that such was not the case, the latter

Church was entitled to any advantage in its favour that that decision might afford. He wished to know, after that decision, what business an English Minister had to meddle in the concerns of the Colonial Church? Most of our colonies had representative Legislatures, and neither Queen nor Parliament had certainly any right to interfere with their local matters without the concurrence of the local Legislature; and even in the Crown Colonies local matters should only be dealt with by the Representative of the Crown on the spot, in accordance with local public opinion. In no case was the Crown entitled to arbitrarily control colonial local affairs, still less, as in this case, to interfere in a manner contrary to the expressed local will. In the present case the Crown had initiated a scheme of concurrent endowment in the colonies, which was directly opposed to their feelings. Ministers founded on vague principles, arbitrarily laid down, a theory of religious disendowment, with a sole alternative of concurrent endowment, which they had proceeded to force adversely upon the local Legislatures. Lord Derby's Administration had wisely discontinued the grant, amounting to about £20,000 per annum, which had been charged on the Consolidated Fund to the Colonial Church of the West Indies, on the ground that it was an unjust tax upon the British taxpayer, and, now that its temporary object had been attained, was equally opposed to the interests of the Colonial Church. In ecclesiastical as well as in civil and military matters, it was better that every country should be self-dependent. About the same time the Jamaica Clergy Acts expired, and the result of the action of the Government had been that the Jamaica Church had consequently been stripped not only of its English subsidy, but of its own revenues. The very able Governor, Sir John Grant, had, in contemplation of the Clergy Acts expiring, drawn up a scheme for a new arrangement of the local resources of the Jamaica Church under its new circumstances, which he had sent home for approval. Lord Granville, however, instead of sanctioning that scheme, which had received the support of the local Legislature, had said that the moral and religious culture of the subject-race was to be the Governor's object, and not the ascendancy of any particular religious communion. He was not prepared to admit the antithesis. Even if religion were only for the "subject-race," there was no such race in Jamaica; but he thought that the moral and religious culture of the upper classes should be regarded equally with that of the lower classes. As more influential it was even more important, and certainly quite as necessary. The free Legislature of Jamaica had devoted £30,000, out of a total revenue of £300,000, to religious purposes, and had thus clearly expressed its views with regard to what it considered its ecclesiastical requirements; but Lord Granville, in issuing his ukase, had forced the Governor to alter his scheme against his own wishes, and to establish a new system against those of the local Legislature. The Baptists of Jamaica, finding their own offerings falling short, desired a level field and no favour, but that was not the general wish of the oldest and freest of our West India Colonies in its representative days, nor was it now. The Jamaica Church was now, as a voluntary society, to be incorporated by a charter, even the cost of which incorporation it had been required to pay. The whole proceeding was very characteristic of the colonial policy of the party opposite, who were always endeavouring to force doctrines fresh from their experiments in this country down the throats of our Colonies. Sir John Grant wrote to Lord Granville—

"I was offering a scheme, but as not in accordance with your instructions it must be dropped. I will draft another on your basis of religious equality."

Barbadoes had a population of nine-tenths Anglican Church, but the advantages of national worship must be sacrificed to this inexorable theory. General Rawson—

"found them even more unanimous than he had anticipated against the change, and not at all prepared to break up the foundations of their Church, cemented by age."

As a similar instance, it would be recollect that in Ceylon, Lord Grey created a rebellion by forcing upon the island, unprepared, and in a state of panic, the just-adopted principle of free trade. His right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford, who was unable to be present, had placed in his hands a Paper which he had received from the West Indies, in which the writers said that to force upon the West Indian Colonies an ecclesiastical policy which might suit other colonies was a very arbitrary way of dealing with their interests. To say that they would throw upon voluntary resources the Church of the West Indian Colonies was to forget that the peasantry in those islands, upon whom the burden would have to be thrown, were only a generation removed from slavery. Again, there was great inequality between the effects of this treatment on Church and Dissent. The Dissenters had their own congregations in particular places, who collected amongst themselves a sort of joint-stock by voluntary contributions; but the Church had its agencies in all parts, and sought to evangelize the whole of the population without distinction of particular localities. It had to set up its agency often, and especially, where there were none to contribute. Further, the writers of the Paper to which he was referring contended that the disestablishment of the Church in the Colonies was uncalled for, as against the almost unanimous feeling of the people concerned. On the whole, it seemed to him that unless some explanation could be given of the facts which had been set forth, it was a case in which Her Majesty's Government had violated all the constitutional principles of colonial self-government by having, in a most unprecedented and unwarrantable way, forced their own nostrums and doctrines where they had no business to intrude them at all, and appropriated revenues over which they had no control, and imposed force on an unwilling people, exerting the Imperial power in opposition to popular freedom.

Sir Charles Adderley

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House disapproves of the Ecclesiastical Policy of Her Majesty's Government in the Windward Islands and in Trinidad."—(Mr. Charley.)

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN had heard with some degree of regret the speech of his right hon. Friend who had just sat down in which he had charged Her Majesty's Ministers with having "violated every principle of constitutional Government," and of having "forced measures down the throats of Colonial Legislatures contrary to their opinion." Such, he had said was "the general policy of the party opposite." But his (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen's) regret was tempered by the reflection that, in spite of this sweeping charge, the fact remained that since he had occupied the position he then held, upon every single question of colonial policy, Her Majesty's Government had received the cordial and generous support of his right hon. Friend, and by the consequent hope that his withdrawal of that support upon the present occasion was only temporary. His right hon. Friend had spoken of the policy of Her Majesty's Government as having been dictated or suggested by some of the enemies of the Church of England. He, for one, was no enemy of the Church of England, but he was not sure that those were the best friends of the Church who endeavoured to maintain her supremacy in localities where she was in a small minority, and would keep her in such a position before the eyes of the people as to render her unpopular, and so diminish her strength and usefulness. It was urged that the policy of which complaint was made was not a corollary of the disestablishment of the Church in Ireland. He would appeal from the right hon. Gentleman who urged this argument to Gentlemen belonging to his own party, and inform them and the House that the policy complained of was not originated by Her Majesty's present Government, but was, if not actually originated, at any rate taken great part in, by the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a distinguished Member. The right hon. Gentleman said that a Bill brought in in 1868 by the Government of which he was a Member had nothing to do either with the question now before the House or with the disestablishment of the Irish Church. It was very good generalship of his right hon. Friend to introduce this statement, knowing as he must have done that this Bill would be brought up against him in such a debate as the present. But he maintained, on the other hand, that the Bill of which the Duke of Buckingham moved the second reading in 1868 rendered it impossible not to adopt some such policy as had since been followed by Her Majesty's Government. The Duke of Buckingham, in moving the second reading of a Bill to relieve the Consolidated Fund from the annual payment of £20,300 for purposes connected with the Church of England in the West Indies—a grant made on the proposition of Mr. Canning in 1824—stated that the House of Commons was "evidently of opinion that the grant had done its work and was no longer necessary ; " and Lord Cairns, speaking on the same occasion, stated his opinion that the colonies were prepared to provide the cost of maintaining their own Churches. Again, on the same occasion, the Earl of Carnarvon said that in his opinion there was a great deal that was parallel between the case of Ireland and the Church of England in the West Indies. He said that in the West Indies the Established Church, as in Ireland, was the Church of the rich few — a Church whose educated clergy, scattered in the midst of a far less educated race, stood very much in the same relation to the population as did the clergy of the Established Church to the population of Ireland. After the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church, and when speeches like these were made in the Imperial Parliament, and reported in the colonies, was it to be supposed that the matter could rest where it had rested heretofore, or that the whole question must not have been opened up and fairly placed before the colonists themselves as to the position in which they wished the Church of England hereafter to stand in relation to them ? He did not know why his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Adderley) should have objected to religious equality, for he believed they were all in favour of that principle as long as it was not opposed to religious liberty ; and if religious equality could be attained without inflicting wrong on any portion of the community, it was a thing to be desired. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had stood up and was prepared to stand up for the Church of England in this country. But he had always held that there was nothing abstractedly right or wrong in establishment and endowment or the reverse. The question of disestablishment and disendowment must be considered relatively to the real circumstances and position of the particular community with which they had to deal ; and it was quite possible to support the establishment and endowment of the Church of England, and yet to think that her establishment and endowment in other countries was not desirable either for her own interest or for those of the population generally. How did matters stand in Trinidad and the Windward Islands before the policy of Her Majesty's Government was brought forward in regard to them ? Why, the small minority belonging to the Church of England was endowed, whereas the large majority was not endowed at all. It was true that at Barbadoes the Church of England had a very large majority of the population ; but, as to that island, although the policy of the Government had been distinctly placed before the Legislature of Barbadoes, yet when the Legislature objected to the principle which was proposed, no attempt was made to force its adoption upon it ; and it had been confessed by the Mover of this Motion that the Government had performed a graceful act in advising Her Majesty to confirm the Barbadoes Bishop's Act. As to what had been said about Jamaica, if they considered the position of that colony before the disendowment of the Church and its position after that event, they could not fairly come to any other conclusion than that the work which had been done was a good and a wise work. What was the previous condition of Jamaica ? Speaking from memory, he believed about £36,000 was contributed from the revenue to the Church of England, who numbered 25,000 persons as against upwards of 80,000 belonging to Nonconformist bodies. Was this a system which could be defended ? Now, let him quote from that Jamaica despatch of Lord Granville's of which his right hon. Friend complained. Lord Granville said—

" Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that the moral and religious culture of the subject-race, and not the ascendancy of any one communion, ought to be the object of your Government."

His right hon. Friend, quoting this despatch of Lord Granville, said that the moral and religious culture of the lower classes and the subject-race was not so important as that of the upper classes. He could not admit that proposition, but maintained not only that the moral and religious culture of one class was as important as that of the other, but that if either should be the special care of the State, it should be that poorer class which was least able to help itself. But what were the principles that had been laid down by the Government ? Why, that in those islands, in some of which the Church of England was in a majority, and in some in a small minority, it was desirable that instead of letting that Church remain the only endowed religion, it should be proposed to those various colonies that they should either disestablish and disendow all, and leave all to stand on their own merits, or that some concurrent endowment should be adopted consistently with religious equality. And there was a second principle laid down by Lord Granville in a despatch of the 16th November, 1869, in the following words :—

"With less than one third part of those who effectively belong to any Christian communion attached to the Church of England, and with nearly two-fifths of the population never attending any religious services, it would be unjust to devote the proceeds of taxes levied from the whole population, to a body to which so small a portion of that population belongs."

The Government did not, as had been said, impose restrictions on the colonists endowing their own Churches, but it had set its face against the idea that it was right for them to raise taxes from the large body of poor people who did not belong to their communion at all, and to employ those taxes in converting them to their religion. To accuse Lord Kimberley of harshness in that matter was only to show an ignorance of his character, and an unacquaintance with his administration of the colonies, which he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) ventured to say had been marked with an ability which had raised both him and his administration in the good opinion of the world. In St. Vincent's, where it was alleged they had treated the Church of England so badly and reduced her emoluments, 17,000 of the population belonged to that Church, 14,000 to the Wesleyans, and 3,000 to the Roman Catholics. And here the hon. and learned Member for Salford had shown the cloven foot— "What chance," said he, "would those 3,000 Roman Catholics have had of obtaining a share in the endowment, but for the interference of the Government?" Hinc illæ lachrymæ. But where was the justice of the hon. Gentleman? Would he have left things as they were, the Anglicans receiving near £2,200, the Wesleyans £250, the Roman Catholics nothing? What the Government said was that if there was to be concurrent endowment, instead of everything being given to the Anglicans and nothing to others, something more indeed ought to be given to the Anglicans than to the others; but there should also be given to the other religious denominations a fair proportion of the whole grant. In Tobago, the Anglican Church had 9,000 adherents, the Moravians 3,600, the Wesleyans 330. Was it fair that the former should have everything and the others nothing? Was the condition of things previously existing in St. Lucia equal and just? After what we had done in Ireland, would it have been satisfactory to leave things as they were in that island, where there were some 30,000 Roman Catholics and under 2,000 Protestants, the former receiving £900 per annum and the latter £800 supplemented until lately by £200 per annum from the Consolidated Fund? In Trinidad, with 64,000 Roman Catholics to 26,000 members of the Church of England, there were in the local Legislature eight votes to three against disendowment and in favour of concurrent endowment, so that it was untrue to say that concurrent endowment had been forced down the throats of the people. Since then a Petition had reached the Colonial Office in England, signed by upwards of 200 persons, in favour of total disendowment; and it was not improbable, if that principle made progress, that disendowment might eventually be adopted. He might go at great length through all the cases, but he had stated what he believed to be the main reasons for the action of the Government. His own difficulty was to see what different policy the Government could have adopted; and he felt very sure that if hon. Gentlemen opposite had been in power, and his right hon. Friend at the Colonial Office, his fair judgment and candid mind would have led him to adopt that very policy which he repudiated to-night. He could not follow the hon. Member for Salford when he spoke of Governor Rawson as being an honourable man who had been cleverly manipulated; he could only take exception to the use of such an expression; and as to the Government "descending into the gutter," he did not know what it meant, but if it implied anything dishonourable on the part of the Government he could only repudiate the suggestion. He could not see any reason to condemn Governor Rawson for having stated that the Roman Catholics had held a public meeting, and were about to establish a newspaper to advocate their claims. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that dissension had been created. But what was the meaning of the action noted by Governor Rawson? Simply that the Roman Catholics having long been content to rely upon the justice of the Legislature of the Governor and of the Home Government, had found the delay in recognizing their claims so long that they had deemed it desirable to resort to measures which were perfectly legitimate for the furtherance of those claims. Why should the hon. and learned Gentleman object? If he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) was not mistaken, the hon. and learned Gentleman himself frequently made use of public meetings to advance his views, and possibly at some time or other he might have had some connection with newspapers. Why, then, should he blame the Roman Catholics of Grenada for following so good an example?

MR. CHARLEY explained that he meant to say that Her Majesty's Government had fostered agitation in the Island of Grenada against the local Legislature.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, that every interruption only strengthened the case of the Government, and that there was nothing whatever in this or any other despatch to indicate that Her Majesty's Government had taken any part in agitation against the local Legislature. It was true that the latter had changed and re-changed its views, and possibly the action of public meetings and newspapers might, not for the first time, have influenced such change. But Her Majesty's Government had neither the power nor the will to force the Legislature of Grenada to act in this matter against its will. In all these cases, what the Government had done was to place its own views of ecclesiastical policy fairly before the local Legislatures, but in no case had undue pressure been used. In all that he had said, he had advanced nothing which required him to explain or retract expressions which he had used elsewhere in defence of the Establishment of the Church of England in England, and which he was prepared, when necessary, to use again. There were cases in which a great National Church, rooted in the hearts and affections of the people, could not be uprooted and disturbed without doing violent injury to the social, political, and moral welfare of the community; but these considerations did not apply in communities where the majority was of one religious persuasion, and the whole endowment was given to the other. In such cases there could be but one result, the weakening of the moral influence of the endowed religion, little by little, and the spread of principles opposed to religion altogether. Believing that the policy of Her Majesty's Government was founded on truth and justice, and that no Government could have acted on any other principle, he asked the House not to assent to the condemnation of it proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Salford, a condemnation which he was sure would be disapproved by every thinking man in the House, and by the great majority of the people of this country.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was of opinion that anyone who had read the Blue Book on the Table must have come to the conclusion that the meddling of the Earl of Kimberley had interfered with the religious peace of the islands, and that now there were those ecclesiastical disturbances and a state of things which everyone must deplore. In one island — the Island of Grenada—they had the satisfaction of knowing that the Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Lieutenant Governor were putting their heads together for the purpose of circumventing and overruling the wishes of the local Legislature. In another case, the local Government declined to proceed in the course suggested, but after a little judicious manœuvring, one or two Members of the Council were induced to stay away, and by a majority of 1, the policy of Her Majesty's Government received the sanction of the Legislature. Those were circumstances which might be fairly brought before the House of Commons, for the Government were forcing disestablishment and disendowment, or a system of concurrent endowment—a policy which would scarcely have been expected from a Government that had said so much against concurrent endowment in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, in his defence of the Government said, that that policy originated in 1867, when a Conservative Government relieved the Imperial Exchequer of the payment of a sum of £20,000 for the endowment of the Church of England in the West Indies. The necessary result of that, according to the right hon. Gentleman, was that religious equality was to be produced either by disendowment, or by concurrent endowment. He was surprised that the Prime Minister did not run out of the House when he heard the Under Secretary for the Colonies defending concurrent endowment, considering how he had spoken of that means of establishing religious equality in Ireland. The Imperial Parliament had never sanctioned the disendowment of any one of the branches of the Church of England in the Colonies, and in the Act of the English Parliament of 1867-8 there was not one word said either about endowing other denominations, or of disestablishing the English Church in any one of the islands, but it was left entirely to the Colonial Legislatures to say what they would do in support of the local Churches. Her Majesty's Government, however, when they came to deal with the question in 1870, issued a Circular to all the colonial Governors, in which they stated that the principle they had determined should be carried out in the West Indian Islands was perfect religious equality, and they thought the best way to accomplish that was by concurrent endowment. Now, he would ask what liberty, or what freedom was left to the Colonial Legislatures when they were told that a thing had been determined in Downing Street, and done it must be? That was Lord Granville's mandate; but the Earl of Kimberley following him, descended to the most minute particulars, and enforced the sacred principle—that the members of one denomination should not be called upon to pay for the endowment of any other denomination. He would ask the House how that statement could be reconciled with the fact that in one or two colonies, where it was known to the Government that certain religious denominations would not receive any endowment, they were disregarded, and the money was handed over, as in the case of Trinidad, where the Baptists and Presbyterians refused to receive it to the general Exchequer of the island. In that manner it was thought that concurrent endowment might be reconciled with the conscientious scruples of those who would not take any public money, and who thought it the height of injustice that they should be taxed for the support of any other sect. It seemed to him most marvellous that when Government was denouncing all those who were suspected of having a latent leaning towards concurrent endowment in the case of Ireland, they should themselves be forcing it upon the West Indies. Why, even in the present Session, in the debate upon University education in Ireland, the Prime Minister, catching at some words which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), notwithstanding that his right hon. Friend had said the thing was dead, charged him with still entertaining it as a living idea, and of hoping some day or other to make it a practical reality. That was, he thought at the time, a most unjust charge to make, and it seemed most extraordinary that at the very period when the Prime Minister was making that unfounded charge against the right hon. Gentleman, he was himself endeavouring to make the concurrent endowment which he denounced a practical reality in the West Indies through the instrumentality of his noble Friend the Earl of Kimberley. However, having read the Book now on the Table, and seen how, for the last two years, Her Majesty's Government had been systematically engaged in forcing on concurrent endowment, he could understand what was meant by the charge against the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire. To return to the question of colonial freedom and local self-government, the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies told them that Lord Kimberley acted towards the Colonial Legislatures in the kindest and blandest possible manner, and merely reminded them of the moral duty which was incumbent on them not to tax the members of any one denomination for the endowment of another. Well, as respected that he (Lord John Manners) had already shown how his Lordship disregarded that principle in respect to the Baptists and the Presbyterians, who refused to have any endowment whatever, and when defeated in argument by Governor Rawson, he receded from his position, it was only for a moment, still leaving the colonies under the conviction that sooner or later the policy of Downing Street of endowing the different seats in proportion to their numbers, would be forced upon them. If, however, that numerical principle were to be acted upon, what was to be done in one or two of the islands where a large proportion of the inhabitants were not Christian at all? There it was to be permitted to insert the word "Christian" before the word "denomination," and thus the question was brought to a complete state of absurdity. He must also recall to the recollection of the House that which had been so well put by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Salford (Mr. Charley), the possible future application of that principle which the Government had been pressing on the Governments of the colonies, urging them either to adopt the principle of concurrent endowment or the principle of total disendowment. He (Lord John Manners) asked what application all that must have to future questions which had to be submitted to the consideration of that House? He feared no other than a mischievous one. In the case of Barbadoes where there was no contest at all upon the subject, the Church was established and endowed in the reign of Charles II., and it was therefore an older establishment than the present Presbyterian Church of Scotland, which was established in the reign of William III. Now, what was its position in Barbadoes? He had no doubt it would be found that the Church of England had done its work there in a way that would afford no justification to the Prime Minister for proposing its disestablishment. The Church of England in Barbadoes, he believed, was not at all in the same position as the Church of England in Ireland. He believed that the Church of England in the Island of Barbadoes was the Church of the great body of the people. In Trinidad, again, there were three dominant religions as there were three dominant religions in Ireland. He would ask why it should not be suggested to them to apply the Trinidadian experiment with regard to any surplus that might remain, in the case of the Irish Church? If the policy of disestablishment and concurrent endowment in the West Indian Islands was the natural child of the Irish policy of 1868-9, what in five or ten years might not be the views of the present Government of the result of the combined disestablishment of the Irish and the West Indian Churches? He recollects the vehemence which the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had denounced the idea of concurrent endowment, and yet they saw with what pertinacity the policy of concurrent endowment had been forced down the throats of the Colonial Legislatures, and against the advice of Colonial Governors. He hoped that that view of the case would not be disregarded by a discerning House of Commons. He would vote for the Motion, because the policy it condemned was in direct opposition to the principle of colonial self-government which he thought had been established years ago; and because he believed it was forcing the Colonial Legislatures to do that which they did not wish to do.

MR. MACFIE thanked the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) for bringing forward the question, because it showed a series of grave transactions which had been carried out by the Government without asking the opinion of that House, and upon which it had never pronounced its judgment. He felt it was a grievous mistake that great affairs connected with the outlying portions of the Empire should be transacted by the Government without consulting the House of Commons. Here was an important policy being carried out in an important island, and which, if carried to its legitimate consequences, would be undoing the policy which that House had laid out for itself since 1868, and preparing the way for concurrent endowment in Ireland. He could not vote for such a policy, lest his constituents might call him to account, and say he was preparing the way for that which they sent him to that House not to favour, but to oppose. He hoped the Government would be able to give some explanation to ease their minds on the subject, and justify the trust they had hitherto reposed in them.

MR. NEWDEGATE: What the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Macfie) has said, Sir, is much to the purpose. I cannot listen to the discussions between the right hon. Gentlemen who sit upon the two front benches without feeling that the policy of this country upon ecclesiastical questions has been cast loose ever since the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church in Ireland, which is now very generally admitted to have been a mistake; but it appears that that measure was not intended to be an isolated policy for Ireland, but that that policy has been pursued in the Colonies. I cannot avoid coming to the conclusion that if this country is to have a decided policy, it must be decided by the people, and not by the politicians of this House. We have now had this illustration—that although in Barbadoes an enormous majority of the people are attached to the Church of England, Her Majesty's Government were not in the slightest degree biassed by that circumstance, but sought by all means to disestablish the Church to which the majority of the people are attached. That cannot be denied. It may be called very liberal to make such a suggestion to the people of Barbadoes, and we may be told that the people of Barbadoes have exercised their choice, and that nothing could be more satisfactory than their decision that they will not part with their Established Church. But this controversy has another result. The Government have wrung out of this policy of disestablishment an endowment for the Roman Catholic Church; they have established in Barbadoes the principle of concurrent endowment, although they failed in their attempt to disestablish the Church of England in that colony. Now, Sir, it is perfectly manifest upon the admission of the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, that Her Majesty's Government have no policy upon these subjects, except that of obedience—where they cannot help it—to the majority of the people. Let us consider these two principles—disestablishment and concurrent endowment. It seems evident that the way to concurrent endowment is through disestablishment. I stated my conviction that that would be discovered when the proposal was before the House for the disestablishment of the Church of Ireland; and what is the fact even in Ireland already? Why, that the convents and priories of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland are virtually endowed, through the administration of the grant for national education. That is the fact. If the majority of this House object to the principle of concurrent endowment, they made a mistake in adopting the principle of disestablishment. The point you have reached is this—that the opinions and the position of every denomination are valued by the politicians of this House exactly in proportion to the political power which each denomination happens to possess.

That, Sir, is the lesson that I have long sought to impress upon the Protestants of this country. I tell them that they are slumbering in an unsafe position; that they are deluded into a false security; that if they suppose that the political power of more active denominations will not increase through their inaction, they are deceived. I warn them not to look for security to any political or partisan connection. There is but one security for them—political action! In that is their only security for the retention of their religious establishments and their own religious freedom. That is the lesson which the discussion of this night is calculated to enforce; and I trust that it will not be thrown away upon the people of this country. They have this illustration in the Colonies—that by their having unfortunately sanctioned—and I hope that what I now say will reach the ears of the people of Scotland—by their having unfortunately, and by mistake, sanctioned the principle of disestablishment, they have given an impetus to a principle that leads directly to concurrent endowment—the very principle to which they are opposed. That is the political lesson which I derive from the discussion this night, and I shall tell every Protestant that I have the honour of meeting or addressing, that he must look to political action alone if he desires to preserve the religious institutions he values, or even to be permitted a fair hearing in this House.

SIR ROBERT TORRENS said, he had entertained the opinion that concurrent endowment was an excellent thing in those new countries where there was a scattered population and great difficulty in supporting a resident clergy. He had seen, however, from his experience in Australia, in cases in which such endowment had been done away with, a greater amount of zeal and energy exhibited by the Church of England than she had ever previously displayed. He had thus become a convert to the principle of abolishing all endowments from the facts which had passed before his eyes.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 69; Noes 83: Majority 14.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND REVENUES.
ADDRESS FOR A ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. T. HUGHES, in rising to move

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the amount and application of the revenues of the Church of England and into the system of parochial benefices, with a view to the better adjustment of parishes and incomes, and the amendment of the Law relating to patronage," said, that his Motion was a necessary result of the decision of the House upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall). By that Motion the House had been asked to resign all control over the Church of England. This, it had refused to do by a very large majority, and, surely, if they were not prepared to give up control, they were bound to do the work of control efficiently. He accepted, but in no humiliating sense, what the hon. Member for Bradford had said—that the National Church belonged to the State as the Army, Navy, and Civil Service did; that the House was bound to exercise authority over it; and that, if the House did not, no other power could. Convocation and synods were trying to do so, but they were not acknowledged by the country. He contended that it was the duty of the House to exercise its control over the patronage and discipline of the Church of England, and so prevent ecclesiastical matters in general falling into ecclesiastical hands, because at this present time in every country in Europe the ecclesiastical powers were endeavouring to assert their authority against the civil powers in these matters. The House ought either to give up its power or to make it real; and if the House would do its duty in this matter it would place England in a position which would be the envy of other countries that were disturbed by ecclesiastical controversies. His Motion dealt with abuses that were vehemently attacked by Nonconformists, and of which no Churchman could deny the existence. The first was the flagrantly unequal distribution of the revenues of the Church. He wished to obtain authoritatively information on this subject, as to which we had now nothing but the vague result of personal inquiry. There was no other power but Parliament that could really ascertain the facts, and one of their first duties was to supply the public with accurate information in reference to Church revenues. As an instance of the grievous inequality which existed under the present system he would refer to one rural deanery, by no means an exceptional one. In this deanery there were 23 livings, of these the eight largest had a total income of £8,000 a-year, with church accommodation for only 3,233 persons, while the 15 smaller livings had a total income of only £2,012 a-year, with church accommodation for 6,097 persons. The result was that with half the population and half the church accommodation the eight richer livings had four times the income of the other 15 livings. Such inequalities surely called for some action on the part of the House and of the Government. The Ecclesiastical Commission had furnished with reference to caputular estates precisely the kind of information which he asked the House to offer to the country with respect to the other temporalities of the Church. As to parochial and other portions of the revenue of the Church, they had no official and reliable information since the Commission of 1832; but, in the meantime, the number of benefices had increased by 5,000; and, on the other hand, there had been a great shifting of population. Proper statistical Returns were urgently required. That private persons could not obtain them was beyond question. At the request of the Church Reform Association, the Rev. Mr. Fowle had devoted much time to the inquiry; but had confessed that the results he arrived at could not be relied on as accurate. On his assumption that a population of 300 was enough to give active work to a single clergyman, and that £200 a-year was the lowest on which he could live properly, the inquiries he instituted brought out the following results:—There were 409 livings in which there was neither work, nor food; 1,141 in which there was food, but no work; and 3,032 in which there was work, but no food. It certainly was time that these anomalies should be inquired into and redressed. Another point was the question of patronage. Convocation which represented the Church complained of the manner in which patronage was at present exercised, and recommended certain proposals which would remedy the existing grievous system. It was, he thought, important that the House should take the matter up and deal with these recommendations. In 1867, out of 12,088 benefices in the Church of England, as many as 6,403, or more than one half, were in private hands. His Motion affected only the temporalities and lands of the Church, and he thought it was time that the House undertook to deal, at any rate, with that part of the subject. There was no way at present of getting at the value of those temporalities. They were estimated—tithes and rentals—at £1,949,000; lands acquired since the Reformation, £2,251,051; voluntary collections and other items of income, £5,445,000; making a total of over £9,645,500. Other estimates, of course, were very different; but he gave those which appeared to have been the most carefully worked out. It appeared from that, that it was computed that nearly £10,000,000 a-year was allowed by the House to be used, and to remain in a form which all members of the Church of England who took an interest in that subject agreed to be one of great abuse, and unfortunate for the Establishment itself. Therefore, whether for the removal of scandal from the Church, whether as a step towards her reform on the one hand, or towards her disestablishment on the other, there was the strongest ground for obtaining either by a Commission, or in some other way, such statistics and details as he asked for by his Motion, with a view to Parliament making that control and supervision a reality which it had so peremptorily refused to give up. He would admit that what the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had done in regard to collecting information and raising the smaller livings, was good as far as it went; but it was quite inadequate to meet the real requirements of the case. The hon. Member concluded by moving for the Address.

MR. LEATHAM: I am glad, Sir, that my hon. and learned Friend has had the opportunity of bringing forward his Motion, and more especially because he has thus raised the whole question of Church patronage. As I have given some little attention to this subject, perhaps the House will permit me to supplement my hon. and learned Friend's facts by a few others. And, in the first place, with regard to the number of livings which are actually at this moment in the market and in the hands of agents for sale, I had the curiosity the other day to take up a number of The Ecclesiastical Gazette—an organ which I think The Saturday Review assures us is the official paper of the Bishops. The first name of an advertising agent which I found in the columns of this paper—May 13th—was that of Mr. Ancona, of John Street, Adelphi. I procured his register of livings for sale, and found that it contained particulars of 94 advowsons and next presentations. Returning to the Gazette, I found Mr. Lara's monthly selection of Church property—namely, eight advowsons and next presentations. Then came Mr. Stark's advertisement. His register for May contains about 180 advowsons, next presentations, district churches, and Episcopal chapels for sale. He states on the cover, that—

"He begs to remind intending purchasers that he has always many desirable, and—in some cases—cheap livings passing through his hands privately," and he also "takes this opportunity of reminding clients of the absolute necessity there exists, whenever a parish is visited, of the object of these visits being kept strictly private."

The House therefore may imagine this intrepid purchaser—this successor of the Apostles, prowling like a poacher about the future scenes of his ministrations, peeping like an area sneak into the windows of the capital rectory house; but, above all things, taking up a retired but commanding position in the parish church, from which, during Divine service, he may take stock of the age and infirmities of the incumbent. The next advertisement is Mr. Corbett's. Mr. Corbett's list contains 46 advowsons and next presentations. Then we come to Mr. Bagster's monthly register of church preferments for sale for May—104 advowsons and next presentations. Then to the advertisement of The Church and School Gazette, conducted by graduates of Oxford and Cambridge. The Rev. W. Powell Jones, who edits this Gazette, informs us that he has 700 livings on his books, but on procuring his register, I find particulars of only 114. He prefacing his list by the observation, that—

"It was held by a very eminent Prelate, lately deceased, that 'you might just as well call the buying and selling of a vacant living magic, as call it after the folly of Simon Magus.'"

Now, adding the 15 isolated advertisements of the sale of livings, which are to be found in this copy of The Ecclesiastical Gazette to the advertisements of livings contained in the various registers which I have named, we arrive at 561 as the number of livings which are advertised for sale in one number of this paper. There are 13,276 livings in the country, of which 21 are in the gift of the parishioners themselves, 580 are in the gift of trustees, 4,800 in that of the Crown, the Bishops, deans, and chapters, the Universities, and so forth, leaving about 7,900, of the annual value of some £2,000,000, in private hands. So that about one-fourteenth of the saleable patronage of the Church is up in the market at the same time. But perhaps I shall be told—such is the eagerness of vendors to effect sales—that they sometimes employ more than one agent. Very well. Let us set the duplicate advertisements against the private sales to which frequent reference is made by the agents, and we still have 561 as the number of livings for sale. But, I contend that we are entitled to add largely to this number from the lists of livings advertised for exchange. Exchange in this connection is a prettier word than sale. Many livings are advertised "for sale with an exchange of preferment." For example, Mr. Ancona advertises—

"Advowson, Western County. Price, with possession, £13,000; but if preferred, the incumbent would accept in reduction of such purchase money the presentation to an eligible living of, say, £600 nett."

Not long ago a clergyman applied to all the agents whose names he could learn about a living for exchange, and in every case he received in reply particulars of livings for sale. Suppose that an agent published only one list of livings, which was headed "For exchange," and that several of his advertisements appeared in the lists of other agents as those of livings for sale; suppose, further, that when you applied for this list, you received along with it a paper, headed, "Particulars of Church preferment for sale or exchange," in which the space left blank for "Price asked for advowson, or next presentation," precedes that for "Particulars, if for exchange;"—now this is a fact, there is such a register—and what is the inference which anyone would draw? Is it not that this decorous register of livings for exchange is virtually a register of livings for sale? But if the House will reflect, they will see that an exchange has always more or less of the nature of a sale about it. And that that is the view taken by the agents is evident, for while they charge only one commission in the case of a sale, in the case of an exchange they charge two—one to each party to the transaction. Well, I infer from all this that we are entitled, if we please, to add largely to the number of livings for sale which I have given. Now, as to the actual business done. Mr. Bagster advertises a register of purchasers 300 strong. Mr. Stark

"begs to announce that in consequence of the very large number of sales during the last few months, he is at the present time somewhat short of preferments to meet the demands of the numerous bond Ado purchasers who are looking to him for preferments;"

and in the same number of this Gazette he states that his sales, since the last issue, are 10 in number. Now, if Mr. Stark is generally as successful, and the other agents are equally fortunate in proportion to the number of livings which they advertise, I calculate that at that rate the whole saleable Establishment would be turned over in less than 19 years. Now, let us turn to the advertisements themselves. They constitute a valuable contribution to the history of our manners and customs, affording as they do indisputable evidence with regard to the tastes and habits of that most important class—the clergy. A gentleman has carefully analyzed 400 of their advertisements. He found "good society" in 107; e.g.—"Rector of this parish has the entrée of the best county society," "good society and no squire"—"in this parish are five gentlemen's houses, two of them belonging to, and occupied by, a baronet and an admiral." Beautiful scenery appears in 53, fishing in 31, shooting in nine, hunting in six, and rookeries in three. Stabling is a great item. There is stabling for eight horses in one case, for seven in another, for six in four, for five in five, &c. Then there is the health and age of the incumbent. "Incumbent about 80, and in a very precarious state of health, so that an early sale is desired." "Population, 1,800; annual value, £1,800; incumbent (the advertiser), aged 58;" but he is, it is believed, in a very bad state of health. Then comes smallness of population. "Population under 100, duty nominal." "Almost a sinecure, population under 100, income £400." "Almost a sinecure, single service and no school." A Lancashire rectory is advertised—"No cure of souls; incumbent 77 and non-resident; £450 per annum." One in Shropshire—"Stables for five horses; net income £800; population 1,740; duty only on every alternate Sunday." There are some items of intelligence which one might think would find a place in these advertisements, which are "conspicuous by their absence." Out of the whole 400, only 14 contain any reference to religious views. Three High Churchmen are wanted, and 11 Evangelicals. The owner of a Yorkshire vicarage was evidently born far north. He says—"High Church; but Evangelical would do for this parish." The owner of a Dorsetshire vicarage is a real man of business. "The incumbent, on his furniture being taken for 400 guineas, would get his successor presented to the incumbency." Now, perhaps, the House would like to know who these gentlemen are who cater so pleasantly for the clerical appetite. Well, I must refer them to four admirable letters, signed "Promotion by Merit," which appeared in The Manchester Examiner last winter, and have been re-published. The writer of those letters was able, by means of The Clergy List, to identify 43 vendors in Mr. Stark's list for October. I have always heard that the aristocracy are averse to trade; but this evidently does not apply to trade in all its branches, for one Duke, one Marquess, two Earls, a Dowager Marchioness, a Countess, a Baron, not to mention two Baronets, figure in the list. I will only name one—the noble President of the National Free and Open Church Association—the Earl of Shrewsbury. At the anniversary of that Society last year, his Lordship remarked that "It was the duty of Churchmen to endeavour to leave Mr. Miall and his friends no tangible ground for attacks upon the Church," and he offers the next presentation of Burghfield, Berks, "with a capital rectory-house, glebe, and a tithe rent-charge, amounting to about £1,120 per annum." But, Sir, it sometimes happens that the agents do not effect a sale. The case is urgent; the incumbent is very old; or perhaps it is thought that the best price is likely to be obtained by a healthy public competition. Then the living is put up to auction. During the last 12 months four parish churches have been put up at Liverpool, St. Ann's, St. Paul's, St. Catherine's, and St. Philip's. In this last case a clergyman is the seller, and he offers the "valuable advowson of St. Philip's, of the value of £400 to £500, with prospect of an increase." "The Church enjoys the privilege of marrying from all parts of the town." Ovington was put up at the Auction Mart, Tokenhouse Yard, on March 19th. The patron and rector, Rev. C. Fisher, advertised "Capital hunting, fishing, and good society; capital rectory-house, coach-house, stabling, green-house, and good water." He said that he had reached the advanced age of 53. Somehow or other this age did not appear to the spiritual speculator so advanced as it appeared to him, and there was no sale. Trehaverock, in Cornwall, was put up on April 3rd. Trehaverock presents many modest attractions. There is no duty, no residence required, and the parsonage seems to be usefully occupied as a public-house. On Ash Wednesday, thanks to the vote of this House, hon. Members had the opportunity of adjourning to Tokenhouse Yard to see the Church transact her temporal business. Two livings were put up on that day. Dodbrook in South Devon and Falmouth. The age of the incumbent of Dodbrook, was asserted in the advertisements to be 68. He wrote, however, before the sale to say that it was only 56, and though—

"The parish and neighbourhood afford excellent society, and the general state of Church feeling is good, there being but one Dissenting place of worship in the parish."

that announcement acted as a fatal damper, and there was no sale. By an Act of Charles II.—into the origin and details of which, perhaps, we had better not minutely inquire, because that Prince had a good many odd people about him, whom he was anxious to reward, and had odd ways of rewarding them—a rate of 16d. in the pound is directed to be levied for the parson of Falmouth and his successors for ever on all houses, shops, warehouses, cellars, and out-houses within the parish of Falmouth. With tithe and harbour dues that rate amounts to about £1,700 per annum. Last year the living fell vacant, a gentleman of 77 was appointed, and the living thrown on the market. It was bought in at the sale. The last instance which I shall give is that of Hilgay, in Norfolk, of the annual value of nearly £1,420. This living was offered for sale on May 20th, and along with an hon. Friend of mine I visited the Auction Mart at the time appointed. The auctioneer informed us that of late years that kind of property had become the most difficult to deal with of any which they had to deal with then, owing to the attacks which the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Miall) had made upon the Church, but, he added after the speech of the Prime Minister the other night, we shall hear no more of disestablishment for many a long day. He has evidently formed a different opinion from that of the Bishop of Peterborough, who, in reference to the same event, warned the Diocesan Conference at Leicester "not to put their trust in Princes, or in politicians, or in Premiers." But with regard to Hilgay, the living fell vacant last year, and the rev. Canon St. Vincent Beesley was appointed. When he took leave of his old parishioners last October, he spoke of the "Grace of the Great Shepherd and Bishop of Souls which had disposed the kindly hearts and generous impulses of patrons to seek the best spiritual superintendence they could obtain for the people they are called upon to provide for," and of his own preference as "coming from the spontaneous desire of a faithful widowed patron to carry out her husband's own desire that his people be ministered to by a successor in their curate."

Poor charitable but withal, misguided Canon! He did not know, that it was not the fact that 40 years before he had been curate in the parish, but the accumulated experience of 67 years which made him so valuable an acquisition; that the living was ordered to be sold by the will of his predecessor; and that his 67 years would be made more of at the sale than even the "good dining-rooms, wines and beer cellars, piggeries, and stabling for eight horses." Now, Sir, I know that, as my hon. Friend has said, the Bishops condemn all this sort of thing. "The sale of a living is a scandal, an evil, an abuse of a high and solemn trust," says the Bishop of Manchester. But who preaches loudest the Bishop of Manchester or the Archdeacon of Sudbury, who sells the advowson of Yalding, in Kent, "net income, say, £1,950, incumbent 72, price £13,000, of which £7,000 must be paid down?" And of all the Bishops who condemn, one only—so far as I know, has any material remedy to suggest, and that is the Bishop of Exeter. He proposes to throw the burden of the redemption of patronage on the Ecclesiastical Commissioners—in other words, to hand over to rich patrons funds set apart to meet the wants of poor districts; and that is a remedy which I think will scarcely meet with much favour in this House. Failing the Bishops, we turn to my hon. and learned Friend. What is the remedy which he has proposed to-night? To prohibit the sale of next presentations. My hon. and learned Friend is a man of sound sense. Where then does he get his credulity? Is he not acquainted with the history of the Church in relation to patronage? Does he not know that advowsons will be sold with a verbal agreement that they will be handed back or re-sold the moment that the desired appointment is made? Failing then the Bishops, and failing my hon. and learned Friend, where shall we turn for a remedy? Shall we turn to the Chancellor of the Exchequer? Will he come down to the House some day very early in April, and ask us to tax the people, in order that we may abolish purchase in the Church, as we have abolished purchase in the Army? Or will the Church herself come to the rescue? Will members of the Church assemble in Exeter Hall—say, under the presidency of the Earl of Shrewsbury, or the Archdeacon of Sudbury—and subscribe £10,000,000 sterling in order to wipe out this scandal? No, Sir, there is only one alternative—keep your State Church, and keep with it that system of patronage upon which it is founded, and which is firmly built into its structure. Do away with your State Church, and at the same time get rid for ever of a system which sears the public conscience, lowers the whole national conception of religion, and poisons at its source the fountain of sweetness and light.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the amount and application of the revenues of the Church of England and into the system of parochial benefices, with a view to the better adjustment of parishes and incomes and the amendment of the Law relating to patronage,"—(Mr. Thomas Hughes.)

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, the speech of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) was, no doubt, very amusing and imaginative, and redolent with some of the wildest and most rollicking statistics he had ever heard applied in that House, and when applied to the solemn subject on which they were engaged, he considered it did great credit to his literary powers. He (Mr. B. Hope) thought they should trust in this matter to the revived spirit of religion, the influence of public opinion, and the activity of the Church. The crude invention of a Commission, hastily appointed in a thin House, was not the remedy to apply to the state of things to which the hon. and learned Member for Frome had drawn attention, and the existence of which he (Mr. B. Hope) would admit. Besides, who was to appoint the Commission—the Government, the Opposition, both together, or the two Houses of Convocation. A Commission appointed by either one or other of those bodies would not command public confidence, while the result of their labours must end in their issuing a sterile Report upon the subject. In any case, it must be greatly hampered in discharging its task.

MR. D. DALRYMPLE said, he must remind the House that the last speaker had entirely begged the question, and had not controverted any of the facts adduced. For himself, he would rather trust the honour of the Church to a Commission than to those persons who were trying to stifle discussion on the flagrant scandal of the sale of livings. The thinness of the House was no reason for refusing a Commission. As a Churchman, he trembled for the Church, more on account of the abuses which existed within it and its increasing dissensions and schisms than on account of the attacks of the hon. Member for Bradford. There were, no doubt, great difficulties to be got over; but the abuse of selling livings for the cure of souls ought to be got rid of in one way or another. He lived in a parish the livings of which had been put up for sale several times, and deplored the evils which attended that system. If that was the way in which livings in the Church of England were to be disposed of, he was afraid evil consequences would follow. If any remedial action were proposed to be adopted, necessarily the first demand would be for facts, and therefore the inquiry should be granted.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he sympathized with the object the hon. and learned Member for Frome had in view; but he objected to his Motion on the ground that there was already available, without the proposed inquiry, sufficient information for all practical purposes as regarded doing away with all the existing evils complained of. He regretted, therefore, he could not vote with the hon. and learned Member. He considered it would be the worst possible thing that could happen to the Church if they took away the great prizes that existed in the shape of the rich livings of the country, offering as they did to members of the Church the only inducements to elevate themselves in its service. He also believed that it was essential that lay patronage should exist, and that the advowson should always go with the land. The person holding the advowson held it in trust for the public benefit, and on that consideration he could not support the sale of the advowson any more than he would support the sale of a vote.

MR. BRUCE said, he had no doubt that the object of the hon. and learned Member for Frome in proposing the Motion was to benefit the Church. Although he sympathized with his hon. and learned Friend in his wish that the fullest information should be obtained on this subject, he could not help thinking that his statement was overcharged. His hon. and learned Friend should have remembered what progress had been made with reference to this subject in the last 40 years. Since that time the property of Bishops, of chapters, and ecclesiastical corporations had been very largely and very wisely dealt with, and great good had been done in distributing the wealth of the Church among the poorer districts. He doubted whether any action of Parliament could have effected greater progress than had been effected in that period by the action of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. He thought the information as to the value of ecclesiastical livings could be obtained without a Royal Commission. As to the question of patronage, he thought Parliament would not desire that that matter should be inquired into unless it was also prepared to deal with it. His hon. Friend opposite had proposed a remedy; but he did not think the House was prepared to enter into the question of patronage. If they abolished patronage, what system could they substitute for it? They should observe what was occurring in Scotland, and meanwhile his hon. and learned Friend should remember that there were defects in all systems. He thought that with so little prospect of serious Parliamentary action the House should not entrust so important a subject to a Commission. But he was willing to undertake, in conjunction with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to ascertain what means of obtaining information could be placed in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commission, as to the number of livings, the amount of property, and the other information sought by his hon. and learned Friend's Motion.

MR. T. HUGHES said, he was thankful for small mercies, so on the understanding that his right hon. Friend would arrange for extending the inquiries of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to parochial revenues, he would withdraw his Motion.

Question put, and negatived.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT
ACT, 1871.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to consider what changes it is desirable to make in the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1871." —
(Mr. Auberon Herbert.)

MR. BRUCE opposed the Motion as one to which it would be impossible to give effect at the present late period of the Session, and pointed out that in the metropolitan district only eight persons had been convicted under the Act during the past year, adding that it did not operate in the case of the working classes with that exceptional severity which some appeared to suppose. Magistrates were becoming more familiar with its interpretation, and their decisions were much less severe than they had been at first. Under all the circumstances, he could not accede to his hon. Friend's Motion.

MR. MUNDELLA said, that the effect of the Act had been to produce heart-burning and a sense of injustice wherever it was put in operation. In many cases its penalties had fallen outside its intended circuit—the Chipping Norton case, for example, where women had been sent needlessly to prison. He thought the Government would have done well to grant the inquiry.

MR. WHALLEY concurred in what had been said by the last speaker, and supported the Motion for an inquiry.

MR. G. MONCKTON defended the Act, and was glad that the Government had resisted the Motion for inquiry.

MR. AUBERON HERBERT regretted that the Government had not assented to the Motion, and said that unless they promised an inquiry early next Session, he should insist on the House going to a division on the question:

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 85; Noes 39: Majority 4.

LANGBAURGH CORONERS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Secretary BRUCE, Bill to authorise the division of the wapentake of Langbaugh, in the county of York, into districts for the purpose of Coroners jurisdiction, and the appointment of additional Coroners for the said wapentake, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary BRUCE and Mr. WINTERBOTHAM.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 242.]

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 16th July, 1873.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Wild Birds Protection, Mr. Samuelson discharged, Mr. Wykeham Martin added.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Wild Animals (Scotland)* [243].

Second Reading—Labourers' Cottages (Scotland) [88], put off; Municipal Elections (Cumulative Vote) [206], debate adjourned; Public Health Act (1872) Amendment* [238].

Considered as amended—Intestates Widows and Children* [214].

Third Reading—Exchequer Bonds (£1,600,000)* [230]; Treasury Chest Fund* [233]; Turnpike Acts Continuance, &c. * [199]; Revising Barristers* [221], and passed.

Withdrawn—Weights and Measures (Metric System) [90]; Parliamentary Electors Registration [26].

Mr. Bruce

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES (METRIC SYSTEM) BILL—[BILL 90.]

(Mr. John Benjamin Smith, Sir Charles Adderley, Sir Thomas Buxley, Mr. Tarr, Mr. Baines, Mr. Pell, Mr. Muntz, Mr. Dalglish.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading, read.

SIR THOMAS BAZLEY, in the absence of the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith)—who undertook to deal with this subject—moved that the Order for the Second Reading of the Bill should be discharged.

On Question, That the said Order be discharged,

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he ought to be the last person to object to the Order being discharged, as he had always been opposed to the Bill becoming law; but he desired to represent the great inconvenience of the system of allowing Notices of Bills to appear on the Notice Paper, after the intention had been conceived of withdrawing them. It deluded hon. Members by bringing some down unnecessarily, and preventing others coming who would be there to take part on other Bills. In the present case, many hon. Members had come down to oppose the Bill; but he himself knew at 7 o'clock last night, through the kindness of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, that the Bill would be withdrawn, but other hon. Members did not know, and the course which had been pursued, though technically right, was a very inconvenient and unseemly proceeding. Some means should be taken of informing hon. Members when it was intended that a Bill should be withdrawn.

MR. MUNTZ agreed that it was very inconvenient that a Notice should be allowed to remain on the Paper after it had been determined to put the question off to a future time. He had had no intimation that the Bill would be withdrawn, and when he heard of the illness of his hon. Friend the Member for Stockport, he came down to the House with the intention of moving the second reading of the Bill, and should have done so, only that he was informed that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Staffordshire (Sir Charles Adderley), whose name was on the back of the Bill, and the President of the Board of Trade had agreed that the Bill should be withdrawn. Until just now, he had not the slightest idea of any such interference, and he thought if such an arrangement had been come to between those right hon. Gentlemen, the House should have had Notice of it.

MR. COLLINS observed that Notice should have been given not only on account of the Bill itself, but on account of those other Bills upon the Paper, which were affected by the withdrawal of the first one. It was most desirable that hon. Members who intended to withdraw Bills should take the trouble to inform the House through the ordinary channels of information, that such Bills would not be proceeded with. He had himself on the Paper a Bill, fourth in order, the Municipal Elections (Cumulative Vote) Bill, and he had no opportunity of letting his Friends know that there was a chance of its coming on that day.

SIR DOMINIC CORRIGAN endorsed the observations which had fallen from hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House, as to the inconvenience that accrued to hon. Members from the system of withdrawing Bills without previous Notice. He had come down to the House, at some inconvenience, to support the Bill, in which he took a deep interest, and until the Order of the Day was read by the Clerk at the Table, he had never heard a word of the intention to withdraw it.

MR. STEVENSON, who had given Notice of a Motion for the rejection of the Bill, expressed an opinion that the more the question was discussed the more public opinion would come to the conviction that it would be undesirable to pass it into a law.

MR. BAINES said, he should be sorry if any undue blame should fall on his hon. Friend the Member for Stockport, who was ill. He was informed that his hon. Friend did take measures to acquaint hon. Gentlemen whose names were on the back of the Bill, that he would not be able to be present. Although his own name was upon the back of the Bill, he did not know until a few minutes before it was called on, that it was not to be proceeded with. It was evident that the inconvenience was great and general, and he hoped it would be understood that it was the duty of any hon. Gentleman who, from any cause should be unable to proceed with a public measure, to give full public Notice in future of his inability to do so. In this case, however, he held the hon. Gentleman the author of the Bill free of all blame in the matter.

Question put, and agreed to.

Order discharged:—Bill withdrawn.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTORS REGIS-TRATION BILL.—[Bill 32.]

(Mr. Fawcett, Mr. Baines, Mr. McLaren.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading, read.

MR. PELL said, that he had to ask for the indulgence of the House in allowing him to withdraw the Bill. If an excuse were required, his answer would be that he had had an honest intention to have the question fully discussed; but since he introduced the Bill, the Government had passed another measure, which had reduced his own to a state of coma. He begged to move that the Order be discharged.

On Question, That the said Order be discharged.

MR. GOLDSMID thought that the hon. Member ought to have given Notice to the Clerk at the Table, that the Bill would not be gone on with that day. It was quite time that something should be done to put a stop to the practice which was springing up.

MR. J. LOWTHER remarked that when it was intended to withdraw a Bill public Notice to that effect should be given instead of following the irregular practice of going to the Clerk at the Table and getting the Order set aside without the knowledge of the House.

MR. CANDLISH remarked that it would have been easy for the hon. Gentleman last evening at 10 minutes to 7 to have withdrawn the Bill with the permission of the House.

MR. COLLINS said, what his hon. Friend ought to have done was to have given Notice that he would that day move that the Order be discharged.

MR. PELL said, he was in the House yesterday until the last moment, and had no opportunity whatever of giving Notice that he intended to move that the Order be discharged.

Question, put, and agreed to.

Order discharged:—Bill withdrawn.

Mr. Baines

LABOURERS COTTAGES (SCOTLAND)
BILL—[Bill 83.]

(Mr. Fordyce, Mr. McCemie, Mr. Barclay, Sir George Balfour, Mr. Parker.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [18th June], “That the Bill be now read a second time;” and which Amendment was, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day three months.”—(Sir James Elphinstone.)

Question again proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question.”

Debate resumed.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that if nobody thought it his duty to rise and enter a protest against that most remarkable measure, he at least felt compelled to do so. Some discussion took place a few weeks ago upon the Bill, and there appeared then to be a general understanding that the discussion of the subject was not likely to be resumed in the present Session. An hon. and gallant Friend of his the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone)—whose absence on that occasion they all regretted, especially the cause of it—moved the rejection of the Bill, and he (Mr. Lowther) had certainly listened in vain to hear any argument in its favour. Clause 2 said that the tenant of a farm was to be entitled, at his own will and discretion, to erect buildings upon that farm, and in subsequent clauses it was provided that the tenant might compel the landlord at the expiration of his lease to buy the buildings. A more monstrous or outrageous proposition was never submitted to Parliament. Hon. Members might tell them that there were exceptional reasons for passing a measure of this kind for Scotland. On the other hand, they had been constantly told that, owing to the system of leases, the Scotch tenant was in a better position, and was more of a capitalist, than his fellow in England; and if that were so, there was less reason for applying legislation of this kind to Scotland than to any other part of the United Kingdom. Moreover, the difficulty of providing sufficient cottage accommodation was not exclusively felt in agricultural districts. Anybody who knew anything of the mining districts must be perfectly well aware that that was a difficulty which had always been felt; and on an estate with which he was himself not wholly disconnected, a practice had prevailed for many years of giving the colliery lessee power under his lease to erect such cottages as might be necessary for the efficient working of the colliery, and at the expiration of the term of his lease he was to give his landlord notice of the exercise of the right of pre-emption, or restore the ground to its original condition. Now, Clause 2 would almost lead the House to believe that that was the intention of the Bill; but if such was the intention, it was entirely over-ridden by the subsequent clauses. It was a crude and ill-digested scheme, and he protested against dealing in an exceptional manner with one portion of the United Kingdom in matters of the kind, and he begged to move that the Order be discharged.

Mr. SPEAKER said, that there was an Amendment before the House—That the Bill should be read a second time that day six months—and until that Amendment was disposed of, no other Amendment could be moved.

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, the Amendment would answer his purpose equally well, and he should vote for it.

Mr. STAPLETON said, it was alleged when the Bill was last under discussion that it would prove a dead-letter; but he did not think it was open to the charge brought against it by the hon. Member for York. If it were not an effectual Bill, it was at least a very innocent one, because it threw the burden of constructing these cottages upon the tenant. It was also a very necessary measure, for the erection of labourers' cottages was actually requisite on many estates in Scotland. The whole purport of the Bill was to enable a tenant, if he had a farm on which there was not sufficient labourers' accommodation, to erect cottages; and the fact that he was a leaseholder was rather an argument in its favour, because he could not threaten to throw up the farm unless the landlord erected cottages, and he must either conduct his agricultural operations with insufficient accommodation for his labourers, or he must construct cottages himself. It was not to the common interest that a farmer should occupy a holding without sufficient houses for his labourers, and he thought it would be unjust that the burden should be thrown entirely upon him.

Mr. WHITWELL thought it was clear that the tenant could not under the Bill erect as many cottages as he chose—he could only erect cottages where they were actually required. If there were no cottages in the immediate neighbourhood of the farm for the use of the labourers, and the landlord would not erect any, surely it could not be any very great hardship on the landlord that at the end of the lease he should be obliged to take possession of those which the tenant had erected, and which were actually needed, at their fair value.

Mr. BERESFORD HOPE said, that looking at the Bill, it seemed to him to be one to enable a speculative tenant to run up cottages, and then to let them in lodgings without any control on the part of the landlord or anybody else who had the decency and well-being of the country at heart. He supposed Scotland was like England, and anyone who knew anything of the agricultural population of England must know that the great obstacle to good and sufficient cottage accommodation was the herding of persons together in cottages against all decency. That Bill allowed the tenant to build cottages under the pretext of their convenience, but he did not see any test of convenience in its provisions, and a man might say that a cottage would be convenient, and he ran it up, and then let it in lodgings, with a total contempt of all the laws of decency or comfort, and by the Bill he might snap his fingers at the landlord. As long as he was tenant the cottage remained with him; but when he left his holding the landlord might be compelled to buy the building, and probably, the first use made of it would be to pull it down. He should vote for the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Portsmouth, for the cause of whose absence every hon. Member of the House must feel the deepest sympathy.

Mr. M'LAGAN said, he regretted that the promoters of the Bill should have marred a most valuable principle with some most objectionable provisions. He quite agreed that a tenant who erected a building upon an estate should have power to remove it at the termination of his lease. He considered that a most valuable provision; but the Bill not only allowed the tenant to remove a building, but it gave him the power to sell it to a succeeding tenant; and it gave to the latter the same rights and privileges as were enjoyed by the tenant who erected the building. What was the effect of that? It was not only the buildings that were sold, but by selling them to the succeeding tenant, the landlord was deprived of the use of the land upon which these buildings were erected. He had never heard of such a monstrous proposition as that. He did not think a temporary occupier should have such a power as would enable him to deprive a permanent owner of his own property. They had before them the sad results of such a system as that in Ireland, where, in order to put things right, they were obliged to apply these exceptional remedies. The case of Ireland, however, should act as a warning, and he trusted that the House would never consent to any Bill for Scotland which would produce the same complications as had been produced in Ireland by the Land Bill. But if he objected to that part of the Bill, he objected still more strongly to the 4th clause, by which a temporary occupier would have power invested in him of putting down a cottage on his proprietor's estate without giving the slightest warning to his proprietor, or asking his leave, or determining whether the amenity of the property would be destroyed or not. The House was asked to give the tenant full power to put down his cottage, and then, at the end of the lease, the proprietor was to be bound to pay the tenant for that cottage. He thought the House would never consent to a proposition of that kind. A great deal had been said as to the necessity for the Bill. It had been truly said by the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire (Mr. Fordyce) in moving the second reading, that there was a want of cottage accommodation in Scotland. But what was the cause of that want? In many parts of Scotland a system had prevailed which was known as "the kitchen system," under which the agricultural labourers were lodged in the farm houses. In other parts of Scotland there was what was called the "bothy system"—that was to say, the agricultural labourers were lodged in houses devoted entirely to unmarried servants. The fact was that the kitchen system had been given up in certain districts; the bothy system had also been given up; and unfortunately cottages were not built in sufficient numbers to meet the deficiency of accommodation which had thus been caused. But if they were to apply this principle to the agricultural districts, why not apply it also to the town districts. If hon. Members would read the statistics for last year, they would find that the want of house accommodation was far greater in the manufacturing counties in Scotland than in the agricultural counties; and if they compared the statistics of 1861 with those of 1871, they would find that the deficiency of accommodation in the agricultural counties was being diminished every year, while the deficiency of accommodation in the manufacturing counties was increasing every year. Under those circumstances, if it was reasonable for the tenant of a farm to have it in his power to erect a cottage upon his proprietor's land without asking his leave, and at the end of the lease to demand payment for the house or cottage, it was surely not less reasonable that a tenant of a house in a town who should find himself deficient of house accommodation for servants should erect these buildings, and at the end of the lease should charge his proprietor with them. He did not see any difference whatever in the two cases. He agreed with that portion of the Bill by which the tenant should have it in his power to remove the buildings he erected on his landlord's estate, and he should on that ground vote for the second reading; but he must protest at the same time against the other extraordinary powers with which it was sought to invest the tenant. But he would rather suggest to his hon. Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire to consider whether it would not be advisable to withdraw the Bill, and introduce next year a short Bill giving the tenant more power than he had at present in regard to the erection of buildings, but free from those objectionable provisions.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: I rise immediately, Sir, after my hon. Friend, because I wish to add my entreaty to my hon. Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire, not to press the Bill any further. He can hardly be so sanguine as to expect that it will come to anything in the course of the present Session, and the Bill is so objectionable in various and important respects, that even those who sympathize with him—as I do—in the objects he has in view, cannot give it anything approaching to a hearty support. Upon principle I am as adverse to any legislative interference with proprietors in the management of their estates, as with any individuals in any other walk of life in the conduct of their own affairs. That no doubt, like all other general rules, is subject to exception; but I take it to be a general rule of universal application, and not subject to very many exceptions—that men are best left to the management of their own affairs, and that landed proprietors in the management of their own estates are not an exception to the general rule. I quite admit that the law of Scotland, which at this moment governs the relations of landlord and tenant, and in matters not the subject of special contract is, in some respects, in an unsatisfactory condition. Of course, the relation of landlord and tenant may be constituted by contract, and the parties making the contract which constitutes that relation between them, are at liberty, subject to the general law of the land, to make provisions equally for their respective interests. I do not understand, I may observe in passing, that my hon. Friend proposes by this measure to interfere in any way with the perfect freedom of contract between landlord and tenant. There is, however, one rule of law relating to landlords and tenants which the Bill deals with, and which, in my humble opinion, is not only unsatisfactory, but positively wrong. According to the present law, if a tenant farmer, however long his lease may be, erects buildings suitable to his wants during his tenancy, he is not at liberty at the end of his lease to remove them. He can only erect those buildings upon the condition of forfeiting them to his landlord at the end of his lease, without any compensation whatever. Now, I think that that is an erroneous rule of law, and I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. M'Lagan); and in so far as the Bill has for its object and purpose the amendment of this rule of law, I am prepared to give it my support. I think it is reasonable that a tenant should be at liberty to make such erections upon his holding as he finds to be necessary for his convenient use of it under his lease, and that he should be at liberty to remove the erections at the termination of his lease, unless he arranges with his landlord, upon terms satisfactory to himself, to allow them to remain. I think that would be a right and reasonable state of the law, in the absence of a special contract between the parties to the contrary. The provisions of the Bill do not appear to me to be satisfactory, because it proposes to amend the law in this matter by making a distinction between the holding of land and certain buildings upon the land. Now, I think my hon. Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire and others would be prepared, upon consideration, to say that it would be inconvenient, and in the highest degree subversive of the law relating to such matters, to make a severance between the title to land and the title to buildings upon it. I think it would be productive of the greatest inconvenience when a proprietor went into the market with his property that he should have to go into the history of the buildings upon it, and show whether they are or are not included in the title to the land itself. Therefore while I fully approve of the amendment of the law in this respect, I cannot approve of the manner in which the Bill proposes to effect it. As to Clause 4, which it is impossible not to regard as the main feature of the Bill, and indeed it is described as the purpose of the Bill, “to facilitate the erection of labourers’ cottages”—certainly, for my own part, so far from blaming, I feel indebted to my hon. Friend for bringing the matter forward, because it has elicited some valuable discussion upon this subject to which the clause relates. He has shown, I think to the satisfaction even of those who are most strenuously opposed to the Bill, that the accommodation for farm labourers in many parts of Scotland is at least extremely defective. The hon. and gallant Baronet who moved the rejection of the Bill attributed that to the comparatively helpless condition in which many Scotch proprietors were put by the law of entail. He said that by that law they were cramped and hindered in dealing with their estates in the manner which would be the most beneficial not only to those dwelling upon them, and to the labourers upon them, but also to themselves. The restraints and restrictions of the law of entail, said the hon. and gallant Baronet, interfered with the proprietors in acting as they wished to do—not merely from considerations of self-interest—though these are entirely legitimate, but from considerations of another and a higher order. Well, it is certainly very unfortunate that the proprietors of land could by such an artificial law as the law of entail be hindered from doing that which they would otherwise do in justice to their own feelings, and to their own intelligence in the beneficial management of their estates. But the remedy for that is—not to compel landlords to pay for the erection of such buildings upon the farms, this work not being done by themselves, for they leave their tenants to judge what is suitable for the accommodation of the labourers upon the holdings—the remedy for that state of things is to remove the obstructions and obstacles which the hon. and gallant Baronet referred to as the cause of the existing state of things. Surely it is more proper and more in accordance with the spirit of modern legislation to remove artificial laws which restrain proprietors in the management of their property, rather than to endeavour to overcome one evil by the creation of another. I cannot consent to any proposition such as that contained in this 4th clause, by which the management of their property would be taken out of the hands of the proprietors and placed in the hands of the merely temporary possessors of the land. I may here also remark that no provision as to the endurance of the lease—whether for life or for terms of years—is contained in the Bill, nor does it even prohibit the erection of these buildings in the very last year of the tenancy. I do not wish to use such language as “crude” or “ill-digested;” but my hon. Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire, is here dealing with a very large subject, and one upon which it will be very difficult to legislate. That difficulty presents itself upon this matter in a very marked manner. The common experience in legislation upon almost any subject is that it is not a very difficult thing to do the thing you are aiming at, but the difficulty is to do that and no more. In dealing with this my hon. Friend has done a great deal more than he intended. I hope he will be satisfied with the discussion which the introduction of this measure has led to, and which I cannot consider as otherwise than extremely beneficial, and likely to promote the object he has in view in a safer manner than is done by the Bill, and I hope he will not put his Friends to the difficulty of considering whether the balance of advantage would be to support or oppose the second reading.

SIR FREDERICK W. HEYGATE said, he would not have troubled the House but that the case of Ireland had been referred to, and Irish legislation had been quoted as a reason for the Bill. There was, however, a great difference between the cases of Ireland and Scotland. He did not believe that Scotch proprietors and tenants would wish to compare their position with the state of things which unfortunately prevailed in a great part of Ireland. Even in the case of Ireland there had never been a proposal made to force proprietors to purchase houses to the erection of which they had not given their assent. For his part he could not but regard any interference with freedom of contract as an unmitigated evil. He called attention to the fact that in Scotland there was freedom of contract, and the tenants had leases, while in Ireland most of the tenancies were yearly ones. He could not believe that when a Scotch farmer made a bargain for a 19 years’ lease he did not consider whether there were sufficient buildings upon the farm for the labourers’ accommodation. He could not conceive that the Scotch farmers would so totally neglect their own interests. He was glad to hear what the Lord Advocate had said on the subject; but he found it difficult to reconcile his speech that day with some of the votes the right hon. and learned Lord had given on the Irish Land Bill.

MR. WHALLEY said, he had never seen a Bill which was more carefully and ably drawn than the present measure. He therefore hoped that, as its principle had been fully recognized, his hon. Friend would, at all events, take a division on the second reading. He and other landlords in Wales had introduced clauses into their leases, securing to the tenants compensation for improvements made with the assent of the proprietors. If cottages for labourers were erected by the tenant with such consent, and it was necessary to take them at the expiration of the tenancy, power might be given to charge the price upon the inheritance. That was in effect what the Bill would do for the tenant-farmers of Scotland, the restriction being that the buildings to be erected should be necessary.

Mr. CLARE READ said, that in his opinion, this was a subject of great and increasing importance. The landlords of this country had been considerate to their tenants by providing suitable farm buildings; but it had never occurred to them, as a general rule, that cottages were as essential to the cultivation of a farm as were the farm buildings themselves. He could perfectly well believe that there were many farmers who had long leases, who could not at the present day obtain a competent supply of labour in consequence of the inadequate cottage accommodation at their command. He therefore thanked the hon. Member who had introduced the Bill, for directing attention to that which was an increasing evil—although he admitted that a great number of cottages were being erected where they were most required. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had put forward with great force all that could be said in favour of freedom of contract; but in order to really have freedom of contract the law supposed the two contracting parties were upon an equality. In this case there was a total difference between the two parties in the provisions of the law. The law not only secured the landlord every sixpence of his property, but it enabled him to confiscate his tenants' improvements and eat him up with game without any compensation. It could be truly said that the landlord was clad in mail and armed with the sword of the State, while the tenant had his hands tied behind him, or at most was furnished with an oak stick in the shape of a one-sided lease or agreement, and then they were told they were quite free to settle their differences. The law gave the landed proprietor all the protection of his rights, but did not enforce any one of his duties. There was the law of distress and all sorts of laws for the special protection of landlords, and none or next to none for the protection of the tenant. The hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) had used an argument of an astounding nature, when he said that the Bill would create over-crowding. He should have thought that by increasing cottage accommodation they would have prevented overcrowding. Labour was now so scarce that men would not walk two or three miles to work as they would formerly do. It was therefore necessary that house accommodation should be provided near the scene of their labour, and any effort to accomplish this object ought to have the serious consideration of Parliament. He should therefore vote for the second reading of the Bill, although he might take exception in Committee to the clause, which said that the landlord should be bound to pay for the buildings whether he liked them or not. He thought it but reasonable that if the landlord declined at the end of a tenancy to purchase the buildings erected by the out-going tenant, the tenant should be at liberty to sell them to his successor, and he was clearly of opinion that it would be but just, if the tenant could not dispose of them, he should have full power to remove the buildings and leave the land clear as he had found it. In the Bill which he was unfortunately obliged to withdraw a fortnight ago, larger provisions were introduced with respect to these matters, but he heartily supported this measure as a step in the right direction.

Mr. PELL said, he did not think there was any probability of the Bill becoming law during the present Session. In reference to the question generally, the principal provisions of the Bill were contained in the clause which enabled the agricultural tenant to erect, with or without the consent of the landlord, a certain number of houses on the farm in proportion to the quantity of arable land that might be thereon, and at the end of his tenancy to claim for the value of those buildings. One objection to this was that it would interfere with house-building speculators conducting their operations, and it was also open to many other objections. He understood that the intention was to provide a suitable number of labourers on the spot for the cultivation of the soil; but the House must be careful, in legislating in that direction, that the labourer on the land should have some security for the tenure of the houses when built. Why should not power be equally given to the labourer himself to build? At present the responsibility of building houses rested with the landowner, and that Bill proposed to divide the responsibility between the landowner and the tenant; but suppose neither of them fulfilled that obligation, where would the labourer then be? It would be a great mistake in any legislation on the subject to divide that responsibility solely between the tenant of the farm and the owner of the soil. In such a Bill as this provision ought to be made to enable the labourer to build if he chose, and to give him some permanency of tenure. Public opinion called for the building of proper habitations for the working classes—especially for the agricultural labourers. He was himself owner of some cottages, many of which, he was sorry to say, were empty, the tenants having left them in order to procure more profitable employment in another part of the country. He should vote against the second reading of the Bill, because he did not think it either prudent or wise to attempt by legislation to do that under statutory provisions, which it was much better to leave to be determined by the requirements of the case, and which varied from time to time according to the peculiar circumstances of and the demand for employment.

MR. WHEELHOUSE strongly objected to the principle of the Bill, which might produce even alienation for ever without the consent of the owner of the land. If the measure became law, a man would be enabled to create what in England would be termed a fee within a fee by putting a house on another person's land so as to form a perpetual incumbrance. Although the Bill only applied to Scotland it would commit just the same injustice as it would in England, and to any perpetual incumbrance, especially on another man's land, without his consent, moreover, he was opposed, and for that reason he should vote against the second reading; although he was willing to concede the right that when a tenant erected buildings upon the land with the consent of the landowner, if the landowner were unwilling to allow such tenant the value of such houses, the latter might have a right to take them down.

MR. C. S. PARKER said, the hon. and learned Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse) had exercised his legal ingenuity in attempting to show that the Bill would saddle estates with encumbrances without the consent of the owner. He (Mr. Parker) did not assume to speak with any professional knowledge; but he was very much mistaken if the language of the Bill gave any title to the ground on which the buildings were erected. Certainly if it did, such was not the intention of the promoters of the Bill, and the words could easily be altered in Committee. The real position was this—that the property in the building was to vest in the tenant who erected or who purchased it, and the property in the soil was to remain with the landlord, who also would have the right of pre-emption, and the right to have the surface of the ground restored at the end of the lease. The measure did not interfere with the ordinary contract between landlord and tenant, but provided that in the event of no understanding having been come to between the landlord and the tenant in regard to farm buildings to be erected, the tenant should be entitled to claim the right of removing them or of selling them to a succeeding tenant. The Bill was not to compel but simply to facilitate the erection of cottages. The Preamble of the Bill well set forth the real objects it had in view. The first proposition of the Preamble was a matter of fact—namely, that by the law of Scotland it was presumed that buildings belonged to the person on whose land they were situate; and the second proposition was that this presumption should cease for the future, and that where there was no bargain to the contrary the property in the buildings should remain with the tenant. He thought there had been on both sides some exaggeration of the importance of the provisions relating to cottages. He did not think the Bill would do very much for the erection of cottages, and he was quite sure cottages would not be run up as matters of speculation. The capital of tenant-farmers found plenty of employment in the operations of agriculture, and they would never dream of putting up cottages unless they were really required. There was no doubt great inconvenience existed in consequence of the want of sufficient cottage accommodation. The country districts of Scotland were becoming depopulated. During the ten years of the last Census, the population of the county which he represented had decreased by 5,000—the labourers had gone to the large towns of Glasgow and Dundee, where they could find accommodation and better wages. The question, therefore, was whether it was not worthy of the attention of every person interested in agriculture to give facilities for labourers to remain on the land. He thought the 4th clause might be so modified in Committee as to have all its objectionable features removed. He especially approved of that part of the Bill which gave power to limited owners to provide the necessary cottages on the estate. He hoped the second reading would be agreed to.

MR. ORR EWING said, the hon. Member who had just addressed them had said that the counties of Scotland were rapidly becoming depopulated, and that in his own county the population had decreased 5,000 since the last Census—and this the hon. Member had attributed to the want of cottage accommodation. He could assure the hon. Member that that was an entire mistake.

MR. C. S. PARKER explained that what he intended to say—and believed he had said—was that the growth of the large towns had caused labourers to leave the agricultural districts, and that such being the tendency, it was worth the while of those interested in agriculture to see that cottages were built, in order that the labourers might have more inducement to remain.

MR. ORR EWING said, they might build palaces for them if they liked; but that would not induce them to remain so long as the wages they could get in the towns were higher than those they were paid in the country. During the last 10 or 15 years he had laid out £80,000 in building houses for his workmen, and until late years he never had any trouble to get labourers of all kinds—in fact, he generally had a redundancy of labour—and there was always a great demand for houses, especially his own, which were of a superior kind; but he could assure the hon. Member that notwithstanding the men were earning very good wages, some of his houses were empty, and one part of his business was diminished and crippled entirely for the want of labour. So long, therefore, as there was one branch of trade extremely profitable they might build as many agricultural cottages as they liked, but they would not get people to occupy them. He had often told the agricultural labourers that they had better remain in the country districts, where there was little disease and plenty of fresh air. He had told them that it was short-sighted policy to run away from a healthy, cheerful, and joyful district for the temporary increased pay of the large towns. They would not do that, however, and they must accept things as they were. This was a free country, and he should be sorry to see that freedom interfered with. He was at a loss, however, to understand how anyone could support the Bill who wished to maintain freedom of contract. They had had a statement from the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), which went beyond that of the hon. Member for Perth, who had an opportunity this day of delivering an eloquent speech, which was prepared for another occasion when he had intended to bring before the House the question of freedom of contract. According to his argument, the tenant was a poor, naked, defenceless body, utterly unable to withstand his landlord, because he was armed with all the power of the sword. Did the hon. Member really wish to persuade the House that the tenant-farmers were that poor, defenceless, unprotected class that they required special and exceptional legislation? And he put it to him, whether he would support such a Bill as this if it were to be extended to towns and cities? If the hon. Member's (Mr. Clare Read's) description of the tenant-farmers of England was a true one, he (Mr. Orr Ewing) could assure him it was not applicable to the tenant-farmers of Scotland. There was no more sturdy and independent class of people than the tenant-farmers had always shown themselves to be, and the course of events had a tendency to make them still more so. He did not know any landlord who, in dealing with his own tenantry, would not prefer the principle of private arrangement, or who would not say that this Bill would be totally useless. It might answer some hon. Member's purpose to pretend to be a great friend to the farmer; but, so far as the Bill was concerned, he must oppose it as being worthless and while doing so, he claimed for himself the title of as sincere a friend to the farmer as its most enthusiastic supporter. He was most anxious to do everything in his power to promote the interest of the tenant-farmers in Scotland; but he would not pretend to do so by supporting a Bill which he believed would produce endless confusion and strife.

MR. GREENE regarded that as one of the crudest Bills he had ever seen submitted to Parliament, and one more likely to do harm than good. If a tenant had a piece of land opposite his landlord's mansion and did not happen to be on very good terms with him, he could build a row of cottages upon it. He concurred with the views of the previous speakers in thinking that an attempt to interfere with the freedom of contract between the landlord and his tenant, and he protested against it. It was a measure more likely to emanate from a Parliament of women than of "grave and reverend seigniors." He strongly objected to the great waste of Parliamentary time by the introduction of Bills of the sort, which could never come to fruition, although they kept the House frequently up to an advanced hour of the early morning. His health had suffered considerably by those post-midnight sittings, and he was determined if he had an opportunity next Session, to introduce a Bill to oblige them all to go home to their beds at 11 o'clock at night. He hoped that no more time would be wasted over the Bill, and that it would be thrown out by a large majority.

MR. MUNTZ said, he had listened with great pleasure to the promise of the hon. Member to bring in a Bill to put a stop to 2 and 4 o'clock sittings, and to send everyone home at 11 o'clock, and would promise to support such a measure. He was also sure hon. Members of that House generally, and especially the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, would be grateful to him for doing so. As regarded the Bill, he believed it was a step in the right direction to improve the condition of tenants, and it should have his support when amended in Committee, and although he considered it an impracticable one in its present shape, yet he was very glad that attention had been called to the subject, believing as he did that there was great need for improvement as regarded the present condition of labourers' cottages. From the introduction of machinery, and one cause and another, our agricultural population was gradually deteriorating, which was a great misfortune to the country. It was of the greatest importance upon that and upon every ground that their condition both as to house accommodation and otherwise should be improved.

MR. GOLDNEY said, that the Bill gave a tenant power against his landlord to erect any sort of structure or fence which he might consider necessary. There was to be no limit to the number of cottages he might put up, although the Bill placed some limitation on the number to be paid for. A tenant, therefore, might erect a number of hovels for a temporary purpose. He was not bound to keep them in repair; and the landlord, who had no power to do any repairs during the tenancy, would have all the discredit. He believed the House would violate both justice and common sense in reading the Bill a second time, for its principle was utterly at variance with the rights of property. Besides that, there was no necessity for it, and even if there was its operation would, he believed, prove detrimental not only to the landlord, but also to the tenant and agricultural labourers themselves.

MR. M'LAREN said, he thought that England had been somewhat too largely imported into the discussion of this Bill for Scotland. The circumstances of England and Scotland, however, were so different that arguments drawn from the experience of English Members did not apply to the Bill. That was a question between the land-owner and the tenant not of every farm, but of every farm where there was not one cottage to every 100 acres of land. This Bill did not propose to apply any provision to those farms which had one cottage to every 100 acres of land; and he would remind the hon. Member opposite (Mr. J. Lowther) that the tenant could not claim the whole expenditure upon any buildings, as he had stated, at the expiration of the lease, but only what they were worth. But that must be done by agreement—his hon. Friend had made a great mistake when he said that the landlord must take the buildings. There was no obligation on the landlord to do so at all. All that the landlord was entitled to require was that the tenant should take away the materials of which they had been formed; and was that an unreasonable proposition? He thought not. But if the landlord said—"I should like to have these things," the Bill provided that a valuer might be appointed to say what they were worth, and at that valuation the landlord might take them. He must confess that upon looking over its provisions the Bill appeared to be one of the most equitable that had ever been introduced into the House. He supported it because, instead of asking the Chancellor of the Exchequer to put his hands into the public purse, it provided that better accommodation for the labourers should be provided by those whose undoubted duty it was to do so. At the present moment our labourers lived a very inferior sort of barrack life in villages, and indeed were much worse off in their domestic arrangements than soldiers. No one who was acquainted with Scotland but must know that in the agricultural districts of Scotland there were hundreds of cottages of the most miserable description, and in many instances there was not a cottage to be found on a thousand acres of land; and in his opinion it was high time that something should be done in the way of improvement on those grounds. He cordially supported the Bill.

MR. FORDYCE said, he did not intend to reply in detail to the various criticisms which had been made on the Bill. He was led, however, to say that it was impossible for him to agree to the advice of the Lord Advocate and of his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. M'Lagan) to withdraw it. It had been called a crude Bill; but it had been well considered in Scotland, and the Agricultural Societies, which represented the tenant-farmers of Scotland, were unanimously in its favour, and the Chamber of Agriculture, of which the hon. Member for Linlithgow was a member, had petitioned to that effect. If anyone thought the measure an extreme one, which he denied, let him remember that it was intended to meet an extreme grievance—the frightful over-crowding and want of accommodation for agricultural labourers—shown by the fact that one-third of the families of Scotland lived in houses of one room with one window or with none. Let him recall to the House the exact provisions of the Bill. By the law of Scotland all buildings erected by the tenant belonged to the landlord in the absence of specific agreement to the contrary. The fundamental proposition of this Bill was an alteration of that presumption of law in favour of the tenant. It divided buildings into two classes, and the provisions in reference to each of these were somewhat different. In regard to buildings other than labourers' cottages, the provision was, that at the end of the lease he was entitled to remove the materials, or sell them to the incoming tenant or the landlord. In regard to cottages, the provision was, that where these did not exist to the extent of one for every 100 arable acres, and the tenant supplied the deficiency, he was to be entitled to recompense to the extent of £100 for each such cottage, provided first the Sheriff found it worth that amount, that it had three rooms and 3,000 feet of cubic contents. Could anything be more reasonable than that? In conclusion, he would mention that an hon. Member (Sir Frederick Heygate) had referred to Ireland; but what was the state of the case there? Why, what did the Blue Book which had just been circulated on the subject prove? The Poor Law Inspectors of districts in Ireland had been invited to give their opinions as to the improvement of agricultural labourers' cottages, and three-fourths of their number recommended the principle of the Bill—namely, that occupiers of land should enjoy facilities of building irrespective of the will of the landlord.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 78. Majority 4.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill put off for three months.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS (CUMULATIVE VOTE) BILL—[BILL 208.]
(Mr. Collins, Mr. Morrison.)
 SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading, read.

MR. COLLINS, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, he had to express his great regret that the subject should have to come before the House at a late hour on a Wednesday afternoon. He would endeavour, however, to explain as briefly as he could the object of the provision of the Bill, which was to apply the principle of the cumulative vote to the election of aldermen by town councils. It was no new principle, for already Parliament had sanctioned it as regarded school board elections; in the English Act, unanimously on the Motion of the noble Lord who represented the North West Riding (Lord Frederick Cavendish), and in the Scotch Act, after a full discussion of the subject, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke) also a ministerialist, by 162 to 36, and the question was not at all one of a party character. The present Parliament had therefore decidedly approved of the cumulative vote. Admitting that the mode of representing minorities in Parliamentary Elections might be open to objection on account of its partial operation, he considered that the local representation of a town or borough should afford a correct picture of the several interests represented; but in respect to the election of the aldermen that was not at present the case, for they, instead of being elected by the municipal electors themselves, were selected by the town councillors out of their own body. It was in consequence of that, that whenever there was a political question, or even such a question as that of providing gas or water-works for the town, great agitation took place with the view of disturbing the balance of public opinion by the election of aldermen who would throw the majority of the council into a minority. It was another subject to be deeply regretted, that those municipal institutions, which had been originally established for the administration of local affairs, had degenerated into political organizations of the most violent character. This was the case in Liverpool, in Bristol, and in Leeds, and the wide-spread nature of the evil had been abundantly shown by the evidence taken before the Select Committee of 1869. A great deal had been said about the reform of our municipal corporations; but it was only justice to the unreformed Corporation of the City of London to say that, so far as he knew, it was the only municipal body in the kingdom the elections to which took place more out of regard to local affairs than to party politics. As an example of the way in which the Aldermanic Bench was monopolized by the party of the majority, he would refer to the fact, that at the last municipal election for Leeds, though one-third of the council was Conservative, the whole of the eight aldermen appointed were Liberals. He maintained it was unfair to give a majority in the town council the power to swamp a considerable minority by electing aldermen in all cases agreeing with their own views, and hoped that if the re-action in progress there resulted in a Conservative majority, they would not exercise their power in the same tyrannical and exclusive spirit. The theory of the Municipal Act, that the best men, irrespective of party, would be elected aldermen, not having been realized, he would urge that his proposal was the most available remedy, and with that view, he would give as a testimony the opinion of the late Mr. Mill, on the superiority of the cumulative over the limited vote, as being more popular and giving the most faithful expression of the wishes of the electors. It might not be possible to apply the cumulative vote to the election of all members of the council, because the larger towns were divided into wards; but the aldermen represented the whole of the town, and might without difficulty be chosen by the cumulative vote. No doubt, it would be said that nobody wanted the Bill. He held that that was a most unsound objection, because it was unreasonable to suppose that a dominant majority should endeavour to curtail their own power; and besides Parliament had dealt with the old municipal corporations, the Universities, and endowed schools, without expecting those bodies to ask for their own reform. He wished the measure could have been brought forward earlier in the Session, but that was impracticable; and in commending it to the justice, moderation, and fairness of the House, he hoped that it would not be overborne by mere brute voting power, and that some defence of the existing system would be offered by its opponents. Believing that the Bill would remedy a glaring injustice, he begged to move its second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Collins.)

MR. HARDCASTLE said, he had been curious to know why the hon. Gentleman opposite took so great an interest in the cumulative system of voting, and from his speech he discovered that as the present constitution of the Corporation of Leeds did not satisfy him he desired to alter it by introducing the cumulative system. The Preamble of the Bill was founded on the erroneous assumption that aldermen were representatives of the town council, whereas they were chosen by their fellow town councillors, and their duty was to act at elections in the absence of the mayor. It also assumed that aldermen had the power of meeting to consult about the interests of the borough in a separate chamber, whereas that was the case in London only. The object of the cumulative vote was to enable a minority to send a representative of their opinions into some representative body, and it did not apply to the case of the election of aldermen. He might observe that the cumulative system did not work well in small constituencies. It either enormously strengthened a minority, so as to make it practically a majority; or, if the votes were well divided, several of the candidates had an equal number of votes, and a fresh election was rendered necessary. He had not heard of any Petition for a change in the present system, nor of any complaint out-of-doors as to the mode in which they exercised their functions. Moreover, instead of seeking to introduce the thin end of the wedge by such an infinitesimally small application of the cumulative vote, why did not the hon. Member for Boston at once boldly propose to apply that principle to the election of town councillors and also of Members of Parliament, and not to that of aldermen only? Believing that the Bill, if passed, would produce greater evils than they had at present, he begged to move its rejection.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Hardcastle.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. MORRISON in supporting the Bill said, he should be glad to see cumulative voting extended to the election of town councillors generally; but if the friends of that principle wished to legislate in that House, especially at that period of the Session, it was necessary to confine their efforts to a moderate and modest measure. He did not think the Bill would necessitate second elections, because where two candidates had an equal number of votes the mayor's casting vote would obviate that difficulty. The aldermen of the City of London were elected not by the common councillors, but by the citizens generally—a much better system than that which prevailed in other parts of the country. As to the fear that a disciplined and intelligent minority might carry most of the seats on the aldermanic bench, if the majority should run candidates for all the vacancies, he had a much better opinion of the good sense of the majority than to think they were likely to fall into so stupid a mistake. In the case of such a small body as a town council it would always be easy to ascertain how the voting would go before the actual election occurred, and thus to find out how many candidates could be safely nominated. The object of the cumulative vote was not merely to obtain a fair system of voting, or a supply of speakers, but to make the representative body as fairly representative of different opinions and interests as possible, but where the election took the co-optative form, the representation of one side only surely could not be called a fair reflex of the constituency. In a town council they required, not great genius, but chiefly honesty, intelligence, and business experience. He found, however, that complaints were made everywhere, and even by town councillors themselves, that town councils were not as good as they used to be, and that it was a growing custom to make those institutions more and more instruments for the aggrandizement of political parties, instead of bodies for managing with proper skill and care the local affairs of a town. In the United States of America, where almost every evil of our representative system existed in an exaggerated measure, opinion was growing rapidly in favour of the cumulative vote for electing administrative bodies and various public officers. That principle was largely applied in Illinois and Pennsylvania, and many of the other States of the Union were advancing in the same direction. In forming our municipal corporations, it was thought that by a secondary election a better class of men would be obtained; but all experience showed that expedient was a failure. Town councillors had become mere delegates, instead of representatives, and their election was always arranged by a preliminary "Caucus." He admitted that that was a very small Bill. He advocated it only for the sake of the principle it involved; and he hoped if the measure were brought in again, that principle would be applied to the election of town councillors as well as of aldermen.

MR. LOCKE said, he must object to the second reading of the Bill, as he was opposed to the new-fangled method of election by the cumulative vote. When the Municipal Reform Act was introduced, Lord Lyndhurst proposed that aldermen should not be elected by the voters in the different wards, but by the town council itself. That was a bad principle, and he for one had always objected to it. He had proposed in the analogous case of the Metropolitan Board of Works, that the members of that Board should be elected directly by the ratepayers, and not indirectly through the medium of the different vestries. Modern inventions in politics, at all events in regard to elections, did not answer. The old system carried on the City of London from time immemorial, under which the aldermen as well as the common councillors were elected by the different wards, had answered. It was a system to which no objection had been taken, which could be clearly understood and by which the representation of the people could be secured; but by their new-fangled principles Heaven only knew who would be represented, or what would be the result. The cumulative vote would only introduce perplexity and confusion. It could not be right. It was impossible to say why it could not be right, and equally impossible for anybody to prove that it was right. He had never been able to understand the arguments urged in its favour, and he was sure that those who urged them were as much in the dark as he was. The hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Collins), who had given them a lecture about Yorkshire, with which no man was so well acquainted, should ask the people of that county whether they would not prefer the old principle so long carried out in the City of London to the new-fangled scheme contained in his Bill.

MR. BAINES said, he had not intended to speak on the Bill, partly because the subject had excited very little public attention, and partly because he feared that he differed from a majority of his constituents with regard to it. But as his hon. Friend the Member for Boston (Mr. Collins) had so largely introduced into his speech the borough which he (Mr. Baines) had the honour to represent, he was sure the House would indulge him with permission to make a brief reply. His hon. Friend had stated that since the Municipal Reform Bill the Corporation of Leeds had elected all the aldermen from the Liberal party. That was true, and he regretted it; but he would inform the House how it came about. The fact was that the old close Tory corporation, which had governed the town for ages, had never admitted into its ranks a single Liberal; and when a representative corporation was elected, and the Liberals obtained the ascendancy, they resented their previous exclusions. But there was another reason which had exasperated the Liberals still more strongly. When the Tory party were unseated from their seats by the Municipal Corporations Reform Act, they determined to alienate the whole of the property of the corporation for the purpose of weakening their successors. They did so alienate it, and there was an action at law then pending on the part of the new corporation to recover the funds which had been alienated by the old. That had a powerful influence on public feeling, which still prevailed. Another reason tended to perpetuate the feeling which had been referred to by the hon. Member for Boston. When he (Mr. Baines) argued with some of his own friends, that it would be more just and expedient for the public interests that some of the best men of both parties should be admitted to the bench of aldermen, and that the municipal elections should not be conducted with a mere reference to political party, the answer was—"We have two well-known parties, Liberal and Conservative. They have election committees and organizations, and they would not consent to set up a new organization for the election of the municipal council, and therefore we must go on in the old grooves, and work by means of the old organization." He was sorry to say that the same argument was to be met with everywhere. In Boston—his hon. Friend's borough—every alderman was a Tory; and in Liverpool all the aldermen were Conservative, and they would not appoint a mayor who was not of the same party. The fact was, that the same thing prevailed over the whole kingdom. He believed that the local bodies were, notwithstanding, doing their best for the management of their property and the improvement of their respective towns; and he must say that, on behalf of his own constituents, that he believed there was no corporation in the kingdom more desirous of promoting public improvements, whether with respect to the streets, the sewers, with respect to the gas or water, or in improving public buildings and institutions, than the Corporation of Leeds; and he did not think that there was any town which had been more distinguished by its advancement in recent times than Leeds had been under the corporation which his hon. Friend had thought fit to denounce. He was well aware that it would be stated that all the salaried officers employed by municipal corporations were of one party; but as far as Leeds was concerned he was prepared to contradict it, for he knew, and could give the names, if it were desirable to do so, of several of the highest paid officers of the Corporation of Leeds who were of the opposite politics to the majority of the town council. Still he must say, from his own conviction, that it would be better and more fair, and, on the whole, for the greater advantage of both parties, and the whole community, that the plan for electing aldermen, sketched out by the hon. Member for Boston, should be adopted. The aldermen were all elected by a majority of the town council, whatever might be its political colour. This was not the case with the town councillors, as they were elected by the different wards, and, being so elected, represented many different opinions and principles. His hon. Friend, with whom no doubt the wish was father to the thought, expected that his own party would soon get into power again; but if they did, he (Mr. Baines) was convinced that they would act on the same principles on which they had acted for ages. Still, he believed that the election of the best men of both parties to the office of aldermen would everywhere prove the most beneficial, and must, therefore, give his vote in favour of the Bill.

MR. WHEELHOUSE rested the question on a much wider basis than the case of any particular borough, and apprehended that any process which tended to swamp the votes of the ratepayers in a municipality must be an unconditional, indeed, an unqualified evil. In nearly every borough in the North of England these elections were matters of political feeling; but he believed that if the cumulative principle were carried out, it would be found that many gentlemen occupying the aldermanic bench would find themselves so no longer. The exclusive principle had been carried out in Leeds ever since the passing of the Municipal Act, without paying any attention to the feelings and wishes of the ratepayers, and he maintained that the party whom he represented in Leeds were not responsible for the existing system which prevailed in that borough. If it was bad in the old corporation to be exclusive—that was purely the old argument that two blacks would not make a white—and surely there was no reason for the new corporation to follow a bad example. He thought the town council should be wholly elective, for he had never seen the advantage of the Municipal Act over the old system, and the City of London had acted wisely in adhering to its ancient practice. During the last 20 years he had heard continual complaints on the part of the electors against being swamped by the aldermen, who said that it was quite useless to make any attempt to remedy the evil with which they had to contend as things now stood and were conducted. The fact was, that people were selected for office not because of their fitness, but from political considerations. That being so, he should be glad to see a return to the good old system which prevailed in London at the present moment, where the best man was chosen, whether he happened to be Whig or Tory.

MR. CARTER said, he must strongly deny that the aldermen of Leeds were elected entirely on account of their political opinions, and in order to show that the corporation were not governed by political motives, begged to state that the town clerk was a Conservative, and that the surveyor for the borough, who was more lately appointed, was one likewise. Besides, those several other officers of the corporation held the same political opinions. He had a long experience as a member of the corporation, and could assert that the best men were appointed to seats in the council, irrespective of their political views, and the same rule applied to the official appointments. In fact, the question was never raised as to the political opinions of candidates for appointments. The hon. Member (Mr. Wheelhouse) had been elected to the Corporation of Leeds, but he had quarrelled with the committee to which he was appointed, and his constituency consequently quarrelled with him. Hence, his complaint of the corporation as it existed at present. He had originally opposed the principle of the Bill, because he thought it would not work well; but from what he had seen, however, of the state of feeling in his own borough, he felt satisfied that if the principle of the Bill were adopted, it would, when prejudices were overcome, be likely to produce a beneficial result. Looking at it in that point of view, he should vote for the second reading.

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

WILD ANIMALS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. JAMES BARCLAY, Bill to amend the Law relating to Wild Animals in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. JAMES BARCLAY, Mr. FORDYCE, and Mr. TREVELYAN. Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 243.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 17th July, 1873.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Salmon Fisheries* (215); Exchequer Bonds (£1,600,000)* (222); Treasury Chest Fund* (217); Turnpike Acts Continuance, &c.* (223); Military Manoeuvres* (216); Medical Act Amendment (University of London)* (214); Revising Barristers* (218).

Second Reading—Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Provisional Order (No. 3)* (166); Highland Schools (Scotland)* (205).

Committee—Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (No. 1) (167); Court of Queen's Bench (Ireland) (Grand Juries)* (184-224).

Committee—Report—Blackwater Bridge* (197); Public Works Loan Commissioners (School and Sanitary Loans)* (193).

Third Reading—Law Agents (Scotland)* (213); Public Schools (Eton College Property)* (204), and passed.

Mr. Carter

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION PROVISIONAL ORDER CONFIRMATION (No. 1). BILL—(No. 167.) (The Lord President)

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that his noble Friend (Earl Beauchamp), who had a Notice on the Paper to draw attention to the evidence taken before the Select Committee to which the Bill had been referred, and to move an Amendment was prevented by illness from being present that evening. The Amendment was an important one, to the effect that the compulsory powers which the Bill proposed to give the London School Board should not be allowed to be exercised till next year, so that the ratepayers might in the meantime, when the elections to the school board came on, have an opportunity of expressing an opinion respecting it. His noble Friend had requested him to state that he would move his Amendment on the next stage of the Bill.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, it was of great importance that the Bill should pass, and that its next stage should be at the earliest possible period.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON regretted both the cause of the absence of the noble Earl (Earl Beauchamp) and the necessity of postponing the discussion to which the Amendment would probably give rise, more particularly as he knew many noble Lords had come down to the House specially that evening in expectation that this particular matter would be under consideration. He agreed that it was really of great importance that the next stage of the Bill should be taken as early as possible, and would therefore suggest that the Report be fixed for Tuesday.

House in Committee accordingly. Amendments made; the Report thereof received on Tuesday next.

House adjourned at half past Five o'clock, till To-morrow,
Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,
Thursday, 17th July, 1873.

MINUTES.] — PUBLIC BILLS — Resolution in Committee — Ordered — First Reading — Licensing Law Amendment (Scotland) * [247].
Ordered — Representative Councils in Counties (Ireland).
Ordered — First Reading — Rating Liability (Ireland) * [246].
First Reading — Colonial Church * [248]; Slave Trade (Consolidation) * [249]; Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 6) * [244].
Second Reading — Extradition Act (1870) Amendment * [220]; Penalties (Ireland) * [239]; Railway Regulation * [232].
Second Reading — Committee — Report — Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment, &c. [188-245].
Committee — Juries [35] — R.P.
Committee — Report — Local Government Board (Ireland) Provisional Order Confirmation (No. 2) * [229].
Third Reading — Intestates Widows and Children * [214], and passed.
Withdrawn — Union Rating (Ireland) * [23].

ROYAL ACADEMY — THE GIBSON BEQUEST.—QUESTION.

MR. C. S. PARKER asked the First Commissioner of Works, If he can explain what prevents the President and Members of the Royal Academy from giving access at Burlington House to the works of sculpture and models of the late John Gibson, R.A., bequeathed to them by him seven years ago, together with a legacy of more than £40,000 to provide a Gallery for them; and when it is likely that they will be exhibited to the public, in accordance with the intention of the donor?

MR. AYRTON, in reply, said, that it was perfectly true that seven years had elapsed since the death of Mr. Gibson, R.A., and since his bequest of his works of sculpture and models to the public; but no blame whatever attached to the Royal Academy for their not being yet in a position to exhibit them in a Gallery specially devoted to the purpose, because the Royal Academy, several years ago, entered into arrangements with the Office of Works, by which they were to construct a Gallery at Burlington House as soon as they were put in possession of the building. It was at that time occupied by several learned Societies. The Royal Academy, however, instead of waiting for that event, had, at considerable expense, carried on the construction of a Gallery — though it had not yet been completed. They would not, in fact be able to complete the Gallery until they had been put into entire possession of the building, as it would be necessary that they should construct a staircase in the building to reach the Gallery, and they would not be put into entire possession until the learned Societies had transferred themselves to their new apartments. This, he believed, would happen in September next, and six months would be required to make the necessary arrangements, so that the Royal Academy would be able to exhibit the sculpture and models when they opened their exhibition in May next. They had, however, in the meantime, shown some of the works of art.

THE ADMINISTRATIVE DEPARTMENTS — COURTS OF JUSTICE.

QUESTION.

MR. RATHBONE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether steps have been taken to appoint a Commission of Inquiry into the Administrative Departments of the Courts of Justice, as recommended by the Committee on Civil Service Expenditure; or, if not, if the Government will take such steps?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, Sir, we have given immediate attention to the Report and recommendations of that Committee, which we cordially approve. Arrangements are in progress to carry them out, and we desire to complete them as soon as possible.

INDIA — REGULATIONS FOR EUROPEAN OFFICERS—PRIZE.—QUESTION.

MR. VANCE (for Colonel STUART KNOX), asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention was called in the year 1870 to the statement at page 608 of the revised edition of the "Regulations for European Officers" issued "by authority," which sets forth that under the Act 3 and 4 Vic. c. 65, s. 22, "the final decision in all disputed questions of prize now rests with the High Court of Admiralty;" and, if that statement is inaccurate, what steps have been or will be taken to correct it for the better guidance of Her Majesty's Officers in India; whether the Index to these Regulations, in which a corresponding statement occurs, is also published "by authority" of the Secretary of State; whether some of the Kirwee Prize claims have been ostensibly adjudicated upon, not by a legal court, but by a public Department unaided by legal assessors; and, whether such ostensible adjudication has been in accordance with any of the known precedents, some of which, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Attorney General and other very eminent counsel, are not distinguishable from the case of the Kirwee claims?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Sir, in reply to the first Question I have to say that my attention was called in the year 1870 to the statement that "the final decision in all disputed questions of Prize now rests with the High Court of Admiralty." In reply to the second Question, I have to say that, there being nothing in that statement calculated to mislead persons of average intelligence, it is not intended to take any steps to alter it. In reply to the third Question, I have to say that the Index is as much and as little authoritative as the rest of the compilation—that is, as I explained the other day, it is authoritative in so far as it quotes or correctly interprets official documents. In reply to the fourth Question, I have to say that some of the Kirwee Prize claims were adjudicated on by the Treasury; and in reply to the fifth Question—being, I believe, the 21st which has been addressed to me this Session on the subject of the Banda and Kirwee claims—I have to say that I think the hon. and gallant Member had better address that Question to the representative of the Department whose action he impugns.

METROPOLIS—PARLIAMENT STREET— THE PUBLIC OFFICES.—QUESTION.

MR. A. JOHNSTON asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether any of the houses standing between Parliament Street and the new Colonial and Home Offices are likely to be taken down before the meeting of Parliament in next year; and, if so, whether he will undertake that no steps inconsistent with the ground on which they stand being thrown into the roadway shall be taken previously to such meeting of Parliament?

MR. AYRTON: I think, Sir, it extremely probable that the houses referred to will all be taken down before the meeting of Parliament next Session; but no further work will be done on the land than is necessary for the completion of the new Home and Colonial Offices. That work will not extend over much of the site; but of course the new Home and Colonial Offices must be completed as quickly as possible.

Mr. Vance

MR. A. JOHNSTON: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the latter part of my Question—whether he will undertake that no steps should be taken inconsistent with the ground on which the houses stand being thrown into the roadway?

MR. AYRTON: No further steps will be taken than such as are necessary for the completion of the new Home and Colonial Offices.

STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD JOHN HAMILTON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Government intend passing a Bill through Parliament this Session to enable them to deal, if necessary, during the Recess, with the grievances of Stipendiary Magistrates in Ireland?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that the Government had been, both officially and unofficially, in communication with the resident magistrates, with the view of coming to some settlement with them on the subject of their grievances, but they had not yet arrived at any conclusion which he could lay before the Treasury. It was therefore out of his power to say whether it would be possible for him to lay a Bill before Parliament; but he believed the Government would be able to deal with the matter without a Bill.

THE LAND ACT (IRELAND)—CHAIRMEN OF COUNTIES.—QUESTION.

MR. VANCE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, What increased remuneration has been given to the Chairmen of Counties in Ireland for the additional duties imposed on them by the Land Act; and, if any arrangement has been made to carry out the provisions of the Act by conferring increased remuneration on the officers of those courts for the additional duties they are bound to perform?

MR. BAXTER: Sir, the hon. Gentleman will find at page 9 of the Supplementary Estimates delivered this morning the increased remuneration proposed to be given to the Chairmen of Counties in Ireland for the additional duties imposed on them by the Land Act. No arrangement has yet been finally decided upon regarding the manner in which the officers of the Courts are to be paid.

ARMY RE-ORGANIZATION—COMMAND OF SUB-DISTRICTS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is intended to appoint a permanent Staff Officer to assist the Colonels commanding sub-districts in the duties of their commands, the supervision of the Militia and Volunteers, and the management of the Recruiting Service, besides the command of the Brigade Depôt when such has been formed, entailing upon them a large amount of correspondence; and, when Quartermasters will be appointed to such Brigade Depôts as have been formed?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the plan is stated in detail in the First Report of General M'Dougall's Committee, paragraph 18, to which I must refer my hon. and gallant Friend. The Major, it is there stated, will assist the Lieutenant-Colonel, and his general functions will be those of a Brigade-Major or District Adjutant. It is intended that the Quartermaster shall be appointed in the next Gazette.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. DODSON asked the President of the Board of Trade, in reference to the Resolution unanimously agreed to by the House on the 22nd of March 1872 in favour of the reform of Private Legislation, Whether he remembers that on the 25th of April 1872 he expressed the hope that the Government might be able to submit a proposal on the subject before the Session concluded, and that on the 17th of June 1872 he assured the House that the subject was under consideration and would not be allowed to drop; and, whether he will state the steps which Her Majesty's Government have taken and propose to take in order to give effect to that Resolution?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he would ask his right hon. Friend, in return, whether he remembered what the subject was with respect to which he (Mr. Chichester Fortescue) spoke on the 17th of June last year? What he said on that occasion was that he would remind his right hon. Friend that the share of responsibility he undertook in this matter was mainly to ascertain whether the system of Provisional Orders could be improved and extended. He was carrying on that inquiry and was in communication last Session with other Departments of the Government which were as much interested in the system of Provisional Orders as the Board of Trade. If his right hon. Friend had asked this Question in the beginning of the Session he could have informed him that he had failed to discover any method of extending the system. This year the Board of Trade had issued more than its former number of Provisional Orders; it had made 53 and submitted 46 of them to Parliament. The Local Government Board had increased its number from eight last year to 51 this year; and the number of Orders under the Education Act was sure to be increased. In Ireland a recent Act had begun to come into operation, and when the advantages of Provisional Orders came to be better known, he hoped the Act would have a much larger operation. He was far from saying that nothing could be done to extend the system of Provisional Orders. The Board of Trade might very well extend the system by enabling local authorities to obtain Provisional Orders for the erection of gas and water-works, instead of their being compelled to proceed by way of Bill. That was a point he would not lose sight of. This did not cover the main subject which his right hon. Friend had in view, and he (Mr. Chichester Fortescue) had reluctantly come to the conclusion that so far as the Executive Government was concerned the power of framing Provisional Orders could not be seriously extended; and if the great and serious question of Private Bill legislation, involving large interests, were to be dealt with outside the walls of Parliament, that could not be properly done through the instrumentality of the Departments of the Executive Government, but a tribunal of a permanent and judicial character would have to be created for that purpose.

MR. DODSON said, that his Question had not been clearly put, and he would repeat it in a plainer form.

PORTUGAL—SUPPLIES OF AMMUNITION.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BARTTELOT asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, Whether it is true that a large quantity of small arms ammunition, commonly known as Boxer cartridges, has lately been supplied by the War Department to the Government of Portugal or some other Foreign Government; and, if this is the case, whether the Right Honourable Gentleman will state the exact quantity so supplied?

SIR HENRY STORKS: Sir, three-and-a-half million rounds of small arms ammunition, commonly known as Boxer cartridges, have been supplied to the Portuguese Government at their request, conveyed through the Foreign Office.

EGYPT—CLAIMS OF BRITISH SUBJECTS.—QUESTION.

MR. MILLER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can inform the House whether the land and other property belonging to the Alexandria and Ramle Railway Company (in which British subjects are largely interested), taken possession of by the Egyptian Government, has been restored to that Company; and, whether Her Majesty's Consul General at Alexandria was authorised to submit to arbitration the matter of the land so taken possession of?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, the right to the land in question is still in dispute between the Alexandria and Ramle Railway Company and the Egyptian authorities, and the question is one over which, in the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, the British Consular Court has no jurisdiction; it rests, therefore, with the Company either to submit their case to the Local Courts or to let it be decided by arbitration—a course to which, I believe, the Egyptian Government is not averse.

ARMY—NEW PASSAGE HILL, DEVONPORT.—QUESTION.

MR. J. D. LEWIS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that the Government intends to throw upon the ratepayers the expense of the maintenance of a road known as New Passage Hill, Devonport, which was originally constructed by the War Department through land the property of the War Department, and has recently been diverted from its former course by the same Department, without first complying with the provisions of the General Highway Act as regards the state of repair of a road before its dedication to the public; and, if so, by what authority?

MR. CARDWELL: I am informed, Sir, that the road is a private one, which, if it pleased, the War Department might altogether close. It is not required to be maintained for any military purpose, and Army funds are, consequently, not expended upon it. There is no objection to the local authorities acquiring the road, if they desire to do so, for a public highway.

ARMY—THE AUTUMN MANOEUVRES—BILLETING.—QUESTION.

MR. BONHAM-CARTER asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, Whether any and what compensation will be given to the occupiers of licensed houses subject to billeting who have been or will be liable to extra inconvenience owing to the movement of troops for the special purpose of the Autumn Manoeuvres; and, if any, how it is to be distributed, and the course of proceeding to enable them to avail themselves of it?

SIR HENRY STORKS: It is intended, Sir, as a temporary measure, to give licensed victuallers and inn-keepers an extra allowance of 3*½d.* for each hot meal issued. In cases in connection with the Autumn Manoeuvres where this allowance has not been given, special application should be made for it direct to the War Department.

INTERNATIONAL LAW.

ANSWER TO ADDRESS.

Answer to Address [8th July] reported, as follows:—

V.R.

I have received your Address praying that I will be graciously pleased to instruct My Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to enter into communication with Foreign Powers, with a view to further improvement in International Law, and the establishment of a general and permanent system of International Arbitration.

I am sensible of the force of the philanthropic motives which have dictated your Address.

I have at all times sought to extend, both by advice and by example, as occasion might offer, the practice of closing controversies between Nations by submission to the impartial judgment of friends, and to encourage the adoption of International Rules intended for the equal benefit of all.

I shall continue to pursue a similar course, with due regard to time and opportunity, when it shall seem likely to be attended with advantage.

NAVY—THE TROTMAN ANCHOR.
QUESTION.

LORD HENRY SCOTT asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, looking to the recent serious casualty to the "Northumberland," and disasters to other of Her Majesty's ships from default of Navy ground-tackle, and to the manifest importance of providing the best and most trustworthy anchor for use in the Royal Navy, he will state what practical objection exists, if any, to carrying out the proposal indicated in Mr. Trotman's Letter to him of the 13th January (vide Return No. 275, 1873), and of determining, by unerring tests and actual proof, the relative powers, the instantaneous grip or biting properties possessed by a light Trotman anchor comparatively with the more cumbersome and costly established Navy anchor of double its weight?

MR. GOSCHEN: Sir, the late casualty to the Northumberland was not caused by any fault of the Admiralty anchor. The anchor did not fail; it held properly and efficiently; but it was the cable which failed, and parted under very exceptional circumstances. When the second anchor was let go there was no reason whatever to say that it dragged from its position, but, in veering cable, the Northumberland fouled the Heracles, and so efficient was the anchor of the Heracles that both ships were held by that one anchor and cable. Therefore, the casualty to the Northumberland was not caused from default of the anchors, and no disasters have occurred to other ships from the same cause. The Officers of the Navy do not generally consider that Trotman's is a better or more trustworthy anchor than the anchor generally in use; it was supplied to the Warrior at Mr. Trotman's request, and after it had been in use for two years, Captain—now Admiral—Cochrane reported that the anchor could not be depended upon for biting and holding when first let go —the same defect that had been so often reported in Porter's anchor, and which Mr. Trotman professes to have remedied. There can be no better test or proof of the relative powers of anchors than practical trial on board ship in actual service; these have been made, and prove that Trotman's anchor cannot be always depended upon for instantaneous grip or biting properties. Naval Officers have not that confidence in Trotman's anchor for a man-of-war which is possessed by many in this House; and I am bound in cases of this kind to be guided by the knowledge and experience of my naval friends.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (1870)
AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 188.]

(Mr. William Edward Forster, Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said: I believe it is not usual for a Minister who is in charge of a Bill, in moving the second reading to do so with any speech; but although I am very averse from taking up the time of the House, especially at this period of the Session, I think, perhaps, it will be for the general convenience if, in the present case, I make a few remarks. More than a month has elapsed since I had an opportunity of bringing in this Bill, and, owing to the exigencies of the Public Business and the lateness of the hour, I only made a very brief statement. Although it was impossible to bring it before the House on an earlier day, yet the question has excited so much interest in the country, and there has been so much comment on the Bill—or rather, as I shall presently endeavour to show, on one provision of the Bill—that it may be well for me to explain a little more the ground on which the Government have taken the course they have taken. It is also, I think, due to the House, and the most straightforward way of dealing with it to state precisely, at the opening of this debate, the course which the Government intend to take. The clause which has excited objection to the Bill is the third, which undoubtedly is the most important. That clause has two objects, and contains two provisions. The first object is to secure education for the children of out-door paupers; and the other is to transfer to the Poor Law Guardians the power given to school boards by the Act of 1870 to remit school fees under certain conditions and limitations. I believe I am right in saying that it is the second of these provisions which has excited most comment and opposition in the country. I wish, therefore, shortly to state the reasons why the Government thought it right to propose that clause, and, in saying so, I fear I must detain the House for some time by recalling its attention to grounds on which in 1870 we passed the well-known 25th clause that excited so little attention at the time and so much attention afterwards. We felt while we were passing that Bill into law that provisions for schools were of little avail unless we could get scholars into the schools. The principle on which we interfere with the education of children who attend elementary schools is, that there shall be assistance from the public funds. We grant large sums out of the taxes, and we look forward to considerable assistance in localities, either by rates or subscriptions. But we have to deal with the children of parents who are too poor to pay the school fees, even after those fees have been reduced from the sources I have just described; and the question was, how to enable such children to get into the schools. There was, however, an easy plan of doing it if the House had assented to that plan. It was to do what is done in most of the States of America, and to state that all the education given in the State schools should be free. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) made a proposal to that effect, and I have never denied the force of the argument used in favour of it. I think, however, the argument that we ought not to take from parents all responsibility overweighed the argument he brought forward quite independently of the enormous cost such a system would entail on the country. I need not say more about that principle, however, because an overwhelming majority of the House decided against it. There still remained the question, how these children were to be got into school. We introduced three provisions into the Act of 1870 in order to effect that object. One was to the effect that a school board should be able to start a free school when there were special circumstances—when a locality was in great poverty, or when there were other special circumstances which made such a school desirable, and when the Education Department as well as the school board was convinced of its necessity. With regard to that section, I can only state that as yet no school board has applied to us to sanction a free school, and, consequently, that clause has not hitherto been put into force. Then there was the 17th section, which gave power to the school board, as managers of their own schools, to remit the fees if they thought the parents were too poor to pay them. This provision seemed necessary in order to give them the same power as was possessed by other managers. And, lastly, came this much-disputed 25th section, giving power to the school board to pay the school fees in what I may call voluntary schools, provided they were public elementary schools, and gave, therefore, a guarantee for efficient secular education. Therefore, the first object in passing the 25th section was simply this—to enable the school boards to get children into school who otherwise would, in all probability, remain out of school. But there was another, and a very strong reason for passing it. We introduced into the Act—or rather the House agreed with the Government in including in the Act—a provision for compulsory attendance, which although only permissive has yet, I am happy to say, been largely made use of, and the by-laws framed under it are now in force throughout nearly one-half of the country. Our feeling with regard to the 25th clause was that it was impossible to compel a parent to send his children to school if he were too poor to pay the fees, unless at the same time such assistance were given to him as would enable him to pay them. Consequently, the second object of this clause was to take from a parent whom it might be necessary to compel to send his children to school the only excuse he could urge against the compulsory power. If there had not been some such provision I do not believe any magistrate could have put in force the compulsory by-law in the case of a parent who was plainly too poor to pay the school fees. These were our objects. In the comments which have been made upon this clause, there seems to be a notion that the Government had some hidden and abstruse reason in passing this section — namely, of subsidizing and aiding denominational schools. I do not think, however, that any Member of the House does really hold that view. Nothing could be more straightforward than was our object, and no objection was made in the House to our proposal at the time, nor for some time afterwards; and so little conscious was I of the possibility of such an objection being made, that on being asked what was the use of giving a power under the 12th section of the Act for a district to form a school board by its own wish, even when there was no deficiency of public school accommodation, I remember I stated as one reason that they would be able to pay the fees of children at voluntary schools; and when I made that reply it excited no comment or opposition from any of the hon. Members who are now so opposed to that provision. That was the way in which the clause came into the Act and the ground on which it was passed. And now I come to what has happened in the working of the Act. There have been two strong objections raised against this clause in different parts of the country. The first objection is, what I will call the denominational objection. Several gentlemen feel strongly that although the clause was not passed with that intention it has had the effect, as they consider, of subsidizing denominational schools. They say that that is inexpedient, and in some cases they say they are conscientiously opposed to such a provision. Another objection is what I may term the economical objection. It is that the members of school boards are not so able as the members of the Boards of Guardians to ascertain whether a parent ought or ought not to receive assistance. It is urged, the power to give such assistance out of the rates might lead to too lavish expenditure, besides demoralizing the recipients, because they might receive aid when it was not absolutely necessary. With regard to the denominational objection, I do not know that it would be expedient for me to detain the House by giving the reasons why I do not agree with it. I have frequently stated those reasons, and therefore I need only state now, that although I am surprised at such an objection being felt, I do not for a moment deny that it is felt. I can assure my hon. Friends who entertain this objection that I much regret that this difficulty should be connected with education, and I should be most glad if the Government could remove it without at the same time injuring the cause of education, and disregarding and trampling on what we conceive to be the rights of parents. Knowing, however, that there was this objection, it was our duty to set to work and consider how to remove it. There was one simple plan by which we were told we could do it—namely, by repealing the 25th section and leaving only the 17th section; that is to say, by taking from school boards the power to pay fees to voluntary schools, and leaving them the power to remit fees in their own schools. A good many persons ask why we did not take this course, and they will quote in their favour the Returns which have been laid upon the Table of the House. These Returns seem to show that so little money has been paid under this section that we might with great safety take from school boards the power of paying fees to voluntary schools. I read this morning in a newspaper of great circulation and weight on educational matters a statement that only one school board in ten has adopted the clause; and as it is desirable that in a matter like this we should have the exact facts, I think it right to say that the statement in question is an entire mistake. It is quite true that in only three or four towns in the kingdom has this clause been largely put into operation, and that the largest percentage is to be found in Manchester and Salford, while in Bristol and some other towns it has been used to some, but nothing like the same, extent. We must not suppose that because the fees of a few children have been paid that the clause has not been of any service or importance in these towns, because the fact is that it would have been impossible for the school boards to put the compulsory by-laws in force, as they have done in town after town, to the enormous advantage of education, if they had not had the power of leaving no reasonable excuse for the parent by offering payment of the fees, if necessary. Otherwise the inability to pay would have been successfully pleaded in the majority of cases by parents who had not sent their children to school. As I have said, it is an absolute mistake to say that one in ten of the school boards have made use of this clause. There were 563 school boards in the kingdom at the end of June in this year, a great many of them being small ones, which have not put the by-law in force. We have now to consider only those boards which have put the by-law in force, and they number only 212, but comprise 9,000,000 persons, or an enormous proportion of the population which is under school board rule. Of these 212 boards, 64, with a population of about 900,000, have inserted in their by-laws only the remitting clause, leaving out the paying clause; 106 have inserted both the remitting and paying clauses, and 41 have not thought it necessary to say anything about it. These last have acted quite rightly in doing as they have. If we had to frame the Bill again we should take a similar course; because it is not necessary for the school boards to make any by-laws with regard to the matter, inasmuch as they have, and cannot divest themselves of, the power conferred upon them by Sections 17 and 25 of the Act of Parliament. I have the highest legal authority for saying that the existence of that power would prevent any parent being punished for not sending his child to school if it could be proved before the magistrate that he was too poor to pay, and that he did not get help from the school board for the school which he preferred. I have entered into this statement to show the exact position in which we stand with regard to this section. As I have said, I was desirous to meet the difficulty, and the manner of doing so which was suggested to me was to repeal the section and put nothing in its place. In a circular which has been issued by the National Education League, and which reached my hands this morning, hon. Members are asked to oppose this Bill because the failure of the Government to repeal the 25th clause had caused extreme disappointment to all who had at heart the cause of National Education and of liberty of conscience. The Bill, as it stands, does propose to repeal the clause; but I grant that it also proposes to re-enact it in another form. Consequently, I suppose what the League objects to is its re-enactment. Let me then, in the first place, consider whether the effect of the clause is to injure the cause of National Education. I believe we are most of us agreed that it is desirable to make use of provisions for compulsory attendance as far as we can do so without committing injustice or hardship, or exciting public feeling against it. I really think we must all of us feel, also, that compelling a parent to do anything with regard to his child is not the easiest of matters, and that, in the interest alike of compulsory attendance and the cause of National Education, we ought to compel as little as we can help. Putting aside for the moment any question of the conscience of parents, let us consider what would be the effect of repealing this clause without at the same time putting any other provision in its place. At this moment the country is covered with voluntary schools, and the object of the Act we have passed is to supplement that provision where it is needed; but my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, and those who think with him, must know as well as I do that for a long time to come voluntary schools will out-number the school board schools very largely. Is it wise or prudent, then, to have this difficulty in compulsion—that you will say to the parent who is too poor to pay the fees that he shall have no choice of school for his child, according to convenience of locality, to say nothing of conscience or other preference, but that he must send his child to that school only which we prefer? I am perfectly sure that compulsion would fail if you forced parents to pass by the schools which suited them in order to make use of schools which did not suit them. Therefore, I say that to repeal this clause and put no other provision in its place would be to hinder the cause of National Education, which the circular of the Education League requires us to have at heart. The question of liberty of conscience is a very delicate one, and one on which it is difficult to speak without exciting feeling. This I will say however—that there is not merely the conscience of the ratepayer to consult, but also the conscience of the parent, which it is necessary to interfere with as little as possible. There are some places, undoubtedly, in which the parents would only have one public elementary school near them, and in cases of that kind we must, in exercising our compulsory powers, be content to give the parents the protection involved in the power to withdraw their children from the religious education. But surely where there is a choice of schools we ought to allow of its exercise. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham and the other members of the Education League may say—"But this is a man receiving State aid, and ought not our consciences to be considered when we think it wrong to pay for education in which is included religious instruction of which we do not approve?" I am very sorry for this objection, and I would meet it if I could; but I feel that the cause of education must suffer great harm if the compulsory provisions are met by the parents saying that they are to have no choice as to the schools to which their children shall be sent. I am convinced that if we do not allow a choice we shall have to contend with what parents allege to be a conscientious objection so powerful that we shall be unable to work the Act. We may say they have no right to feel this; but I cannot use that argument, nor do I think my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham can use it with justice, in regard to the feelings of the parents. Being unable to meet the difficulty in the way suggested, by the total repeal of the clause without putting any other proposition in its place, we set to work to see whether we could adopt some other plan. We felt that although it was impossible absolutely to meet it, we might try, and perhaps with success, to diminish the objection. We were told that the result of this clause as it stands is very large subsidies to voluntary schools. This certainly was not our object. What we wished to do was mainly to prevent parents having a reasonable excuse for not sending their children to school. The first object of our proposition was to limit the payment of fees out of the rates as much as possible, without making compulsion impossible. At the present moment the school boards have power to pay the fees independently of whether they are or are not putting in force the compulsory by-laws. By our proposition we limit the payment of fees to districts in which there is compulsion, and to those parents only who are too poor to obey the law without assistance. We also attempted to meet the views of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham by limiting the amount to be paid. We were told that the amount we were giving was so large that the voluntary schools could exist solely by help of the State grant; but I think I can prove that at this moment no such schools do or could possibly exist. In taking the limitation mentioned in the Bill—namely, 2*½d.* a week—we adopted the system which from experience had been found to answer well, more especially in Liverpool. But the clause which has excited so much opposition is that which provides that if the child of a parent, not being a pauper, is required to attend school, and if it is found that the parent by reason of poverty is unable to pay for the child, it shall be lawful for the Guardians to pay the school fees, and that duty was imposed upon them by the clause, the parent having liberty to select for his child such elementary school as he should think fit. I confess I am surprised at the conscientious objections made to a proposal which limited the grants out of the rates simply and solely to parents who from poverty were unable to obey the law, though it still gave to the parent thus unable to obey the law, power to choose the elementary school for his child which in other circumstances he would conscientiously have selected. That, however, is not the only change the provision makes. It changes the paymaster. Instead of the school board being allowed to pay, that duty is transferred to the Guardians. Our reason for proposing that change was that we felt we should be thereby meeting the economical objection, and that the Guardians would be more likely than the school boards to spend the ratepayers' money without doing harm to the recipients or injustice to the ratepayers. This we thought, not because they are a more able or a more conscientious body, but because they have the machinery which, in our opinion, would give them a better means of testing the necessity of the parent. Such was the ground of our proposal. Now, I come to the manner in which it has been met. And in the first place, I must admit that there has been great objection made to it by the Boards of Guardians themselves. To a certain extent, I confess I expected that opposition. No body of gentlemen—especially those who are busily engaged in performing other duties—would, under ordinary circumstances, be anxious to have new duties imposed on them. It was natural, therefore, that we should look for some objections from that quarter. We had, as I have said, anticipated it and considered it; but we came to the conclusion that the balance of argument was on the other side. At the same time I cannot deny that the argument urged—namely, that there is danger in bringing the parent who is not a pauper in contact with the Relieving Officer—has weight in it. We did not think that it outweighed the benefits to be conferred by the provision; but it cannot be denied that in some instances the effect might be to break down the barrier between the parent and pauperism. However that may be, the fact remains that we had strong objections on the part of the Guardians to contend with, and we were bound to bear in mind that the Government that attempts to work by the help of local machinery must to some extent consider the feelings of the gentlemen composing the local bodies. We are too much indebted to their aid to endeavour to ride rough-shod over them without giving their objections consideration, and perhaps extending the benefit of the doubt to the local body. But there were other persons we desired to meet besides the Guardians, and I certainly did hope that the limitation of the power in Section 25, both as to the amount and the number of the cases, and this proof that our object was not the subsidizing of voluntary elementary schools, but to give power to enforce the compulsory clauses, would have conciliated some of my hon. Friends who I find are opposed to it. I cannot help thinking, however, that the clause was prejudged before it was placed before the House. But we must meet the facts as we find them, and I cannot deny that we are not in a position to plead as against the objection of the Guardians that we have conciliated the opposition of those who were opposed to Section 25. There was another fact we had to deal with—namely, the feeling of the school boards. It is best to be candid in these matters, and I confess that I have been in some respects surprised at the action of some of those bodies. So far as we have had any expression of opinion from them on the subject, it is, I must say, against the proposed transfer. About 10 school boards have sent in to the Department memorials against it; and I must admit that they are among the most active of the boards—not merely Manchester and Salford, from which we expected opposition, but Stockport, for instance, which certainly has worked the clause with much care and with very great success. I can only imagine that the school boards felt that there was a sort of slur cast upon them—I am sorry they entertain such a feeling—in taking away any portion of their duty, especially as I know they are actuated by the desire to be of the greatest possible benefit to the children in whose behalf the duty was imposed. Well, then, we had to consider whether it was desirable to persist in this transfer, and I must acknowledge, although I still think the balance of argument to be in its favour, I am of opinion it would not serve the cause of education if we were to insist upon it. It is, therefore, the intention of the Government so far to alter the 3rd clause as to take out of it the proposed transfer of power under Section 25 to the Board of Guardians, and that, of course, implies that we take away all mention of that clause. That brings me to the other provision in the clause—that for securing education to all pauper children—a provision which, if adopted, would, we believe, materially serve the cause of education. Its object is to repeal the Act which is known by the name of your predecessor, Sir Denison's Act—in order to re-enact it in a much more extended and efficient Act. That Act, I believe, has done much good, and probably went as far as the House at the time was disposed to go or the country would have approved of. But the objection to it is this—that it does not carry out its own object or fulfil its own title. It is an Act for providing education for children in the receipt of outdoor relief. But it does no such thing. It is left to the discretion of the Guardians to make provision for that purpose or not, just as they think fit, and the result is that while a large number of Guardians do so a large number do not. There are 647 Unions in England and Wales, and of these 321 have put the Act in force and 300 have not. As to the remaining 26, I have no information on the subject before me. Of the Unions in the metropolitan district 21 have put the Act in force and 10 have not. There is, however, a provision in the Act which makes it very difficult to put it in force. It provides that it shall not be lawful for the Guardians to impose, as a condition of the relief, the education given to the child of the person requiring relief; but where the Guardians have put the Act in force they are obliged to disregard the law, and make a condition of the relief, the education of the child. I do not see how you can work the Act without it. If the House says the Guardians ought to pay for the education of these children out of the rates, they have a right to expect from the parents that the money shall be used for that purpose, otherwise they can have no right to claim relief from the rates. I have been looking around for objections to this proposal, because I had really hoped that it would meet with the almost universal acceptance of the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens) has published a letter in which he alleges, as the ground for his objection, that this provision for education would be an inducement to pauperism. He forgets, however, that there are two sides to this question. There is not only the individual who asks for relief from the rates, but there are also the Board of Guardians and their officers, whose duty it will be to ascertain whether they have a right to it. The clause does not say that a person who is otherwise able to do without it shall ask relief for educational purposes; but where relief out of the workhouse is given to parents, then it shall be a condition of such relief that elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic, shall be given to their children, and the Guardians may give "such further relief, if any, as may be necessary for that purpose." Therefore, there is this protection—that it will be both the duty and the interest of the Boards of Guardians and the relieving officers to give no relief at all except where it is necessary. There will be many cases in which I do not think it will be necessary to give this educational aid to out-door paupers, because they may be assisted in other ways. The question is whether we are prepared to say because we will not impose this duty on the Guardians, that therefore these children are to remain untaught? I am delighted to find that the Guardians themselves throughout the country do not take that objection. In all the Petitions presented which I have seen, the Guardians ask for the withdrawal of the 3rd clause on the ground of the transfer from the school board to the Board of Guardians. I have in my hand an influential Petition from 21 Boards of Guardians—the very same collection of Guardians to whom my hon. Friend addressed his letter. They ask, it is true, for the withdrawal of the clause, and give five reasons in favour of that withdrawal, based upon the transfer, and not one against the extension of Denison's Act. But I have another and much stronger reason. A deputation of Guardians came up to me to-day who kindly saw one of my colleagues. They represented 11 Boards of Guardians, including many which had signed this Petition—namely, Manchester, Bolton, Sheffield, Rochdale, Huddersfield, and two or three others. I am authorized to state that all these Boards are in favour of the extension of Denison's Act. I should like my hon. Friend to allow me to read a Petition from the influential Board of Guardians at Mile-end Old Town, containing a population of 100,000 and in which the argument is better expressed than anything I could urge. They were also opposed to this transfer; but let the House hear what they say on the other part of the clause—

"That your petitioners are of opinion that it is of the utmost importance that the children of out-door paupers should regularly attend school, and such children form a considerable portion of the class which the Legislature had in view in passing the Elementary Education Act. That as the children of persons receiving parish relief are already in a measure under the care of the Guardians of the poor, they (the Guardians) are the parties by whom the duty of enforcing the attendance of such children at school should most appropriately be undertaken. That as Guardians have already a staff of officers whose duty it is to inquire into the circumstances of applicants for relief, the duty of seeing that those children regularly attend school could be conveniently intrusted to the relieving officers without additional cost to the ratepayers."

But that is not the only testimony in favour of this proposal. Among the recommendations in the Report of the Education Commission of 1860, of which the Duke of Newcastle was Chairman, and which marked an era in the history of education, I find the following :—

"37. That in the case of out-door paupers, the Guardians be obliged to make the education of the child a condition of the out-door relief of the parents, and to pay the necessary school fees out of the rates."

That recommendation was signed by all the Commissioners, including my hon. Friend and Colleague (Mr. Miall). It is quite true, that notwithstanding that recommendation the change was not made, and it was objected to by a Committee of the House of Commons appointed a year or two afterwards. The matter was, however, put in a different position by the Act of 1870, by the acknowledgment in that Act of the principle of compulsion, and by the declaration that it is the duty of the parent to provide for the education of his children as much as to feed and clothe them. I have dwelt upon this argument, because of the great regret and surprise with which I have read a passage in the Circular of the Birmingham League this morning. There was a useful Society formed in Birmingham in 1868, called the Birmingham Education Society, the object of which was to get children to school. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) who is the President of the Birmingham League, was the President of that Society. It had also the same secretary, Mr. Collins, and among the members was Mr. Chamberlain, a gentleman of great eloquence, whom I hope one day to have the pleasure of hearing in this House. [A laugh.] Hon. Members opposite may laugh; but I can only say I would rather answer him in this House than out of it. Nine other members of the League were among the Committee. The first Report of the Birmingham Education Society contained the following passage:—

"The Guardians have only a permissive power at present to pay the school fees of these children, but your Committee deem it very desirable that such payments should be made compulsory, as the rates cannot be expended in a better manner than in educating pauper children, thereby taking the most effectual means of diminishing pauperism."

It may be said that, to some very small extent, there might be a temporary and present increase of the rates. It has been my hard fate to have to deal with two of the most delicate subjects of legislation—namely, matters affecting the conscience, and matters affecting the pockets of the ratepayers; and I hardly know which I have found the most difficult. But I am very anxious that the strong feeling which I own exists at this moment against any increase in the rates should not keep these pauper children untaught. My hon. Friend's (Mr. W. M. Torrens's) Resolution has undergone three changes. First it stated that—

"Having regard to the existing burden imposed on local taxation for national purposes, this House is not prepared to adopt any measure for charging on rateable property alone the cost of primary instruction to the children of any class of the community."

In three or four days afterwards, however, the Resolution was changed to a declaration that the House was not prepared to entertain a measure "calculated to augment the charge on rateable property." This provision struck my hon. Friend at first, perhaps, as it strikes many hon. Gentlemen. It is much more objectionable from their point of view than it really is. It appears to them that this proposition is one which would charge the education of paupers on the ratepayers only. But has my hon. Friend forgotten that in the education of pauper children, as in the education of the children of other classes taught in public elementary schools, for every 6d. found by rates at least 6d. is found by taxes? Well, I put it to my hon. Friends who advocate the cause of the ratepayers so strongly, whether they expect to make better terms with respect to the rates on land? Do they expect to make better terms than this—that in everything done by local taxation half the money should be granted by way of help out of the taxes of the country? I do not think hon. Gentlemen opposite expect half the poor rates to be paid out of the taxes. But here you have that concession made, not, I grant, with a view to help the rates, but because it is the most effectual way of promoting education. My hon. Friends, therefore, cannot object to the proportion which is borne out of the public funds, and as to the expenditure of the money, I ask them to attend to the well-expressed statement of the Birmingham gentlemen in 1868. Looking at it purely as an economical question, can there by any possibility be a better expenditure of rate money than in getting the child of an out-door pauper taught? Is it not likely that the 2½d. per week spent on that child will be repaid ten-fold, because it is by the expenditure of that money the child will cease to be a burden on the rates? I believe it to be a step in the cause of education which it is most necessary to take. I believe that it is very urgent, because while you do not take it the education of those children is going back. There is another ground which I have to urge in favour of my contention. The Board of Guardians are, to some extent, declining to put into force those powers, on account of the passing of the Act. There are 31 Unions which have done so, and surely as between school boards and guardians, the latter must know better what is necessary to be given to an out-door pauper in order that his children may be educated. This change which I have described is the only change of any importance that we intend to make in the Bill. It will, perhaps, be convenient to the House if I state the course we intend to pursue with reference to the mode of procedure. We intend to ask the House to give a second reading to the Bill to-night, and then to-morrow to allow me to commit it pro forma in order to introduce this clause. There are two other Amendments which I would also propose to introduce, and to which there can be no objection. An objection has been made to Section 13, which provides that a school board shall be able to receive endowments for educational purposes. Some gentlemen have thought that if school boards were to be trustees for such educational endowments, they might have endowments left them for purely controversial purposes, and then they would be acting as school boards in contravention of the 14th section of the Act. But that was never intended; all that was intended was to get rid of some inconvenience, and I will introduce such words into the clause as will make the matter clear. Another thing that will be necessary is to supply an omission in the Act. The 3rd clause says that all relief and allowances given by guardians under this section shall be paid out of their Common Fund. That does not meet the case of the metropolis, where the Unions are combined together for what is called the Metropolitan Common Fund. This is a matter which will have to be set right. There are no other Amendments to be brought forward, except such as are purely verbal. The only thing I would say in addition is to ask my hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury whether he would really think it necessary to proceed with his Motion. The effect of his Motion, if it were carried, would be to defeat the Bill. Supposing my hon. Friend right in his opposition to the whole of the 3rd clause, the effect of throwing out the Bill would be almost more inconvenient than it is possible to describe. The result would be that the school boards would all die out this year, and that we should have no machinery for education whatever. Then I cannot suppose that my hon. Friend is anxious that the principle of the Ballot should not be applied to those parts of the country to which it is not applicable at present. Then there are clauses in this Bill which are really most necessary to enable the school boards to discharge the duty which they are so bravely trying to perform under great difficulties—the duty of obtaining the attendance of children at school; and those clauses will, I think, be universally allowed to be useful and necessary. I implore the House not to adopt the course proposed by my hon. Friend. I know it is late in the Session; but I do not think it is so late that we cannot, and that we ought not, now to ask the House to take a step, which would be a real step, in this difficult path, of securing the education of children. I do think that we ought to provide that a large class of pauper children, who, should they grow up in ignorance, are most likely to prove an injury to the State, shall no longer remain untaught. I beg to move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

MR. W. M. TORRENS, in accordance with a Notice which had for some time stood in his name, as an Amendment moved the Previous Question. An appeal had been made to him by the right hon. Gentleman which it might be deemed discourteous if he passed over in silence. He was asked if, considering the fact that the legal term for which school boards had been created in 1870 was about to expire, he would incur the responsibility of rejecting the present Bill, and thus throwing the whole of the organization out of gear? He might be pardoned for saying that he was perhaps the last individual in the House to whom such an appeal could have been appropriately addressed. The memory of Ministers was proverbially short; but making every allowance for the multitude and magnitude of the topics wherewith it was charged, and the venial readiness of the official mind to forget past difficulties and past help in extrication from them, he did think that the right hon. Gentleman might have remembered a circumstance connected with the history of the Education Act that ought to have precluded the appeal addressed to him. The House would probably remember that when the difficulties of applying the school board system to the metropolis appeared to be such that Government was half inclined to leave London altogether out of the Bill, provisions were suggested by him (Mr. Torrens), to which they did not disdain to accede, whereby their perplexities were dispelled and a great educational municipality was called into being and placed at the head of all the other bodies of the kind in the kingdom. Was it likely, then, that the author of the London School Board would with levity seek to destroy his own handiwork, to say nothing of upsetting wantonly and rashly many like institutions elsewhere? But he had been long enough a Member of the House of Commons to know that when on account of one or two obnoxious clauses it was needful or convenient to arrest the progress of an ill-constructed Bill, nothing was more common, because nothing was easier than its re-introduction next day with the objectionable clauses omitted; and he would undertake to say that if they put aside the Bill as it then stood, because of its pauperizing provisions, they would have it again before them expurgated and deodorized in the course of 48 hours. The simple rule of legislative work, when good faith was observed all round—a rule which it was never safe to forget—was that whatever you wanted to do that was useful and right you were bound to believe, and to act on the belief that some way would be found for accomplishing it, and he certainly should not have thought of asking the House to reject certain parts of the proposal of Ministers if he were not prepared to point out an alternative preferable alike in point of expediency and in point of principle. His first impression on hearing the exposition of the present measure by the Vice President of the Council six weeks ago—an impression which every day that had since elapsed served only to deepen—was that in substance, although not in semblance, it was a breach of the truce agreed on soon after Easter regarding Imperial and local taxation. Pending the production of a general plan by Government for re-adjusting the balance between parish rates and national taxes, they had a pledge from the First Minister that there should be no fresh infliction of burthens on rateable property, only for national objects. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No, no!] Well, it was certainly very unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman's words were understood at the time by everyone but himself in that sense; and it was beyond doubt or dispute that for the last three months he had had the benefit of that understanding; for instead of following up the rare advantage gained by the great majority recorded last Session in favour of relief to local burthens, the friends of that righteous cause had been content for the time to rest on the defensive, and to await the development of the official plans of redress and re-adaptation. He therefore framed at first an Amendment embodying this view. It was meant to challenge the principle of the Bill upon financial grounds; but as it was in its drift and purport little more than the Previous Question, he readily acquiesced in the desire of many to put the Motion in more general terms, leaving everyone free to lay what special stress he pleased on the reason in chief which might make him averse from the measure. Some opposed it on religious grounds, and some for economical reasons; as a panacea for sectarian strife, Birmingham laughed it to scorn; as leading the way to the certain democratization of the struggling classes, Manchester, in the name of its school board and in the name of 13 of the greatest unions around it, declared that it would only serve to "increase pauperism and decrease education." For him (Mr. Torrens) it was enough if upon any or all of these grounds they should, at least for the present, get rid of the Bill. When he found that many sitting on his own side of the House entertained stronger objections to it than even those urged by the economists of local taxation, he thought he was doing right in putting the question to the House in such a form that not only those who thought the Bill an infringement of the compact on the question of local burthens, but those also who were opposed to the Bill on sectarian grounds, could vote for his Amendment. He was prepared to stake the issue as distinctly as ever on the ground he first avowed—that primary education ought to be a national charge. If ever a man treated it as a national duty it was the Vice President of the Council, who, in 1870, appealed, not to the representatives of unions and parishes, but to a great nation running a race with other nations. The right hon. Gentleman was then taken at his word, but now he wanted to hark back, and to throw more of the burden on the over-taxed districts of the country. If there were 200,000 children who were not likely to have the benefit of the Education Act because of the poverty of their parents, the case was emphatically one for national consideration, to be met out of national means. He had said before, and he still believed, that the cardinal fault of the rating and school board system—its ineradicable weakness which nothing could cure—was that it was founded on the inverted ratio of the ability of the district or parish, so that poverty was overweighted with rates, and wealth got off comparatively scot-free. Where darkness and destitution prevailed they were told there was social danger. Danger to what, or to whom? To the dark and the destitute, who, by the law of social gravity, seemed to settle down in particular places and districts? No; if danger there were, it was to the wealthy and well-born who dwelt on the sunny uplands of fortune, and who every day sought to dwell more and more out of the sight and stench of want. These were they whose quiet and comfort, whose slumber and pleasure, whose moveable and immoveable property were to be made more safe by public order and primary education. Yet how little did the thickly planted and thinly peopled locality pay in school rates, for how little did it need in the way of schools compared with the over-crowded, over-worked, and over-burthened town, or portion of a town where childhood was said to be running to waste. Talk of the average liability, that upon the whole kingdom was insignificantly small—they might as well talk of the average health of the bright and festive ball-room, and of the cholera hospital. Equally misleading, but far more indefensible, was it to speak with unconcern of average burthens when confessedly and incontestibly no rule of proportion existed according to relative ability to bear them. The disparity was too palpable in the amount of education rates in distant and even in contiguous places; but it was infinitely enhanced by the exclusive incidence of rates on the occupation of houses and lands in exoneration of stocks and shares, mines and shipping, books and pictures, statues and gems. This state of things could be met only by greater grants from the Treasury, and the right hon. Gentleman said that it would be; but there was such a thing as an evasive realization of pledges. In the last Education Budget the right hon. Gentleman asked for £100,000 less than in the preceding year, while there was an increase of rates in all the most populous districts; yet it was said that if this Bill were passed the charge would be borne, half by the State and half by the rates. Local taxation had already reached its peacefully possible limit. In one of the poorer parishes—with which, as a representative, he was connected—a state of things had arisen which, he would venture to say, could not be surpassed for injustice and hardship under the working of the existing system. The operation of that system was twofold. The Education Department having at its disposal the powers of the Endowed Schools Commission, as well as those of the Elementary Education Act, was able to bring to bear a double method of pressure which was simply intolerable. Its weapon was not a knife, but a shears. Where endowments existed heretofore for the moral and mental succour of the impoverished classes, it was coolly proposed to alienate them for the benefit of wholly different localities and classes; and when the people thus menaced with spoliation complained, they were told for their comfort that they might lay on a school rate to make good the want thus capriciously caused by a confiscating Commission. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: In what parish?] One parish to which he referred was St. Luke's, Middlesex, whose trust property, to the extent of £115,000, the Endowed Schools Commissioners appointed by Government and controllable by them, had formally announced their intention to despoil, in order to set up in another county some fantastical scheme of higher education. Even without this Bill the wrong about to be done was hard enough to contemplate with equanimity ; but when, in addition to losing their old charitable trust funds, and having to pay heavy rates for new school-buildings which they did not believe they required, it was proposed that the ratepayers should have a second school rate laid upon them for the children of out-door paupers, the grievance became unbearable. Whatever school boards might do about permissive compulsion, they did not, and would not in general, levy a tax upon their self-helping and hard-working constituents to pay school fees for the worthless and laggard, and idle. School boards were ready to take over old schools and to build new ones when they were really wanted. They were ready to sweep the slums, and to compel the urchin brood to come in. School boards were ready to use the powers of the Act to compel negligent parents to send their children to school, although it entailed some augmented charge to the district ; but what school boards, with half-a-dozen exceptions, confessedly would not do was to add materially to local rates for the payment of school fees. And for that reason—avowedly to avoid the friction and hindrance incident thereto—they now proposed to jumble the charge for school fees with that for blankets and bread, in order that the instinctive repugnance of the community might not be excited against the payment when disguised in the general rate. The Vice President asked, would they grudge 10 farthings a week to rescue each destitute child from ignorance ?—and he expected them to take for granted when he specified that sum that it would never be exceeded. But it was rather too late to try the effect of the same mesmerism on the same Parliament that had been used as a medium in this same affair. It did require all the cool-handedness of the right hon. Gentleman to offer them a second time a guaranteed maximum of rating for anything connected with schools. In 1870 he solemnly undertook that the new charge on rateable property should never exceed 3d. in the pound. In his speech explaining the details of the measure, a fine edge was put even on this assurance by the confidential communication to the House that, in point of fact, it was seldom intended to touch that amount, but to quiet men's minds it was set up as a fixed limit. They went into Committee in March ; and all April, May, and June they were kept wandering up and down the mazes of an intricate measure ; and all that time the 3d. maximum was kept jingling in the public ear, as the answer to all suggestions as to excessive charge. A sad misgiving haunted certain minds, and an incredulous Friend who sat for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), on the 8th of July proposed to insert a condition to the effect that half the school rate anywhere found to be needful above 3d. in the pound should be paid out of the Exchequer. Simple-minded man, how little he understood what might afterwards be called an essential portion of the principle of the Bill to which he had given his consent ! The Vice President of the Council pooh-poohed the Amendment as altogether unnecessary, provision having been made, as he said, in a better way for any charge over the 3d. maximum. The weather was hot, and the House was tired, and the Minister looked so honest, that the right hon. Baronet withdrew his Motion. And, then, what happened ? Within half-an-hour Clause 84, without debate or division, vanished like a dream. It was quietly struck out of the Bill. The maximum had served its turn, and was flung into the waste-paper basket. To keep up the show and the sham a new clause, which now figured as 97 in the Act, was substituted, by which in the comparatively few parishes where a 3d. rate would not raise £20, the Committee of Council had power to give a supplementary grant. But in the vast majority of places, especially in the overtaxed towns where the affluent stream of rural labour was ever tending to swamp the resources of urban industry, no power or even pretence of power was claimed by the Privy Council to lighten in any way the extra burden of education. In a manual of the Education Acts, published by a trusted and well-informed officer of the Government (Mr. Owen), and circulated under their sanction, there was this candid comment on the change thus made—

“The 97th section does not limit the amount which the rating authority may be called on to pay, but fixes 3d. in the pound as the minimum to be paid before any additional grant.”

Thus, then, they had the net result that after having served its turn the maximum of the Bill became a minimum in the Act. And now they were asked to shut their eyes again and hear the chink of the farthings that they were told were to measure the new expenditure. Queen Anne's farthings were few, and they became precious; Queen Victoria's farthings, if once they were sanctioned by Parliament, might prove costlier still. It was not, after all, the fees which constituted the hindrance to the children being sent to school; that was not the excuse that they practically found only or oftenest made. The want of clothing and food when the school was a long way off was more frequently the cause of absence pleaded. At present the answer of the school board was—"We have no power to give clothes or food. But turn the case over to the guardians, who have the power, and what will happen? Your 10 farthings a-week will soon crop up into 6d. or 1s." At best the proposition of paying school fees out of the school rate was in the estimation of forethoughtful men questionable enough. But severed as the practice was to be from every association likely to confuse it in the popular mind with pauperism, most people thought permissive compulsion could do little harm; but at least it led to no further consequences, and it was fenced round with certain guards to prevent, if possible, its expansion. They saw by the Returns on the Table that these were not ineffectual; in but three or four places had any large sum as yet been paid in fees. The country in general was in no haste to have school boards; and even where they existed there was a strong disinclination manifest to use the power of permissive compulsion, or to pay school fees. All this would be slowly but insidiously changed if they adopted it. It was a Bill for confusing in the popular mind all ideas of frugality and unthrift. Instead of an anodyne they would have a double blister. It brought not peace but a two-edged sword. The blunder had one merit—that of being obvious. Often mistakes of policy might be disputable; but the blunt candour with which they were asked to shut their eyes and to be deluded over again into what was ironically called a compromise was a matchless specimen of official intrepidity. Should they be told that the amount was small, and therefore harmless? But did not the worse poisons work insidiously and by accumulation? Strychnine and antimony could only be absorbed at first in moderate quantities; large doses would turn the stomach, and the fatal element would be expelled. It was the silent and unnoticed increase of mischief that was to be feared in social as in physical life; and the worst feature in both was that when the vital current had been once tainted it was almost impossible to cure either heart or head. Let them beware of the beginnings of evil; and, above all, beware how the proposed change would subvert gradually all the good instincts and sound principles of hard toiling life. He asked the other day one of the clearest headed men he was acquainted with—one who had had long experience in parochial matters—what would be the working of the measure. His answer was simple but comprehensive, candid, and clear—"At first you would not," he said, "notice perhaps any general change, but the new system would show every man his way to the relieving officer." As first framed it gave the ratepayers a chance of escape from part of the new burthen; it might not be much of a chance, and in the end it probably would not have been. As the Bill was brought in a month ago the 3rd clause contained two distinct provisions for payment of school fees by Guardians. In the first place it proposed to convert the permissive statute of 1855 into a compulsory law requiring Guardians to pay for the schooling of children whose parents were on the out-door list. In the second place it proposed that the school fees should be paid to parents who were not on that list. In other words, it tendered an alternative to the needy either to go on the parish themselves along with their children, or to send on their children, and for a little while longer stay off themselves. The Bill as it first stood created to some extent a deferred liability. It opened, indeed, a sad perspective of degradation and detriment; but it might be argued that part of the mischief it threatened was in the present, and part in the paulo-post future tense. What had they now? As if to mock the fears of Guardians expressed in Petitions to the House from every part of the country, the Vice President offered to cut the 3rd clause in two ; to leave out the alternative to foreshorten the picture of rateable plunder, and get rid of even stay of execution. Bad as it was before, he would make it in every way worse. To offer school fees out of rates to parents who are not to be called paupers, was to lead them into temptation ; but it might have been said on the other hand, that you held out the hope to the tempted man that he might not be deemed by his neighbour a pauper, and that you gave him a counter-temptation to work on for his bread. In so many words it was proposed that it should be a condition of out-door relief that the children should be sent, not to the workhouse school, but to any school in the parish their parents choose—so that the inducement was greater than ever to seek out-door relief. Let it not be said they had the workhouse test. What did this mean ? If all the parents, or half the parents, of the infant multitude they would compel to learn should comply with the test, let them think what the effect would be on the labour market and on the amount of rates ! And if the Guardians, afraid or ashamed to crowd the unions to overflowing, should obey this ill-conceived measure by giving out-door relief, let them consider how wide and how widening a circle of pauperism they would recklessly cause. Like the expanding rings on the surface of water they would soon lose all power of following them. How many a father who has now only work, as he says, off and on, is forced to pinch and forced to pawn in order to keep his wife and his children together ? He has never been on the parish. If he be poor he prays, and if he be sceptic he swears, that he never will. What keeps up his heart in privation ? What makes him forget wakeful nights and fretful days, but the hope that things will mend before he is quite broken down ? He looks his bright-eyed boy in the face and mutters between his teeth—"Thou warn't born to be a pauper." And he toils and suffers on somehow—anyhow. In the heart of this manhood, throbbing as it does in the breasts of honest multitudes, lies the industrial life of England. Why should they poison the current of that life ? Why should legislation in the tempter's form creep by the bedside of the struggling man and whisper in his sleepless ear—"Don't be a fool, don't be ashamed ; we'll take the frown out of the law and make it smile on you if you will go to the relieving officer and get upon the out-door list. Nay, we will pay you for the job ; we'll bribe you through your best affections, your children shall have the best schooling in the parish, and shall sit side by side with those of your snugget neighbours if you will only be a little base and ask the Guardians for the double dole—bread for yourself and books for them." The man recoils, for he is still a man—there is still in him the sense of shame. But by-and-by the mother comes to know that next door they have been to the workhouse and agreed to the condition named in this depraving Bill, and in order to get good schooling for their children out of the pauper fund, they have agreed to gulp the lie and write themselves down paupers. What will John say to that the next time there is only bread on the table and nothing wherewith to buy beef or beer ? Again, the Inspector comes to him and again murmurs low—"Don't be a fool ; do as others do ; put your hand silently into the pockets of your fellow workmen and furtively extract from them the price of your children's education." Like the gradual widening of the sluice once broken, every hour lets in a greater volume of the flood. One of two things will happen —either Guardians, like school boards, will refuse to execute the law, and then your Bill for pauperizing education will break down ; or they will give way first a little, then a little more, until at last too late they will find themselves unable to resist the rush for school fees made conditional. They were told that this was but an extension of Demison's Act, and to carry out the delusion the Act of 1855 was to be formally repealed, only to be forthwith re-enacted in a more comprehensive form. There could not be a greater farce, for nothing could be more unlike what was done 18 years ago by the unanimous will of both Houses of Parliament than what was now proposed to be done by this most objectionable Bill. The predecessor of the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair, as they all remembered, was one of the most cautious and circumspect men in all that concerned legislation, and the men with whom he conferred in every step which he took during his long career in Parliament were emphatically those who were least likely to make rash experiments upon the fixed laws and permanent institutions of the country, to get rid of any passing evil or to meet any ephemeral gust of unpopularity. He (Mr. Torrens) had still in his possession a letter written from Ossington in 1851, inquiring when a division would be taken against the second reading of a Bill which he felt it his duty to oppose, in common with the present First Minister of the Crown and the present Lord Chancellor, who staked and lost his seat upon the issue. It was a Bill brought in by the Government of the day, supported by all the weight of their rivals, and shouted for by an excited populace. But Mr. Denison was not a man to palter with old principles in deference to a sectarian cry or to escape a political difficulty. He fore-saw clearly that the measure would fail because it was unsound, and having a true love for the honour and dignity of Parliament, he voted in a minority of one to five against it, and its repeal as an absolute and abject failure he had the satisfaction as Speaker of putting to the House ere he left the Chair. Were he still amongst them, he would assuredly repudiate the empirical perversion of the measure that bore his name. In the brief record preserved in Hansard of what took place when the Bill of 1855 as brought in by him, two things were clear. The first that he meant it simply to legalize a pre-existing practice of Guardians to give in exceptional cases schooling to the children of persons who had out-door relief, and whom it was not desirable to send into the workhouse; the other, that if he had had his will he would have proposed to lay half of the extra charge upon the Consolidated Fund; and the reason he gave for not doing so in 1855 was, the exhausted state of the Exchequer—for we were then in the midst of the Crimean War. For he was an honest man as well as a humane man; and when taking in hand a merciful though small measure of relief to the poor, he neither forgot justice to ratepayers or the duty of guarding property in general against the influx of claims by the idle or worthless tending to swamp all thrift and to debauch all habits of self-help. When the Bill went to the Lords, the present Duke of Devonshire, who had charge of it, urged its adoption upon the clear and definite ground that the education of indoor paupers being provided for in workhouse schools, and that as these schools were capable of accommodating many besides, it was hard not to allow children of outdoor paupers to be taught there too, thus keeping wisely and carefully to the unobliterated distinction between pauperism and self-dependence—that vital distinction which the measure before them proposed to efface. Nor was this essential point overlooked or undebated in the Lords. A suggestion was actually made in Committee to oblige the guardians to give school fees to indigent persons generally. And how was it met, and by whom? Lord Granville defended firmly the true line taken by Mr. Denison and the Duke of Devonshire; and he warned the Peers that there would be great risk in adopting such a principle which would entirely alter the character of the Bill, and he counselled the Mover not to accede to it. The instincts of prudence and true policy swayed the Peers, and Denison's Act was passed without any departure from its original lines. He did not argue that it must never be changed; but he wished to mark distinctly the fact as it stood, that the Act of 1855 not only furnished no foundation for the present measure, but that properly weighed and estimated it was a strong negative pregnant against it. The Administration that sanctioned Mr. Denison's Act, and supported him in carrying it, contained not a few of the men who had taken part in settling the policy of out-door relief by the statute of 1833—amongst them was Sir George Lewis, then Chancellor of the Exchequer. How he would have opened his eyes had he heard it coolly proposed to break down the test of out-door relief, and to give not merely shelter or food in a casual ward to persons in absolute destitution, but to give so many shillings a-week to every parent who, living at home, might be able to convince the Guardians that he could hardly afford to pay for his children's schooling as well as his neighbours could pay it for him. Talk of justice, morality, or independence of feeling, with this unlimited exaction plan on the Table? It was mere trifling to talk of it as an extension of Denison's Act—it was its direct opposite. The Act of 1855 adhered strictly to the principle of a wholesome test and free discretion in Guardians, which its author refused rigidly to waive. The amount annually bestowed on out-door relief in this country was £3,600,000, and of that sum at least two-thirds was spent on temporary out-door relief. He wished to know whether such an amount of temporary relief as that was to be withheld unless the children of the necessitous class were driven into the schools? It was a strange thing that a nation which was able to spend £75,000,000 a-year was unable to afford a few farthings for the education of the poor, but must throw the burden upon the already excessive local rates. He regarded the Bill as being a bad and demoralizing measure. After 18 years' experience, Denison's Act had been found to be a nullity in general, although it might have been put into force in some rare instances. Denison's Act was a permissive Act, and it was evidently not intended to be used for the purpose of creating a new pauper class. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Amendment.

SIR MASSEY LOPES, in seconding the Amendment, said, he could add but little to the singularly able speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. He was glad, however, to have an opportunity of expressing his cordial concurrence in the course which he had taken. He objected strongly to the Bill, because it proposed to place on one description of property considerable additional burdens for what was undeniably a national purpose. He had always been an advocate for education, but had always considered elementary education a national need and national responsibility, and believed no greater fiscal injustice had been ever perpetrated than the imposition of an exceptional education rate upon owners and occupiers of real property. When the original Bill was introduced he had always protested against it, and had endeavoured unsuccessfully to limit the amount of rate; but unfortunately neither the House nor the country were sufficiently alive to the injustice that was then created. It appeared to him unjustifiable—he might almost say monstrous—before they knew the amount of responsibility incurred under the original Act, before they had experienced the full effect of that unknown quantity of indefinite expenditure then fixed on the rates, before they were able to calculate the normal sums rate-payers would be annually called upon to contribute, that the Government should ask ratepayers to give them another blank cheque so as to enable them to relieve Imperial taxation by a further addition to local charges. The proposal, too, he thought, came at a very unfortunate time, for there was no question with respect to which the country was at the present moment so impatient as that of local taxation. The Government, however, although they had several warnings, as in the case of the Juries Bill, which they had been obliged to take back and alter, did not seem to perceive the temper on the subject which existed out-of-doors. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, it was said, only a week or two ago, was unwilling to ask the House to assent to any measure which would impose additional local charges. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No, no!] The right hon. Gentleman, it was true, had afterwards retracted his observations on that point; but he had retracted them only when he found out that so many Government measures depended on the extraneous assistance which was to be found in that quarter. When the Vice President of the Council introduced the Bill he told them that the Government grant had been less by £100,000 than the Estimate, and yet he proposed to add at least three times that amount to the rates. It was said, moreover, that the present Bill would create no new expenditure; but that was the old story, and burnt children very naturally had a dread of the fire. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council had stated, that if Denison's Act were made compulsory it would sweep 200,000 children into the schools who did not now attend them. Again, under the original measure, the right hon. Gentleman estimated that the education of pauper children would cost 30s. per head; but as the Government aid amounted at present to only 12s. per head, that left a sum of 18s. per head to be provided for those 200,000 children from other sources. This alone would amount to £180,000 per annum. He made this calculation under the voluntary system. But how would the case be, he should like to know, if all the children went into board schools? He believed that the estimated cost of each child at the school board school was something between £5 and £8 per child, and those schools were, at all events, greatly more costly than voluntary schools. Making a very moderate computation, then—and he defied the right hon. Gentleman to prove his statement to be incorrect—he would put the cost of a child at a board school at £3. and if the Government only gave 12s. it would be seen what a large amount remained to be provided out of the rates. It must also be borne in mind that the parents were about to be deprived of the earnings of the children who were thus about to be sent to school, so that the question assumed a very serious aspect. One of the arguments which had been advanced by the right hon. Gentleman in favour of the original measure was that it would diminish pauperism, and that, as a consequence, the rates would be reduced; but while the Bill had been in operation two years the poor-rate levied was £500,000 more than at the commencement of that period, although the number of out-door paupers was 100,000 less than last year. Such was the state of things at a time of unexampled prosperity; what it would be under other circumstances he would leave the House to judge. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that another effect of his proposal would be to reduce the police rate; but the police rate had, notwithstanding, in the same period, increased 3 per cent. He also assured them that in no case would the education rate exceed 3d. in the pound, and there was a provision to this effect in the first Bill that was introduced; but already had that amount been exceeded in 80 places where board schools had been established, one parish paying as much as 1s. 7d. and another 1s. 4d. in the pound. They were also told that the estimated expenditure would be divided into three parts, between the Government grant, the fees, and the rates. If fees were to be remitted, two portions, instead of one, must fall on the ratepayers. It was quite clear, he might add, that the Government were about to create a new Poor Law by means of such measures as that before the House. The Act of Elizabeth made provision for the sick and the destitute without any conditions; but the ratepayers were now asked to provide for the ignorant; and it was about to be made necessary for the poor man, in order to obtain relief, that he should send his children to school. In his opinion, the House would not be justified in taking away from him the right to relief which the Act of Elizabeth gave him. Why should compulsory attendance be limited to the destitute? This was a new condition which the law of Elizabeth never recognized. It was the thin end of the wedge. The right hon. Gentleman had never concealed his views. He had always advocated compulsion. Because school boards had great difficulty in determining whether parents were too poor to pay school fees, it was proposed to transfer this investigation and responsibility to the Guardians; but they were very unwilling to take it, and as they were an unpaid body, they had no right to enforce it, without consulting their wishes. The payment of fees by school boards could not be confounded with pauperism. It was a great mistake, in his opinion, to associate education with pauperism. It would degrade education, because they enacted that the payment of fees should not constitute parochial relief; that declaration would not affect the moral and social issues—it would be a distinction without a difference. This proposal would tend to pauperize and demoralize; it would open up a new form and channel of Poor Law relief; it would tend to lessen the self-respect and self-reliance of the poorer classes. It would be impossible, in his opinion, to carry out the provisions of the Bill. Suppose a man or his wife met with an accident, they could obtain no relief unless their children, at a time when their earnings were most needed, were sent to school. As the relief was only temporary, there was no power to keep the children at school. Local taxation reformers had always had two objects in view—first, to oppose any addition in any shape to their local taxation, and next, to transfer burdens which they conceived to be national to the Imperial Exchequer. The Government had given local taxation reformers no inducement to falter in the pursuit of those objects. They had introduced three Bills relating to local taxation, but they had withdrawn two of them, and the third, instead of affording relief, would inflict fresh burdens; because, while taking away all exemptions from real property, it perpetuated all the exemptions in favour of personal property. Since the present Government came into office—in 1868—they boasted that they had reduced Imperial taxation £9,000,000; but during the same period they had increased local taxation about half that amount. This Government Bill raised a larger question—it would induce many who were satisfied with the modest proposal of last year to make further and larger demands; to ask whether education was a national or local charge; to inquire, as national education was paid for by the State in Ireland, why a different system was adopted with public elementary education in England and Scotland? It would be a great dereliction on the part of local taxation reformers, and it would deprive them of their chance of ever carrying out the object they had in view, if they did not offer to the present measure the most vigorous opposition. The impending division would show who were true and consistent supporters of Local Reform and who were not; and the question they had to decide in regard to that Bill was whether special and exceptional burdens were any longer to be levied from one description of property only, and whether the owners and occupiers of real property were to be victimized and saddled with expenditure incurred for the benefit of the community at large.

Previous Question proposed, "That that Question be now put."—(Mr. Torrens.)

MR. TREVELYAN said, the Bill, by the removal of the provision transferring to the Guardians the duty of paying school fees, was practically turned into a measure exacting attendance at school as a condition of poor relief. It was to that part of the Bill that the very able and eloquent speech of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Torrens) was mainly directed. Now, the hon. Gentleman had not suffered the House to forget that he was a faithful Member for a portion of the metropolis. All his figures, arguments, and impassioned appeal referred to London and the few cities in the kingdom which were in an analogous position; and he left entirely out of sight a little fact which cut the ground from under his feet—namely, that in the metropolis and in the other great cities compulsory education was already the law in those districts where a great number of the pauper children were sent to school at the expense of the ratepayers. That was not the case in the country districts. In many places schools had been built by voluntary subscriptions, and by the taxpayers, and not by the ratepayers. The taxpayers contributed largely to the education of the teachers, and there was a capitation grant of 5d., so that the maximum amount that came from the ratepayers was 2½d. Among those sitting opposite who cheered the hon. Member for Finsbury the only Gentleman representing a metropolitan constituency was the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), who had introduced into the Scotch Bill that provision with which he cordially agreed, and which he regretted was to be struck out of this Bill, by which the Guardians, and not the school board, were made the paymasters of the fees of the children. Whatever support the hon. Member for Finsbury received elsewhere, he would receive none from those on that side who believed that every penny spent on education would be re-paid out of the £13,000,000 or £14,000,000 a-year raised in the form of poor rates and police rates. They must have gone back from their principles since 1870 if they objected to the extension of elementary education because it would cost money. Some serious objections had been urged by the body with which the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) was connected. They did not grudge the money for educational purposes, but the shape in which it was paid, and were opposed to the Bill because it called upon them to pay a large amount of rates for the support of denominational schools. When that Bill was introduced he was so much disappointed by it that he thought it ought to be opposed on the second reading; but he had since seen reason to come to a different conclusion. The compact entered into in 1870 by the Prime Minister, as understood by the Nonconformists, was that the tie between the local boards and denominational schools should be severed, and that the latter, as compensation for the loss of the rates and to give them a fair chance of existence, would have an increase of 50 per cent in the capitation grant. He believed the 25th clause, which was so hateful to many persons, and which, as far as he could trace, passed sub silentio, was an oversight on the part of the Government, while it was clearly an oversight on the part of the Members below the gangway to allow it to pass, and he maintained that the fact of pauper children in some cases getting their fees in an indirect manner paid out of the rates was not an adequate reason for opposing this Bill, and he believed that it would so much improve the educational position of the country that he should give his vote for the second reading. The real objection which he had to the Bill was that the Government did not take the advice of the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), who said that the real solution of the 25th clause was that they should call upon the voluntary schools to admit gratuitously children too poor to pay fees. This was no great demand to make, either in a pecuniary or a sentimental point of view, for the amount was now only £5,000 a-year, and these schools were largely aided from the Consolidated Fund as regarded building grants, masters' education and salaries, and capitation grants. It was therefore no unreasonable appeal to them to take these children without payment. If, however, they insisted on payment from the rates, and if the Government permanently sanctioned a principle which was originally an oversight, he did not wish to oppose the extension to a class especially needing it on account of a very small additional sum being charged on the rates. The Government, moreover, had so far deferred to the opponents of the 25th clause as to abandon the proposed transfer of the charge to the Poor Law Guardians, which would have been a perpetuation of the system they objected to. After carefully examining the Bill he had come to the conclusion that it was an authoritative declaration of policy on the part of the Government that they were prepared to recommend compulsory education to the House, but that owing to particular causes early in the Session the House retraced its steps and the Session came to an end without the great boon of compulsory education. It had been said that compulsory education had not been introduced because it would not satisfy the Nonconformists. Now, if too little attention was paid to them in 1871, he thought too much attention had been paid to them in 1873. He was glad that, as stated by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster), 9,000,000 of the people were now under compulsory by-laws, which at Bolton in six months raised the school attendance from 6,000 to 8,000; but he feared that the shrinking of the Government would weaken the hands of local boards in applying compulsion, and he was sorry the right hon. Gentleman had not been allowed to finish his work in his own way. He believed the Nonconformists would have approved the adoption of compulsion. Although he gave great credit to the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon), and the organization with which he was connected, he could not refrain from voting for the second reading of a Bill of which there was so much to approve and so little to complain.

Sir Massey Lopes

MR. NEWDEGATE: I hope the House will permit me to state in very few words the course I intend to adopt on this Motion. The provision intended by the Bill is for the education of children who need education most, because the children of actual paupers are provided for in the union workhouse schools, of which the masters are paid out of the grant for education, while it is to be hoped that the children of the labouring classes are gradually being collected into the other schools, whether they be board schools, or whether they be voluntary schools. Therefore, I admit the force of the right hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Forster's) appeal in favour of the children, who come under neither branch of this category. But I feel also the great weight that ought to attach to the reasons which have been assigned in favour of the Amendment. Manifestly, this is a proposal to increase the burden upon the rates, and it is a proposal which, in that respect, is diametrically opposed to the assurance given to the House by the Government, and diametrically opposed to the decision of this House itself with regard to local taxation. The hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) stated the case against this measure as involving an increase of local taxation, with the knowledge and with the power that he always displays upon this subject. But the hon. Baronet did not cover in his speech one portion of his original proposition as embodied in his Motion against the increase of local taxation—taxation, that is, levied on one description of property only. His original position was this—His Motion recommended the Government to avoid increasing the burden of local taxation by rating—in this manner—by adopting as a charge upon the Exchequer those expenses which are national—expenses required for objects the provision of which are already under Governmental inspection and control. I adhere to the whole of the original proposition of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon in this matter—the proposition which had the sanction of a majority of 100 in this House. I do not object to your providing for the education of the children of those who are obliged to apply for out-door parochial relief; but then I say, out of the Imperial revenue compensate the schools and compensate the ratepayers whether the schools be Board schools, or whether they be Denominational schools, to which these children are to be sent—for the burden you are about to cast upon them. You provide out of the Imperial Exchequer the salaries of the masters for the union schools; and I say to the Government that I will vote for your Bill, if you will undertake out of the Imperial revenue to provide an equivalent for the burden which you propose by this Bill to cast upon the rates, otherwise I shall vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Torrens.)

MR. MELLY said, he did not think the Government had ever promised that education or sanitary reform should await the complete remodelling of local taxation; and hon. Members opposite seemed to be mistaken in thinking that there was any pledge that there should be no measure brought in which would increase rates until the whole system of local taxation had been revised. He had heard with deep regret the cold-blooded speeches of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Torrens), and the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes)—no one who had not taxation on the brain would sympathize with their arguments. There were 200,000 poor little children to be educated, and unless they were to go back and to undo what they had decided on in 1870, they must find the means of educating these children, and of compelling their attendance at school. This was the whole scope of the Bill. Was he to re-argue the question whether ignorance was the fruitful mother of crime, and the cause of three-fourths of local rates? He had deemed it an admitted axiom that education was the best means of reducing the taxation attendant on ignorance and vice. The sole idea of the hon. Member for South Devon appeared to be that the local rates should not be raised. The hon. Baronet said that education and pauperism should not be associated; but, unfortunately, ignorance and pauperism had been always associated. The hon. Member (Mr. Torrens) ought to have met the question in a manly way by moving that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, and not by moving the Previous Question to catch a few stray votes on that side. His (Mr. Melly's) argument was that the children of persons who were actually in receipt of relief should be sent to school. The hon. Member warned them against tampering with the portion of the people who were on the edge of pauperism. But the Bill only dealt with persons actually in receipt of out-door relief. It made that relief conditional upon the school attendance of the children, and compelled the Guardians to pay 10 farthings a-week for 10 attendances at school. They had heard of the pockets of the ratepayers, of the consciences of religious people, and of the rights of the poor parents; had these poor little children no claim for consideration? They were many of them orphans under the care of very poor relatives, children of widows earning so bare a livelihood that the Guardians were already obliged to supplement it. The most neglected and degraded of our children, through no fault of their own, left destitute alike of proper parental care and of all education facilities, condemned to a life commencing in the lanes and gutters, ending too often in a police cell or gaol, had also rights. He attached more importance to their right to a week's schooling at 2½d., than to the outcry of the hon. Members opposite about local rates; and the division would show that the representatives of large constituencies on both sides of the House had small sympathy with the nightmare of municipal taxation, when compared with the claim of these 200,000 little ones to a chance of escaping through the school-room from an idle and vagrant life. The hon. Member, of course, asserted that the Bill was unworkable. He (Mr. Melly) was once a Guardian of the poor in Liverpool, and Denison's Act, now sought to be extended, had been worked most usefully in that large parish. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Finsbury (Mr. Torrens) said, the remedy was like laudanum or strychnine, and could only be administered in small quantities to extreme cases. It was regularly administered every week, and proved a healthy and invigorating beverage, popular with everyone. Every Monday the Guardians, before giving relief in money and bread, required a card showing the school attendance of the children of the family they were relieving. The hon. Member for Liverpool would show in detail that in Liverpool Denison's Act had worked very beneficially. The class in question there were chiefly the children of widows, whose absence from school was due to carelessness, and it was in many cases easily enforced by making a certificate of school attendance a condition of relief. Paupers, of course, preferred out-door to in-door relief, and the former might all fairly be made subject to this condition. If they received in-door relief, the children would attend the workhouse school without question under existing Acts; if they had any relief at all, it would be inconsistent not to insist upon the terms of the Bill. The hon. Member for Finsbury, asserting the right of a pauper to refuse to educate his child, though a free education was offered him, said—

"The law of England was that every man had a right to food and shelter; but now it was proposed to make relief conditional upon the children of the person relieved being sent to school."

And the hon. Baronet (Sir Massey Lopes) said—

"The House would not be justified in taking away from him the right to relief which the Act of Elizabeth gave him."

The Act of Elizabeth gave no right to in-door relief. If the condition be refused, make the pauper come into the house, send his children to the workhouse school, and let him go to the stone yard. The difficulty was purely chimerical. The unfortunate parents who were compelled to ask for parish relief would gladly send their children to school. Again, the hon. Member was badly informed when he said, "the 'dandy rich parishes' of London would escape the rates, and the poor of the East End would have to pay still heavier rates." He must know that under existing Acts in the metropolis the charge would fall equally on Belgravia and Bethnal Green, and he believed the whole expense spread over all the unions of England would not exceed £120,000. It was well worth while for Parliament to pay 15*s.* and the Guardians 8*s.* 6*d.* per annum to take a child out of the gutter and educate him at a board or denominational voluntary school, where he would mix with other children of a better class. Moreover, it was much better both for such child and for the country that their parents should keep up a home, no matter how poor, than that they should be brought up in the workhouse, in the atmosphere of confirmed pauperism, of which it had been well said, "once a pauper, always a pauper."

In comparison with the benefit to the children, the arguments as to the expense had no weight with him, but the hon. Baronet's calculations were most erroneous. Forty weeks' schooling at 2*½d.*

—[Mr. GLANSTONE: The maximum.]—as his right Friend said at the maximum, the charge was 8*s.* 4*d.* a-year, which would come on the rates. It could hardly be hoped that more than 150,000 of the 200,000 would be got into school, so the unions would not have to pay a sum of more than £70,000 or £80,000, and the Consolidated Fund would find £100,000 more. [Mr. TORRENS: Clothes?] The hon. Member said they must be properly clothed before they could be sent to school; but under the often-quoted Act of Elizabeth, the Guardians were compelled to feed, lodge, and clothe their poor children. He wished they did it more efficiently; any way, the clothes would have fairer wear and tear in morning and afternoon school than all day amid the ditches or gutters. The Bill would in the end diminish the rates, and as to the expense which was likely to be immediately cast upon them, it seemed to him that so far from being anything like £480,000 a-year, it would not exceed £100,000, or £120,000 a-year at the most. He hoped that the House would not be led away by the miserable cry about the increase of local taxation. He could not believe that hon. Members opposite would take such an inconsistent course. Were the speeches of 1868 and of 1870 forgotten? Was it necessary to allude in this House to the benefits of factory legislation? Hon. Members opposite then insisted that even when a child was learning the lessons of order, obedience, and industry in its daily work, it should go to school; would they that night insist that 200,000 pauper children, now learning the lessons of idleness and pilfering, should grow up in the lanes and streets with no other knowledge. The hon. Members opposite in no degree represented the feelings of the ratepayers in their exaggerated dread of taxation. He (Mr. Melly) was sent there by 20,000 working men—not to save their money unwisely, but to spend it well. He cared not whose religious prejudices he might offend, or even if for a moment he separated himself from some of his friends. This Bill opened the hope of educating 200,000 little neglected children, and on that ground alone would have his earnest support, even at an increased cost to ratepayers already overburdened. For if money judiciously expended in sanitary improvements was wisely invested if it ensured health—the most valued possession in this world—how much more wisely might they invest their money in the education of these little children, for it would not only render their lives on earth more useful and happy, but would conduce to their eternal welfare.

MR. HEYGATE said, the Bill left untouched the right of a parent to choose the school to which his children should be sent. Therefore, hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House had gained a great point, and ought to support Her Majesty's Government as far as they consistently could. Although he admitted that the local taxation question was of vast importance, the hobby might sometimes be ridden a little too hard, as in his opinion it had been on the present occasion, when they were about to obtain education for 200,000 pauper children at the smallest expenditure. At all events, he should not be deterred by that cry from recording his vote in favour of the Bill. Nevertheless, he was much disappointed at some of its omissions, and there were two points to which he particularly desired to draw attention. The first had reference to sanctioning the erection of unnecessary schools, and the consequent raising of loans in order to defray the cost of the building. He had been requested to mention publicly what had occurred at Keyworth, in Nottinghamshire, a parish which, in 1871, had a population of 749 persons. There was school accommodation for 133 children, with a proper proportion of space, and the school had been pronounced efficient and suitable by two Inspectors, and this had been acknowledged to be so by the Education Department. There was, however, a school board at Keyworth, the members of which resolved, by a majority of 3 to 2, to apply to his right hon. Friend for the sanction of his Department to build another school in the parish for 241 children, and for power to borrow money for the erection of the school. Thus provision would be made for the education of 374 children out of a population of 749. He was sorry to say that the Education Department sanctioned the application of the school board for this unnecessary school; but they declined to recommend the Public Works Commissioners to grant a loan, although they consented to the raising of the necessary money on the security of the rates. It appeared that, although the Education Department acknowledged that they could not divest themselves of the ultimate responsibility in every case of deciding as to the sufficiency of accommodation, they said they were advised that they had no power to prevent a board from providing such additional accommodation as might, in the opinion of the Board, be necessary. Now, if the Education Department had no power to forbid the raising of money on the security of the rates, for building schools which were wholly unnecessary, that was a state of things which required amendment, because the proceeding was against the spirit and intention of the Act of 1870. Such an application as he had alluded to could only have been made for the purpose of killing by inches the existing voluntary school. If it were intended that the school board system should supplant the voluntary system, the fact ought to be openly avowed instead of the result being brought about by a side wind. The intention of that Act was that the two systems should go on together pari passu, and if it had not been so it would never have received the assent of the House. Another grievance was that when once an application for the establishment of a board school was rejected it was in the power of a certain small number of persons who signed a Petition to re-open the question every 12 months. And such an occurrence was not only possible, but had actually taken place. In the division of the county he represented there existed a parish where, in the face of an excellent school, efficient in all respects, a noisy minority, led on by a few political agitators, had already, in two successive years, subjected the inhabitants to all the evils and expense of a contest, and were now, for the third time, demanding a poll in the hope of worrying the ratepayers into the establishment of a school board; and, though every year defeated by increasing majorities, there was nothing to prevent them from an annual repetition of such conduct. That might be viewed as a means of driving those who supported voluntary schools to the abandonment of those schools. If that was the meaning of it they should state so honestly and in the face of day; if not, the power given to a minority to revive the controversy should be limited to a certain number of times. He hoped that the Government would give their earnest attention to these points.

Mr. Melly

MR. CHARLES REED said, that while under no circumstances could he have voted for the Amendment, he was glad, after hearing the clear and candid statement of his hon. Friend, to reverse the decision he had arrived at to vote against the Bill of the Government, and to support that measure in its amended shape in the interests of national education. He thought the House was in danger of losing sight of the real objects of the Bill in a discussion wandering widely from the real mark. He was in a position to say that its provisions were most valuable, and though the Bill might be called a small one, it was most important. Many of the clauses had been framed specially to meet the views of school boards, whose suggestions had received the fullest consideration by the Department. It had been said that the Bill was unnecessary; but it was essential to provide for the coming elections, as was done in Clauses 5 to 9. Then Clauses 22 to 24 had reference to legal proceedings; and great facilities were afforded to work out a system which would make compulsion possible, without the hateful pressure of coercion. This question of irregular attendance was, after all, of the utmost moment, as would be seen when he reminded the House that in London alone 64,559 children were absent from school, and 46 per cent of them without reasonable excuse. Now, under the bye-laws of the London Board, 117 visitors were constantly employed—first having ascertained the number of children by house-to-house visitation—in enforcing attendance at some efficient school. If the first notice was disregarded, a summons was issued; the parent met a local committee; and at this point so strong had been the moral suasion, that 60,000 children had been drawn into schools within two years and a-half; and as the visitors were forbidden to direct the parent where to send the child, the fullest choice had been secured, with this result—that 44,400 children had selected existing voluntary schools, and 15,600 the temporary schools of the Board. It was not surprising when a child was earning wages that the parent should shelter himself under any pretext for not sending his child to school; and it was most difficult for the Board to prove the age of a child before a magistrate. This Bill placed the onus of proof upon the parent instead of the visitor; and the school register was to be taken as evidence of non-attendance in place of the teacher, who could not leave his work to attend a Court of Justice. These two provisions, he contended, would greatly aid school boards, and make the duty of the magistrate more easy; and it must never be forgotten that it was one thing to pass a compulsory clause, and another to work it. The object here was to facilitate its operation. The hon. Member then having adverted to Clause 11 and the borrowing power of school boards, referred to the Industrial Schools Act and the Amendment proposed to be made in it. The School Board had inquired into 1,803 cases of children found on the highways and under the arches of our railways. In the quarter ending June 24, 1873, of 312 inquired into, 53 had been warned and restored to parents from whom they had wandered; 7 were sent to their parishes; 7 to reformatories; 264 were brought before magistrates; 173 were sent to certified industrial schools; 50, under Section 16 of the Act, were taken, having been declared by the parent to be uncontrollable. This latter class were taken at great cost, and the tendency of the parent, he regretted to say, was too frequently to plead this inability to control. The School Board for London had proposed that the father should be made to contribute to this cost a sum of not less than 2s. weekly. The chief interest of the debate, however, centred in the 3rd clause; and, objectionable as Clause 25 in the Act was, he had at once felt that the proposal to force the indigent poor upon the rates was more objectionable still and must be strenuously resisted. The abandonment of that portion of the clause put an end to discussion, and it at once removed his chief objection to the measure. Clause 3 had reference to the expenses of education. Now, it was known to the Committee that the school boards had power to charge a fee and to remit such fee to poor children, or to pay for them the fee of any other efficient school selected by the parent. Now, there were at present 574,693 children in London between 3 and 13 requiring elementary instruction. 216,822 of these were on the rolls of efficient schools; 65,294 were in inefficient schools; and 82,692 were not in any school. In course of time No. 2 would be absorbed by No. 1, since all schools must make themselves efficient or close their doors, and No. 3 would be left to be dealt with. This 82,692 consisted of—(1.) Out-door pauper children; (2.) Children of indigent poor, not on the parish; and, (3.) Out-cast children, criminals and orphan children living with persons not legally responsible for their maintenance. For class No. 1 Demison's Act ought to provide, since the children of all paupers were under the charge of the Guardians, who, in London, exercise a wise discrimination as to their education. The London School Board put the case of the pauper children before the Local Government Board representing that, whereas 40,000 children might be educated under that Act, not more than 4,000 were at school. In consequence of that action the Local Government Board issued a Circular to the Guardians. He would not detain the House by reading more than a few passages.

"The Guardians were empowered to grant relief, so as to enable any poor person to provide education for his child."

It further urged

"that the Legislature intended that education

Mr. C. Reed

should be provided by the ratepayer," and said, "that the Guardians should, upon each application for relief, ascertain whether the children of the applicant are being educated, and if not, the Guardians should afford the parent such relief as may enable him to comply with the law, which expressly contemplates that his children shall be educated."

And to prevent abuse the Circular went on to say—

"If any parent should abuse the confidence which the Guardians repose in him, in respect to the use of the money so provided, the Guardians have an immediate remedy in their hands by stopping or varying the form of relief."

Well, the reply of the Guardians was unfavourable, and they did object to employ their machinery for the purpose. But if this permissive power were made obligatory and limited to pauper children, their own peculiar charge, he (Mr. Reed) did not believe there would be any difficulty felt. The Guardians would soon see that they could thus prevent the construction of new machinery at great cost; they would not have to educate, but to see weekly the school certificate; and the charge would not be on the parish, as at present, but on the common fund. In fact, the school board must look to the Guardians. Their first duty was to require parents and Guardians to secure the education of their own children. The question was not an open one, and this was certain—that in school board schools the pauper child would have an education not inferior to any others who were sent there for instruction. Class No. 3 came under the Industrial Schools Act, which, for their purposes needed fuller development, and No. 2 was under the operation of Clauses 25 and 17 of the Elementary Education Act 1870. He had never been in favour of Clause 25, and in the metropolis it was not needed. He was not now going to discuss the question, but he wished to tell the House his experience as to those classes who it was stated could never pay school fees. When the Bill of 1870 was before the House it was repeatedly affirmed that the children in ragged schools would all have to be paid for, under Clause 25 in voluntary schools. Now a large number of ragged schools had been transferred to the London School Board and probably 8,000 children formerly accustomed to pay nothing, had come under the fee system. Well, the parents liked the fee system, and with the exception of a very few, every child came with its penny on the Monday morning. The parent felt pleased to pay something, it was a good feeling to cherish that he was paying for the education of his boy, and though it took many pence to pay the whole cost of the child, it was a wholesome habit to get the parent to acknowledge his responsibility. The Board had at present 157 schools, and not one of them was a free school. The voluntary school fees usually ranged from 4*d.* to 6*d.* These fees were too high, but the class of children was meant to be select. The Board schools must take the poorest, and what was wanted was a low fee, an arrangement as to half time, and some outside help for food and clothing for children who were utterly poor and friendless. All this ought to be done without any appeal to the Guardians and so far as the children of the indigent poor were concerned their education must never be connected with pauper support. Let no parents or children be forced to the workhouse door, they would go for clothes if they went for school peace, and once familiarized with the receipt of relief, the area of pauperism would be indefinitely widened. On the whole he gave his support to the Bill on the second reading.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he should be sorry to allow this discussion to pass off without expressing his reasons for giving the measure his hearty support. He thought those who were objecting to the Bill were taking a course which was opposed to the cause which they advocated. The Bill itself had many useful provisions besides the 3rd clause, which had been made the principal subject of debate. It was, in fact, a collection of various useful Amendments of the Act of 1870. Although he was no friend of the principle of the ballot, he nevertheless confessed he saw some advantage likely to accrue from it in the elections of members of school boards. The clause extending the period of loans he viewed with considerable satisfaction. He also highly approved of the provision for enabling school boards to form unions of districts. He was much surprised to hear objections raised to the clause enabling school boards to receive gifts, and to find that they had sufficient weight with the right hon. Gentleman to induce him to modify such a clause. The objections raised to the 13th clause rested, he thought, on a very refined and unpractical sentiment. The sole remaining object of the 3rd clause of the Bill was to make Denison's Act more operative and compulsory, and to bring it to bear on what were called half-timers. He was astonished at the opposition to that clause. Denison's Act had been universally approved. The only complaint he had heard in respect of it was that it had been too little carried out. It appeared to him somewhat short-sighted, when they were trying to solve the difficult problem of compulsory education, that it should be considered a sufficient objection raised to the measure that it might increase the charge on local rates. It was in the very interest of removing the partial incidence of rates upon one species of property that he gave his support to the present Bill. The arguments of the hon. Gentleman who moved the "Previous Question" would go much further than he intended, for they would be equally applicable to a proposition for throwing poor rates and all educational rates upon the national fund. Of all the charges and burdens placed upon the rates, it appeared to him that this charge for the education of dependent poor children was the most justifiable, inasmuch as it ultimately became remunerative to the very rates first burdened. He looked upon this expenditure in the light of a profitable investment. The objection made to it was like that of the most benighted farmers, who thought avoiding all expenditure the way to get rich. Whilst expressing his gratification at the abandonment of the second part of the 3rd clause—namely, the transfer of the payment of school fees for pauper children from the school boards to the Guardians—he must frankly say he objected to the creation of a semi-pauper class that was involved in the abandoned paragraph, and in several of their recent enactments. That he thought a wrong principle to go upon. He took it that a man who received support out of the pockets of others for any of the necessities of life—shelter, food, or education of his children—was a pauper. But he hoped that this Bill, as well as all measures for the education of the poor, would rather be calculated to elevate them from paupers to independence and self-reliance,

There should be no connection between the workhouse and the national school. He hoped that the industrial and reformatory schools would become an organized part of the national education of this country. There was a lingering heresy which still kept them, mixed up as they were, connected with two other departments, and neither with the department they properly belonged to. The right hon. Gentleman had wanted, by the dropt clause, to propitiate the League, but had failed in doing so; and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would perceive now, if he had not done so before, that it was a hopeless task to attempt to conciliate those who were determined never to be satisfied; but with a sacrifice of more than he would give up—namely, to get schools away from the religious bodies who had hitherto made and supported them. Moreover, in his view, it was not worth while to attempt to satisfy the demands of a clique who were daily losing ground in public estimation. The Bill, as altered, might not do much, but what it did was likely to prove useful; and if it failed to carry out the first intention of its authors he was sorry, but he thought they should not lose the Bill on that account.

MR. SALT said, that owing to the alteration which had been made in the Bill in the course of the evening, it was impossible to pronounce at once a decided opinion as to what was likely to be its effect. He might, however, observe that he did not share in the objection urged by those who contended that an amending Bill ought not to be introduced before the original measure had practically come into full operation. The Bill of 1870 made a great change in our educational system, and it was only natural that it should require early amendment. But then ample time should be given to consider the Amendments proposed, while as to the proposal under discussion, his view was that it was not sufficient for the purpose intended, although it might be good so far as it went. He should be glad, therefore, if the right hon. Gentleman would withdraw the Bill altogether, and be satisfied with merely passing through the House one of a departmental character this Session. The main objection to the Bill, however, was raised from the position of the ratepayer, on whom it was said that it would lay large additional burdens. There was no doubt that of late years there had been growing up in connection with education a great expenditure which was not open to public criticism, or to discussion in that House, and with respect to which the ratepayer was absolutely helpless. That expenditure was imposed on him by the sole and irresponsible will of a great Department; and it was an expenditure which, according to recent accounts, reached no less a sum than £325,000, of which £28,000 was spent in elections, £64,000 in the administration of school boards, while a sum of £62,000 came under the head of other expenses for which no explanation had yet been offered. And it should be borne in mind that the case was one in which there was, practically, no appeal; for that which was called an appeal in the Act of 1870 was a pure delusion. The Department, if a certain number of the inhabitants of a locality complained that the claims made upon them were too heavy, might send down an officer to report on the matter; but it decided on the report without any control being given over its decision. There was an instance occurring in his own borough—Stafford—to which he would advert by way of illustrating his argument, and because he might not have another opportunity of entering a protest with respect to it. The school board in the borough of which he was a Member had succeeded in reconciling all parties, and had done their work efficiently. They had recently had a demand from the Education Department to build schools for the accommodation of 1,062 children; but at the same time, upon making inquiries, they found that they had in the existing schools vacancies for 402 children. The Department said it was necessary to supply school accommodation in the elementary schools for one-sixth of the population; but that was mere theory. A gentleman who had been long engaged in the practical business of education stated that, after an experience of many years, he had never succeeded in getting into his schools more than one-twelfth of the population. For his own part, he believed that one-tenth was much nearer the figure, and if that were the case what was the use of building school accommodation for one-sixth? Moreover, their own Inspector, an active and respected officer, stated his belief to be that the greatest number of children who were not in the schools, and who ought to be in them, was only 12. When these figures were made public, as they must be, their effect would be to make the people say they would pay no rates. In the evidence given by the Secretary of the London School Board, before a Committee of the other House, that gentleman said, taking round numbers, that there were 100,000 vacancies in the schools of the metropolis. The Department required the school board to provide accommodation for 200,000 children, and the calculations of the Secretary himself made out that it was necessary to build schools for 100,000 children, and that this would cost £1,100,000. The Department required that there should be new schools built in London for 200,000 children, at an expense of £2,200,000 on the rates, when there were actual vacancies in the schools for nearly 100,000 children. During the last 20 or 30 years under the old system, which had been more successful than it received credit for being, they had been dealing with the best class of workmen and peasants, who were, more or less, willing to send their children to school. Now, however, they were coming to the lower strata, and rightly so, because it was worth any trouble and expense to get them into their schools; but they would be dealing with a class more scattered, more shifting in their habits, more difficult to get at, and often hating instruction and religion. Were they to proceed upon theories and figures which practical men did not support, and to make the people pay for the building, at an enormous cost, of schools which would never be filled? The Secretary of the London School Board, in a light and airy way, said he only went for new accommodation for 100,000 children, which would only cost £1,100,000, or a halfpenny in the pound, for 50 years. So that the property of two generations was to be mortgaged to build schools that would never be filled. If the people were to be forced to expend money needlessly in that way, the effect would be that the cause of education instead of being promoted would be thrown back 40 or 50 years. He had felt great hesitation as to how he should vote on that Bill. He had come down to the House with the intention of voting for the second reading; but he found that the Bill had been thrown into a new shape, so different from what it was at first, and so uncertain in its results, that he thought the best course was delay, and the only way to achieve delay would be by voting against the Bill. No Notice had been given of this change which the measure had just undergone, and he had had no opportunity of communicating with his constituents to ascertain their feeling upon the subject. It was necessary that both the House and the country should have further time for reflection. He should give his vote against the Bill with extreme reluctance; but he should do so in the hope that if this measure was lost the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Forster) would introduce a purely Departmental Bill for the present Session, and leave the difficult and momentous questions which had arisen to be dealt with after more mature consideration had been given to them.

Sir Charles Adderley

MR. H. RICHARD: * I cannot say that I feel any great interest in this Bill one way or the other. It seems to me, a poor and peddling measure, and as an Amendment of the Education Act of 1870 utterly insufficient and unsatisfactory. I admit the Government was in great difficulty in any attempt they might make to amend the Act. But it was a difficulty of their own creating. In my opinion, that Act was built upon false lines from the beginning. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President undertaking to construct a system of national education, chose—in the face of all entreaties and remonstrances addressed to him by those who were his fastest political friends, and who had hoped that he would have worthily represented their principles and feelings in the Councils of the Queen—to frame his whole measure in such a way as to make it not national but sectarian. Such a representation coming from me may be regarded with suspicion, because I am thought by some to be an extreme man on this question. But I will give you the opinion of one who is not open to that exception, a member of the Wesleyan Methodist body, who are not esteemed political Dissenters. The Rev. William Arthur—perhaps the most distinguished and influential minister of that powerful denomination—at the meeting of a special representative committee appointed by Conference to consider this matter, which met in London in December last, thus described the measure of 1870—

"What with the remission of fees, with the subsidizing of the denominational schools, with the deferring of the time for stopping the building grants, and with the increase of 50 per cent, he (the right hon. Gentleman) held out such a stimulus as this country never had before for the moneyed people to rise and buy out of the hands of the Government the right to control, by education, the religion of the poor. I say that was a transaction that burnt a mark into the memory of honest men. Such a turn given to the Bill altogether altered the conditions of it, and constituted the denominational part of the Bill, the national system, attempting to make the national part of it, the supplement and the exception."

I have always regretted that the Prime Minister—who I believe has far sounder and broader views of what a system of national education should be than the Vice President of the Council, and whose regard for the interests of religion is certainly quite as much above suspicion as that of the right hon. Gentleman—did not with a firmer hand control his wilful and rebellious lieutenant. He would not then have witnessed what he now witnesses—the alienation of his friends and the exultation of his opponents. It was impossible not to be struck with the reception accorded to this Bill when it was introduced by the right hon. Gentleman three weeks ago. All the cheers with which it was greeted came from the other side of the House, and the shouts of exultant and derisive laughter with which the few words of disappointment as to the character of the measure, uttered by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) and myself were received from the same quarter, ought, I think, to have awakened some misgiving in the heart of the right hon. Gentleman. Not that I blame the hon. Gentlemen opposite in the least. They have the best right in the world to triumph. They have found in the ranks of the Liberal Government a more perfect instrument for their purposes than they could have found in their own. Nay, I will go further, and express my firm conviction that if the party opposite had been in office, and had taken in hand to frame a scheme of national education, we should have had from them a more fair, just, and liberal measure than has been given to us by the present Government. I think I have some good ground for this conviction. I have read a speech made by the Duke of Marlborough when he was at the head of the Education Department under the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli). And I was struck with this fact—that all the references made by the noble Duke to what is called the religious difficulty and the scruples of the Dissenters were most respectful and considerate, and he went so far as to say that if schools were ever supported out of the rates, they must be purely secular schools. I will give the House his own words. Describing various plans that had been suggested for meeting the educational wants of the country, he comes to "the plan of raising rates over limited areas and for local purposes." The noble Duke then proceeded—

"Here we are met with a very great difficulty in regard to what shall be the denomination of the schools. I see no conclusion, no escape out of the difficulty that would be created by such a plan, other than that of the schools being secular schools. That is the proposal made by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe), who has, I think, fairly viewed the difficulties of this position. He has seen that if you have schools supported by local rates, whether they be few or many, it would be exceedingly difficult to escape from the position that they must be secular schools. I do not think we are at present prepared to adopt a system of purely secular schools supported out of public rates."—[3 Hansard, cxci. 115.]

Besides which, I must say for hon. Gentlemen opposite, that so far as I know, they never asked for those portions of the Act which have given to the scheme its distinctly denominational character. Nobody asked for the extension of time for building grants. Nobody asked for the 25th clause. Nobody asked for the additional grants to denominational schools. Indeed, I remember the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) making an able speech on an Amendment I moved, objecting among other things to the proposed increase of grants to denominational schools, in which he stated that if there had been nothing else but that in my Amendment he would have supported it, and expressly on this among other grounds—that "nobody had, as far as he was aware, ever asked for an increase of the grant." All these clauses of the Act were gratuitous contributions of the right hon. Gentleman towards the extension and development of the denominational system. I am at a loss to conceive for what purpose the right hon. Gentleman introduced the proposal to transfer the payment of the fees of indigent children from the School Boards to the Board of Guardians. Whom did he hope to conciliate by such a proposal? In his speech on introducing the Bill, he referred to "many persons whose opinions the Government were bound to respect," and whose views they were most anxious to meet by this alteration. Who are those persons? Not the party opposite, whose Minister of Education he is, for I suppose they are perfectly satisfied with the 25th clause. Not the Nonconformists, for no sooner was the idea bruited six months ago than most explicit representations were made to the Government that such a mode of dealing with the question would be regarded by them rather as an aggravation than a relief of the grievance of which they complained. The change did not in the slightest degree touch the objection of principle raised by the Nonconformists. As it is expressed in some resolutions passed by a portion of the right hon. Gentleman's own constituents at Bradford—

"The objection of the friends of religious equality is not to a particular agency by which such an appropriation of public money is made, but to the principle of the payment of rates to denominational schools by any and every agency."

I need not dwell further on that, since the right hon. Gentleman has been obliged to withdraw that part of his scheme because there was a general insurrection against it through the whole country. Now if the House will bear with me a little longer I should like to say a few words on another part of this question in which I feel a very deep interest, and in respect to which I am anxious to set myself right with the hon. Gentleman opposite and with the House generally. I mean the question of religious instruction in day-schools. I do not question the perfect sincerity of those who maintain that religious instruction should be given in day-schools. I believe many of them are prompted by the purest motives—by genuine anxiety for the moral and spiritual interests of the people of this country. But why should they not accord the same credit for sincerity and purity of motive to us who hold that religious instruction cannot without great injustice be given in schools supported out of public money? It is not a pleasant thing to make professions of regard for religion in this House. It may well appear ostentatious and offensive to many. But we are driven to it by the accusations brought against us out-of-doors by men of high position. Dukes and Marquesses and Bishops are continually charging us with trying to deprive the people of this country of religious education. Some time ago I received a paper at the head of which were the respectable names of the hon. Members for Halifax (Mr. Akroyd) and Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright), in which all who do not agree with the Educational Union as to the way in which schools should be conducted are branded as "the enemies of religion." Sir, I repel the imputation. I am not an enemy of religion. On the contrary, it seems to me that, without religion, without the hopes it inspires, without the consolations it affords, without the prospects it opens out before us—

"Life's but a walking shadow; a poor player,
That struts and frets his hour upon the stage,
And then is heard no more."

But there may be a difference of opinion as to when and by whom religion should be taught. Indeed, I cannot better set forth the views of what is called the secular party than in the words of one whose opinions, especially on the education question, will be heard with respect on all sides of the House—I mean the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington). Speaking in this House some years ago, the right hon. Baronet said:—

"It is not the object or intention of the secular party to deprive the children of England of religious education. I believe their object is quite the reverse. I believe that so far from that being the case, the gentlemen who are most prominent as the leaders of the secular party are as sincere and zealous, and as deeply impressed with the necessity of religious instruction, as those who profess to belong to the religious party. I believe that the difference between the religious and secular party is not so much a difference of principle as it is a difference of time and place. The most eminent members of the secular party, looking at the sacred nature of religious instruction, think that school is not the best place for imparting it, and that, above all, schoolmasters, speaking broadly and looking at the character of schoolmasters, are not the men to whom they could safely trust religious instruction. I cannot deny that there is force in this view, though I must confess my own opinions are on the other side."

I have to thank the right hon. Gentleman for this just and candid exposition of the sentiments of those who hold the views of the secular party. The principle for which you contend—that religious instruction should be given in State-aided and rate-aided schools, and that the conscience of the parent should be the test of what that religious instruction should be—is one, I maintain, altogether incapable of consistent and logical application. You cannot carry it out without inflicting gross and manifest injustices, and involving yourselves in endless and inextricable embarrassments: Look first at the injustice. What is the position of the State in this matter, or of any authority which the State may call into existence and empower to act on its behalf? I will answer in the language of the great literary organ of the party opposite—The Quarterly Review. In a singularly able and liberal article, which appeared in that periodical more than 20 years ago, when reviewing Dr. Hook's celebrated pamphlet, the writer says:—

"The State, according to the existing constitution of these realms, can make no exclusive grants from the public purse. Her Majesty is the Sovereign of her whole people, whatever their religious creed. Parliament represents alike the Churchman, the Roman Catholic, the Independent, the Unitarian. Revenue raised for purposes of education, whether from the Consolidated Fund or by local assessment, is paid alike by the Archbishop of Canterbury and the follower of Johanna Southcote. The State being absolutely precluded from all partial assignment of its funds for the benefit of one religious community in forming a plan of popular education, must take one of two courses; either it must exclude religion altogether, or it must find some neutral ground, some conciliatory plan on which the State teacher may inculcate certain points of religion without giving rational offence to any."

The writer then proceeds to say that all that can be done in schools for the nation is not to teach religion so much as to diffuse a certain religiousness of spirit through the school. Now, Sir, I look upon the passage I have just read as to the relation which the State bears to all classes of its subjects, as perfectly just, and as indicating clearly the wrong that is done by the appropriation of public money to the support of denominational teaching. But I go further, and say that you cannot apply your principle without doing dishonour to religion itself. You have a vast Empire, comprising all varieties of religious faiths,

The time will come when you will have to care for the education of all these people. You have within your dominions millions of Mohammedans, of Hindus, of Buddhists; and must you, in deference to the principle that the conscience of the parent must be consulted, teach all these faiths in schools supported at the public expense? If you did that, do you imagine you would be thereby honouring religion? You would, in effect, be putting in the mouth of a Christian State the memorable dictum of Gibbon that all religions are equally true to the vulgar, equally false to the philosopher, and equally useful to the State. But there is no necessity to go to the East for an illustration of the difficulty which besets your principle. You cannot, you do not carry it out in Ireland. During the discussions that took place on the University Education (Ireland) Bill there were some curious and edifying acknowledgments which some of us on this side of the House watched with great interest. The hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. E. Lewis) in his able maiden speech, told us that he had come fresh from contact with his constituents, and that the one charge they had impressed upon him was to protest against and resist denominational education. He appealed to us below the gangway to be faithful to the cause of undenominational education, in apparently perfect unconsciousness that the appeal should have been addressed, not to us, but to his Friends who sat behind him. But a much higher authority, as the hon. and learned Member for Derry will, I am sure, allow me to say, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy) stated in most explicit terms that we were obliged to deal with Ireland on the principles of secularism. Indeed, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the City of Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) said later in the discussion, he talked pure League for a quarter of an hour. It was very gratifying to me and to many others who greatly respect and honour the right hon. Gentleman, to find him thus beginning to come to his right mind on this subject. It is true he applied some unsavoury epithets to secular education. But that does not signify. Epithets are but words; but he lent the sanction of his name and authority to the principle.' The case now stands thus: hon. Gentlemen opposite and some on this side of the House declared that religious instruction is with them a matter of principle. It is not all a question of expediency but conscience. To omit religious instruction from education is to them something dreadful—a wrong to the child, a violation of the conscience of the parent, and a dishonour to religion itself. Very well. But how comes it to pass that what is a solemn principle on one side of a narrow channel ceases to be a principle on the other side of the same narrow channel? No one will venture to say that it is right to have denominational education in this country, because the greater share of the teaching falls into the hands of the Church of England, and the Church of England teaches truth, and that it is wrong to have it in Ireland, because the greater share of the teaching falls into the hands of the Roman Catholic Church, and the Roman Catholic Church teaches error. That is the principle which forms the very basis of religious persecution, because it endows the State with the right and power to decide what is truth and what is error in religion, and to distribute its favours accordingly. Besides which it is not open to the Church of England to make that reply if it were so disposed, because in these days the teaching of the two Churches is to a large extent absolutely identical. Have not the two Archbishops just proclaimed that there is a considerable minority both of the clergy and laity who are desiring to suppress the principles of the Reformation; so that the very existence of our national institutions for the maintenance of religion is imperilled. What was it that wrecked the principal Government measure of this Session? Nothing but want of clearness, consistency, and courage on this subject of religious education in institutions supported by the State. The defeat of the University Education (Ireland) Bill was the Nemesis of the English Nonconformists. Why was it that our accomplished and adventurous pilot, who had guided the vessel with such consummate courage and skill through so many shoals and straits, on that occasion steered her on the rocks? Because he saw the Vice President of the Council, like a spectral apparition in the offing—brandishing in his face the English Education Act—for undoubtedly the denominational character given to the English Education Act had enormously aggravated the difficulty of the Government in dealing with Irish education. I have said that the course you have taken will involve you in great and constant embarrassments. The right hon. Gentleman has made the Committee of Council a sort of Supreme Court of Appeal to decide between contending religious sects, and they are already beginning to find out the perplexities in which that involves them. A case has lately occurred at Croydon. The school board in that town have prepared a sort of manual of devotion for the use of the school. In that manual they have inserted 11 collects from the Common Prayer Book. Some of the inhabitants have memorialized the Department on this subject, contending that in introducing these collects there has been a violation of the 14th clause of the Act which interdicts the teaching of formularies distinctive of any particular denomination. I have examined these collects, and there is nothing in any of them that I personally should object to use. But there are persons who strongly object to them, and others who regard their use as a manifest infraction of what is called the Cowper-Temple Clause. The appeal has, however, been made in vain and "my Lords" decline to interfere. But if the contents of the Prayer Book of the Church of England are not to be regarded as formularies distinctive of a particular denomination, will the right hon. Gentleman publish a Minute, defining for the guidance of school boards what is a "formulary distinctive of a particular denomination?" Then the Department has had another correspondence with the Rev. Dr. Rule on behalf of the committee of the Protestant Alliance in reference to the books used in Roman Catholic schools, and again "my Lords" have refused to do anything effectual. This is only a taste of the work that awaits them as a Court of Appeal. I believe the very difficulties in which you will become entangled, and from which there is no other escape, will ultimately drive you to the adoption of the principle for which we contend—that of united secular and separate religious instruction. And allow me to say that this principle is nothing new in the history of the educational legislation of this country. The Queen's Colleges established by Sir Robert Peel in 1845 were based distinctly and avowedly on that principle, and the Irish system of national education was originally intended to rest upon a similar basis. Nothing could be more explicit on this point than the declaration of Lord Stanley. In his first draft the plan of the Government was described as one of "combined literary and separate religious education, each department altogether to exclude the other." And the same statesman, speaking in this House in September, 1881, in introducing his measure said—

"The plan which he had in view would, for the future, afford the people of Ireland the advantages of a combined literary, and a separate religious education. Experience teaches, that endless controversy must arise from any attempt to give religious instruction to children of different religious persuasions."—[3 Hansard, vi. 1257.]

But I am told that the conscience of the parent must be respected. I confess I fail to see the grievance alleged in this matter. Here is a number of people who absolutely neglect the education of their children—allow them to grow up in ignorance and barbarism in the heart of civilization. The State said they should no longer be permitted to do this, but should be compelled to send their children to a school where they would receive instruction in the elements of useful knowledge. And I cannot see that such people have any hardship to complain of, because such wholesome and salutary instruction was not combined with the teaching of their own peculiar religious views. It was very much as if a parent who neglected to provide food for his children and left them to starve, and was offered a loaf of wholesome bread should object to receive it unless he were also supplied with a bottle of wine. And then the argument as to the conscience of the parent as put forward by the right hon. Gentleman was singularly one-sided. It is understood that the right hon. Gentleman is willing to apply compulsion without school board schools. What would be the result of that? There are hundreds, probably thousands, of parishes in this country in which there is only one school, and that a Church of England school. And what is to become of the conscience of the poor Methodist or Nonconformist in that case? It may be a school in which the children are taught that Dissenters are heretics and schismatics, that the Methodist chapel is the way which leads to perdition, that Dissenting ministers are Korahs, Danths, and Abirams whom the earth, if it were at all properly alive to its duty, ought to swallow up alive—that "the sacraments as administered by Dissenters are blasphemous follies and dangerous deceptions," and that "the phrase 'Protestant faith' indicates a ridiculous impossibility." These things are taught by hundreds of Anglican Churchmen in these days. But the right hon. Gentleman does not care what is to become of the conscience of the poor Methodist or Dissenter in that case. He may tell me that he has the protection of the Conscience Clause. The Conscience Clause is not worth the paper on which it is written, and the right hon. Gentleman knows this as well as I do. [Mr. W. E. Forster: No, no!] Well, but the right hon. Gentleman has been a strenuous advocate for the Ballot. Why? For this reason, among others—that he knows there are thousands of cases in which poor and dependent men have the franchise, but dare not exercise it freely without the protection of secret voting. And I say there are thousands of cases in which a poor man would not dare to avail himself of the Conscience Clause by withdrawing his child from the religious instruction. But I may be asked, if religious instruction is not given in day-schools, how is it to be provided for the children of the poor? I ask how has it been provided hitherto? Not by State machinery; but by the noble system of Sunday schools which cover this land. There were upwards of 3,000,000 of children at the present time in our Sunday schools. I have a strong conviction that the religious instruction given in day schools is, both as respects quantity and quality, of very little value. You must take the child out of the atmosphere of the day school and place him in the atmosphere of home, or of his church or chapel or Sunday school, if you want to impress his heart religiously. But I shall be reminded of the gutter children, who have no home and no church or chapel to which they go, and I shall be asked what is to become of them. I answer again by saying that, whatever has been done for this class in past times has been done, not by State schools, but by the voluntary exertions of devoted men and women who have been moved by the impulses of Christian compassion. I remember a speech made by the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon), when the Elementary Education Act was before the House — one of the most beautiful speeches I have heard in this House—in which he adverted to this subject, and said—

"The teachers for the poor free schools were not obtained by money. They had in London 30,000 children in the free taggart schools; and 16,000 in the evening schools. There were 400 paid teachers, and, in addition—a noble army—3,300 unpaid teachers. What were the ties created in these schools? The unpaid teachers comprised in their ranks young men and women from shops, ladies, lawyers, doctors, tradesmen, and merchants—men also from that more gorgeous gilded chamber across their own lobby, and others in various positions in life, who worked together year after year in that gallant host. What he mentioned of the metropolis was only an example of what they all knew was going on in the other large populations of the land."—[3 Hansard, ccii. 838.]

I observe with regret the disposition there exists to lean upon State mechanism instead of this living power. Sir, three of our most distinguished statesmen—the Marquess of Salisbury, the Prime Minister, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli)—have recently alluded to the dangers which they think assed our common faith from the encroachments of a subtle philosophical infidelity which menaces the very foundations not only of Christianity, but of all religious beliefs, which ought to induce all parties to close their ranks in order to present a close and united front to a common foe. It is a remarkable, and, I must say, to me, a gratifying fact, to find such men occupying themselves with such thoughts. I do not much share their apprehensions, for I can remember instances before in the past history of Christianity in which so-called philosophers had put forth very loud pretensions as if they were going to extinguish all religious faith. It was so at the beginning of the last century, when Bishop Butler stated in the preface to his "Analogy" that it had come to be taken for granted by many persons that Christianity is not so much as a subject of inquiry, but that it is now at length discovered to be fictitious. But I must say that if Christianity is to hold its own, it will not be by becoming a Department of State, not by being taken under the patronage of the Committee of Council. If the time should come when the Christianity of our country should hang its arms in faithless and impotent despondency in presence of those evils of society with which it is its duty to cope; if it shrinks from providing religious instruction for the ignorant children growing up in our midst, and throws the responsibility on the State, then, indeed, we shall be in an evil case. But I do not believe anything of the kind. If the Government were to say—"We can't give religious instruction; it is not within our province or competency to do so, we will give the children of the people what we can give, without trespassing on any man's rights or violating any man's conscience, the elements of a wholesome and useful secular education, and we throw upon the Churches that represent the Christianity of our land—the duty and responsibility of teaching religion"—if this were done, I believe that the Churches would rise to the occasion, that they would go forth in hallowed emulation to do the work given them to do, and take care that we should have not only an instructed, but a religious and Christian population.

Sir MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, that he desired to remove the debate from the atmosphere of religious polemics, in which it had become involved, and to direct attention to the drier subject of the proposals actually contained in the Bill of the Government. Not much more than a year ago a Resolution, supported by Her Majesty's Government was agreed to by a large majority, to the effect that—

"The time which has elapsed since the passing of the Elementary Education Act of 1870, and the progress which has been made in the arrangements under it, are not such as to enable this House to enter with advantage upon a review of its provisions."—[3 Hansard, ccix. 1438.]

It was with much surprise, therefore, that hardly a year after the passing of that Resolution, he heard the Vice President of the Council state it was his intention to introduce a Bill for the amendment of the Act. It was with greater surprise that he some weeks ago, heard the right hon. Gentleman, in explaining the provisions of the Bill, recommend for adoption proposals which could not possibly satisfy the only persons who pressed for an alteration of the law. But it was with still greater astonishment that he heard the right hon. Gentleman that evening announce his intention to withdraw from the Bill that one proposal which commanded more assent than anything else contained in the measure. There was no doubt that Boards of Guardians had the best means of ascertaining the condition of those parents who applied for relief, whether that relief was required in order to feed their children, or in order to educate them. But he must say that, on the whole, the objections to the removal of the payment of the school fees from the school boards to the Boards of Guardians preponderated; for it was most dangerous to extend the power of Guardians to grant relief from the rates to persons who, though receiving relief, were not legally paupers. He could quite understand that the right hon. Gentleman, wearied of religious disputes, was ready enough to hand them over to the President of the Local Government Board, who being a secularist in education, would look on these disputes with passive equanimity. The law sanctioned the principle that a parent was bound to provide sufficient food for his child, and therefore where he did not possess the means himself it gave him the means. Now, in certain parts of the country the by-laws of the school boards laid down the principle that persons should provide education for their children, precisely in the same way that the law said parents should provide food for them. Those persons, therefore, who required public assistance in order to perform either of these duties should be treated alike, as paupers; but the right hon. Gentleman had not the courage to propose this; and, therefore, he was glad that the proposals with reference to non-pauper children were to be withdrawn from the Bill. The main proposals that still remained were to make secret voting the system for the election of school boards throughout the country, and to make Denison's Act compulsory. Now, as to the first, he failed to see why the ballot should be adopted in the election of school boards in those parishes which were not in the metropolis, or in boroughs, and where it would operate as an unique mode of election for local purposes. The ballot had been agreed to in the case of Parliamentary and Municipal elections chiefly with the view to put an end to corruption and intimidation; but no charge of corruption or intimidation had, so far as he was aware, been made against the election of any school board; and, as to rioting, the only instance in which it had occurred was, he believed, at Lambeth, where, unfortunately, the election was taken by ballot. He hoped, therefore, to hear from the Government some defence of their proposal on that head, and if the House assented to it, that its operation would be limited to the same period as the ballot in the case of municipal and Parliamentary elections, so that the whole of this unfortunate system of secret voting might expire at the same time. As to the proposal to make Denison's Act compulsory, the right hon. Gentleman said that the Guardians had not petitioned against it. He had himself, however, presented Petitions from many Boards of Guardians in his own county, and in more than one of those Petitions he found it stated that the Petitioners learnt with regret that the measure would impose a new charge on the poor rate for the education of outdoor pauper children, and they reviewed with alarm the increase of out-door relief which the measure would necessitate. So far the Boards of Guardians were not in favour of making Denison's Act compulsory, and he did not wonder at it, for now that the matter was left to their own discretion they did not adopt it in half the cases throughout the country. Indeed, the total payment of fees for the children of out-door paupers under that Act was, as the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Torrens) had stated, almost infinitesimal. It was quite easy to understand why the Guardians objected to make the Act compulsory. It would, in the first place, take away the discretion which they possessed under the present law, and it would, in the second place, introduce the principle of compulsory education into parts of the country where it was at present unknown, and throw a burden for the education of children upon the rates without the consent of the local authorities in places which, owing to voluntary action, had hitherto been entirely free from any such charge. He hoped, therefore, the House would not be led away by philanthropy from giving due consideration to the important alterations now proposed. He wished, he might add, to ask hon. Members to look upon the question not so much from an educational as from a Poor Law point of view. For his own part, he hardly thought it possible to make any more objectionable change in the administration of the Poor Law than would be effected by the passing of such a clause as one of those contained in the Bill. One section of Denison's Act distinctly provided that it should not be made a condition of out-door relief that a child should be sent to school; but the right hon. Gentleman proposed to repeal that part of the Act, and thus to place our Poor Law system upon a totally wrong basis. What was the reason for a grant of relief to a pauper? Destitution. No man had a claim to relief unless he was destitute. Whether he should receive in-door or out-door relief did not depend upon whether a child was at school, but upon the condition of the family as to sickness, ability to work, and other similar points which had been very carefully defined by the Poor Law Board. The giving of relief might as well depend on the ability of a child to write a copy of Greek verses, or pass a Civil service examination as upon his going to school. The simple question was, the wants of the applicant. The right hon. Gentleman cited the following passage from the Report of the Duke of Newcastle's Commission on Education:—

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

"37. That in the case of out-door paupers, the Guardians be obliged to make the education of the child a condition of the out-door relief of the parents, and to pay the necessary school fees out of the rates."

But he had hardly noticed the important fact, that a Committee of that House, approaching the question from the Poor Law side, had arrived at an exactly opposite conclusion; though that Committee was certainly one of the ablest which had ever considered the question of Poor Law Relief. It sat for three or four years. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. O. P. Villiers) was its Chairman, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouvierie), as well as the Marquess of Salisbury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, were Members of it. They pointed out in their Report that all the witnesses concurred in the opinion that to make the provisions of Denison's Act compulsory would be impracticable, and that such a proposal would be contrary to the principles on which the Poor Law was based. The conclusion arrived at by such a Committee would carry greater weight than any arguments he could urge. He wished, however, to direct attention to the terms of the prohibitory Order of the Poor Law Board, which was enforced throughout the greater part of the country, and which specified the conditions upon which alone out-door relief could be granted. Among these conditions were sudden and urgent necessity, sickness or infirmity of the applicant or some member of his family, and the burial of the pauper or one of his family. In such cases it would be impossible to make the grant of out-door relief dependent on whether the children were sent to school or not. But in those cases in which it might be possible, if Parliament made the grant of out-door relief dependent on that fact it would be imposing compulsory education on the poorest class of the community, under a penalty far more severe than it would dare to inflict on any class above them. On this account alone he should feel bound to vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Torrens.) Again, in reference to the expense of the ratepayers, not only would the school fees have to be paid, but in many instances parents would require additional relief in place of the wages which their children might have earned had they not been in compulsory attendance at school. Therefore, we had no real test of the amount of the pecuniary burden the right hon. Gentleman proposed to cast upon the ratepayers. But what was the object of passing the Bill now before the House? Did anyone want it? If, as the right hon. Gentleman stated, certain departmental matters required legislation, he ought to have brought forward a departmental Bill, which might have been carried without opposition; but the right hon. Gentleman wished to go beyond that, and alleged that if the present Bill was not passed school boards would drop throughout the country. Well, school boards might be a necessity in the metropolis, and in some of our largest towns; but, in other places, he did not know whether that would be a very great evil after all. He was unable to perceive, however, how such a consequence could ensue. Again, the right hon. Gentleman said the measure was required in order to increase the regularity of attendances; but he himself admitted that even in the absence of such a measure the attendances had increased from 1,000,000 to 1,500,000 since the introduction of the Act of 1870. It was said out-of-doors that hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House ought not to oppose the Bill because the Members for Birmingham and Merthyr disapproved it. Now, nobody could be more opposed than he was to the views of the Birmingham Education League; but there were principles so objectionable that both the hon. Gentlemen opposite and himself might unite in opposing them for totally different reasons. For his own part, he did not want to see a new and utterly wrong basis established for the administration of the Poor Law, nor did he wish to see a fresh burden added to that which Parliament had, in his judgment, unfairly imposed on the ratepayers of the kingdom.

MR. DIXON said, that when he listened to the speech of his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council on introducing this measure he had some difficulty in deciding whether he objected more to the Bill for what it proposed to enact or for what it left entirely untouched. The House had a right to expect that in a Bill which had been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, and looked forward to with so much anxiety by the Educational Reformers of the country, some provision would have been made for the universal compulsory attendance of the children in England and Wales. He would remind the House of the position in which they stood with reference to what, in his belief, was the most important of all the questions bearing on the education of the country. When the Bill of 1870 was introduced, the Vice President of the Council said that to leave the question of compulsion alone was to leave the children untaught, and to force the taxpayers and ratepayers to pay for useless schools. That remark was a wise one at the time, and it had been justified by subsequent experience. On the second reading of that Bill the Prime Minister told the House that it was not without an effort that he accepted the principle of compulsion. The right hon. Gentleman regretted the necessity for it, but he said—"We have arrived deliberately at the conclusion that it must be entertained, and in a manner that shall render it effectual." After two years' experience of the working of permissive compulsion the Vice President of the Council again told the House that he thought compulsion had worked well in England and Wales; but speaking for himself as the Minister responsible for education he said that, although he could not introduce such a measure in the previous year, he thought we should be ready for a general compulsory measure this year. He was aware he was styled a theorist; but the Ministers of the Crown were not mere theorists when they used such language as this on important occasions in the House of Commons. This language was based on the Reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, who had for many years been urging on the Government the absolute necessity of general compulsion. For example, in the Report for 1871, the Inspector, speaking of Oxfordshire and Buckinghamshire, said—

"The unsatisfactory condition of the schools was caused by the irregular attendance of the children. On this subject every one, I expect, is agreed as far as this—that until the children are induced or compelled to attend school regularly, a satisfactory progress is impossible."

Mr. Blandford and Mr. Bowstead, speaking respectively of Derbyshire and Gloucestershire, expressed similar opinions in favour of universal compulsion. These were the official statements upon which the opinions of the Government were formed in the Session before last. The House had since had experience of the working of the compulsory system in our large towns. The Vice President of the Council told the House in bringing in the Education Estimate that compulsion had been wisely introduced, carefully carried out, and was eminently successful. In Birmingham in one year the system of compulsion had increased the average attendance by 50 per cent—namely, from 16,000 to 24,000, and he was told that at the present moment the increase in the average attendance reached 75 per cent. There had been no school fees paid by the Birmingham School Board. Officers had been appointed to go round to the houses of the parents whose children did not attend school. They had paid 19,000 visits, and had issued 1,538 notices for non-attendance. It had, however, only been necessary to issue 157 summonses, and 132 parents had been fined sums varying from 1*s.* to 5*s.* Not more than 13 warrants had been issued, and only four of those defaulting parents had been sent to prison for short terms. That must be admitted to be a satisfactory proof of the working of the compulsory system under many disadvantages, including a great deficiency of school accommodation. The cost of this system did not amount to a third of a penny in the pound; and if it were found working so satisfactorily in English towns, and if it were about to be introduced into Scotland, was Parliament to allow another year to elapse without applying it to the country districts? In the large towns compulsion was the rule; in the rural districts it was scarcely to be seen. In the Duchy of Nassau he found that every child was taught in every town and village, and yet such a system was said to be impossible for England. Why was this? It was not that the country gentlemen really objected to education, but they disapproved the machinery by which compulsion was to be enforced? In the towns of England and Scotland it was thought impossible to carry it out except by school boards; but in the agricultural districts it was assumed that they would be expensive, and any addition to the rates was to be resisted. But was there any reason to believe that the cost would exceed the third of a penny in the pound? The cost of making the Denison Act compulsory would amount fully to this sum, yet the Birmingham League in vain proposed to make school boards universal, although the cost would not be greater than that of making the Denison Act compulsory. Suppose that the payment of school fees followed upon the appointment of a school board. A great deal had been said about the extent to which the payment of school fees had been carried in Manchester, yet even there not more than one-third of a penny in the pound had thus been expended. Another reason why these school boards had been objected to was that a very large and important body were afraid that the schools would become secularized if school boards were once established. The great body of Wesleyans had come to the conclusion that the right course would be—first, that school boards should exist everywhere, and next, that in every school board area there should be at least one undenominational school. If the country were willing to adopt that plan, he, too, was ready to accept it. As the League had been more than once referred to, he might be permitted to say that the object of that body was this—the establishment of school boards throughout the country with compulsory attendance of the children, and the boards to undertake the management and superintendence and payment for the secular education, both in their own and in the denominational schools. The result would be that the various denominations would be saved the entire cost of the secular instruction, and would be able to devote their time and their money exclusively to the religious education of the children. The managers of the denominational schools would continue religious teaching as hitherto, and there would be no restriction as to its nature and amount. It could not be said by hon. Gentlemen opposite that the children would not attend the religious instruction; because they had over and over again asserted that the parents of poor children were religious and desired religious teaching for their children. That plan had been already tried. He learnt from a letter he had received from a distinguished clergyman of the Church of England who was no member of the League, that he had adopted that system and with the best results; and, further, that he had many inquiries from other clergymen who were anxious to follow his example. He need not refer to the portion of the Bill which the Government had abandoned, and to which he was from the outset strongly opposed; but with respect to the proposal to make Denison's Act compulsory he could not assent to it, because it would place the education of the children of the poor in the hands of those who disclaimed and protested against the trust. They should have school boards everywhere, composed of men elected specially to superintend the education of the district; and with areas sufficiently large to command the best men, who should carry out education in the way that they thought best, and regardless even, he would say, of expenses. The boards so constituted should be enabled to feel that they had the rates and the Government grant to fall back upon, so that they might be enabled to carry on a proper system of instruction.

The people ought to be able to feel that the schools belonged to themselves; that they were paid for out of the taxes, and were managed by the people's representatives; and then there would be a national system of education which would effect fully and completely the object which they had in view. He could not but apprehend that if that proposition of the Government were agreed to by the House, the principle would hereafter be extended, and that which the Government had given up now would hereafter be pressed upon the Legislature; so that in the long run they might see the education of all the children of the rural districts placed in the hands of those who had confessed their own incompetency, and who said they did not desire to have the duty imposed upon them. Under these circumstances, he had to ask himself how he should act. He could not oppose a measure introduced for the purpose of educating a large number of now neglected children. He would simply walk out of the House in order that he might not have the responsibility of placing the education of the children of the rural districts upon a wrong basis. Men had said to him—"Are you going by your vote to prevent poor children being educated? If this measure is not passed it may be years before anything better is proposed. Do you not know that the present Administration is coming to an end, and that their successors will not carry on the work in a better spirit?" Having regard to the course which the Government had taken on this question, he thought it was his duty to advise the Liberal Members in the House to separate themselves from that course. He hoped, however, that the Government would next year fulfil the promise which they had made on this subject.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, I should not have risen at this moment but that I think it necessary to bring back the House to the consideration of the subject of this Bill. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) has, I believe, addressed himself to every subject that is not in the Bill and has carefully avoided touching upon anything that is really in the Bill. The same observation, I think will apply to the speech of the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard). This does not seem to me a fitting opportunity for discussing the question of secular education, inasmuch as the word is nowhere mentioned in the Bill. Reference has been made to some remarks which I made in connection with the University Education (Ireland) Bill, and I shall be prepared at any time to defend what I said on that occasion, but it is wholly inapplicable to the Bill now before the House. The measure, as explained by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council of Education, certainly appears a far more complicated one than it really is. When I look at the Bill in that light it seems to have been exaggerated in a remarkable degree by almost every speaker who has addressed the House this evening. So far from this being a great Bill I consider it as one of the smallest on education that has ever been brought before the House. The simple question to be discussed was whether the Poor Law Guardians, instead of the school boards, should have the power of paying the school fees for the education of the poor children whose parents were too poor to pay them themselves. I am not surprised that my hon. Friend the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) who takes such an interest in the question of local taxation, should be led somewhat astray in his impressions as to the precise meaning of this Bill by the exaggerated views which have been expressed regarding the object or intention of the 3rd clause. Why, at this moment everything that was done compulsorily by the school board can be done potentially by the Guardians. And as to the number of children who were kept away from any school, I am far from supposing that they are as many as some hon. Members supposed. My belief is that the number is not one-fourth of that quoted by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. E. Forster). It is absurd to suppose, for example, that in the case of a poor man who accidentally broke his leg, that the Guardians would be justified in refusing to give him any relief until he had sent his children to school. Accidental cases of destitution, therefore, such as that, cannot fairly be included in the statistics of pauperism. Now, I believe that the far greater number of the children of the poor have been already collected, and go to school. Although a certain number of persons are chargeable to the poor rate, it does not follow that their children do not go to school. Everyone admits that there are many children requiring education who are not sent to any school, and we all desire that they should be sent to school. Why, then should you object to the Guardians sending those children to school without certain conditions which are sometimes impossible to carry out? Why do you seek to check the efforts of the Guardians in this direction by requiring them to make the relief to the parents depend upon the sending of their children to school? I will leave the right hon. Gentleman opposite to settle his quarrels with his Friends below the gangway. The right hon. Gentleman must, however, feel thankful to them for not voting against him. The hon. Member for Birmingham is willing to defer his quarrel with the Government until next year. This delay I have no doubt will, upon some points, be acceptable to the Government. There are many hon. Members who wish to repeal the 25th clause. I am not one of those. Compulsory education may act well in some such cases as those to which the hon. Member for Birmingham adverted; but, as regards the country at large, I think it must be introduced with some caution. The hon. Member has referred to certain statistics, but the figures are very deceptive, and I find that the increase in the number of children attending schools in consequence of compulsion has been chiefly in infants. But it is not infants that we wish to compel to attend school; it is the waifs and strays of society that we wish to see there. Then, again, on looking closely into the figures relied upon by the hon. Member, we find that the fluctuations in the attendances are perfectly enormous; the ebb is as great as the flow. In this country a great part of our education is obtained in the school of life, and it is an absurdity to suppose that the only education that a child requires is a knowledge of reading, writing and arithmetic. Children require to be taught how to earn their livings and to contribute to the support of their families, and there is more moral good derived from a child earning 5s., and taking it to his distressed mother, than in all the reading, writing, and arithmetic that you can teach him. The moral teaching of that education will bring greater honour, advantage, and credit to the country than the teaching of which you make so much. Upon a question of this kind, being all anxious to promote education, and to carry out the Bill which is already in existence, hon. Members on that side of the House will not, because they think one clause must require some check or amendment in Committee, vote for the Previous Question and prevent the Bill going into Committee, but will allow the Bill to go into Committee and endeavour to remedy its defects.

Mr. FAWCETT said, he so entirely agreed with the argument of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) in favour of general compulsion that he should not waste time by referring to that part of the subject, except by-and-by to offer a suggestion which he thought would help on that system of general compulsion which the hon. Member and so many of his Friends appeared to have so much at heart. He had been one of the earliest Members of the Birmingham League; but many arguments had been put forward recently by that body with which he did not agree. He was the more anxious to express the differences of opinion between himself and the members of the League because he believed that during the ensuing winter months, a sectarian agitation would be got up which would subject many hon. Members to pledges which, if fulfilled, would prove most mischievous to the cause of education. He had not been in favour of the Bill of the Government as originally introduced, and he had been perfectly prepared to vote, as he had done before, for the repeal of the 25th clause; but he objected to the Bill of the Government as originally introduced for reasons very different from those which had been put forward by the hon. Member for Birmingham. What had been the cause of the Government being placed in their not very dignified position? Having the problem before them, how to deal with the 25th clause, they had proposed a solution of it so unsatisfactory to the country that they were obliged to abandon it before their Bill came on for the second reading. The cause of the difficulty in which the Government were placed was an old story. They had not the courage of their opinions, and they were afraid to call a spade a spade. Why did their proposition meet with no support? Because they adopted an unfortunate middle course. They wished to adopt a system of parochial relief in the matter of education, and yet they wished to introduce words into their Bill to say that the parochial relief it was intended to give was not parochial relief. Was ever a more absurd course adopted than to say that the Poor Law Guardians should defray the cost of the children's education, and yet that the parents should not be supposed to be receiving parochial relief, but some gratuity in the shape of a bounty or reward? If the strict system under which the Poor Law was administered were once to be relaxed the country would be deluged with pauperism. If payment for the education of a man's children was not to be regarded as parochial relief, why should the payment for necessaries supplied to his sick wife or children be regarded as being parochial relief? The right hon. Gentleman was aware that there was not a single logical argument in favour of calling payment for the education of a man's children by any other name than parochial relief, and the country would soon come to the conclusion that what was in fact poor relief should be designated by that term. There was not a member of the London School Board who would not say that the Guardians were the better judges of the circumstances of the parents than the school boards. The work of the latter was educational, and not to inquire into the circumstances of every parent who applied for assistance. Therefore, had the right hon. Gentleman—acted logically, and in transferring the payment of the school fee from the school board to the Poor Law Guardians—declared that such payments should be regarded as poor relief, many of those who were now silent would have come forward and supported his Bill. He did not sympathize with the reasons of the League for the repeal of the 25th clause. When the League was first constituted he had thought that if religious education were to be dealt with at all there was only one logical course to pursue—that of adopting pure secular education, and he had opposed that wretched compromise of the Bible, without note or comment, as not likely to conciliate religious people, and as certain to alienate the secularists. He, however, had been out-voted, and he felt sorry for the position which had been assumed was an illogical one. He was in favour of absolute secular education, and of perfect religious equality; but he could not help feeling that we did not start altogether de novo in this matter. The country would never consent to the enormous property devoted to education in voluntary denominational schools being thrown away; and, indeed, the Nonconformists and others who, like himself, were abstractedly in favour of secular education, were partly responsible for many of these voluntary denominational schools. He was at a loss to understand how anyone could refuse the application to rates for denominational education when he sanctioned it in Parliamentary grants. As a matter of common sense, what difference did it make in principle whether a house tax went in support of denominational schools or whether a house rate went to support them? How could anyone say, when the tax collector got £5 from him for inhabited house duty, and a portion of it went to support denominational schools, that his conscience was not injured, while if he paid £5 in rates, and a few pence went out of it in the same direction, his conscience was grievously offended? He knew there were some people who said that this was introducing a new religious inequality; but even those who brought forward strong conscientious objections to any portion of the rates going in support of denominational schools were not consistent. The Prime Minister the other night, in a masterly and convincing speech, proved clearly that if people were exempted from rates for a particular kind of property, rates were thereby compulsorily imposed upon other people. Who, then, being the strong advocates of the exemption of Sunday schools and ragged schools and chapels from rating, could fairly say that their consciences were offended by a small portion of the rates going in support of denominational schools? He spent a portion of each year in the town of Cambridge, and when there he lived in a parish where lately a great deal of valuable property which contributed largely to the rates was pulled down, and in its place was erected a very handsome chapel, the foundation stone of which was laid by the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley). What was the result? If that chapel did not pay rates, his (Mr. Fawcett's) rates would be increased. He himself was only a moderate churchman; but he objected to being compulsorily obliged to subscribe to a chapel. If those were his feelings, what must be the feelings of a more ardent Churchman? What must be the feelings of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) for instance, if he found himself subscribing against his will to many a Catholic chapel? Those who raised a conscientious objection to any small modicum of rates going to support denominational education should be consistent; and if they were, he would give them the opportunity by moving on the Report of the Rating (Liability and Value) Bill, that the exemption of chapels, churches, and schools from rates should be abolished. But if he did so, what support should he get? Why, everyone knew that he would get no support at all? There were three unanswerable arguments against forcing children into a board school when there was a voluntary elementary denominational school to which they preferred going, and which was nearer to their homes. So far as his own opinion was concerned, he would infinitely sooner see them go to a board school; but, first of all, there was the convenience of the child to be considered. How could anyone pretend to say, when there was a denominational school to which the parents wished the child to go within a stone's-throw of its house, that that poor unfortunate child, perhaps half-clad and poorly fed, should be forced to go through all weathers, and in the snow and dirt, to a board school two or three miles distant in order to carry out the conscientious scruples of the ratepayers? Then there was the economical argument. Of course, if all these children were driven into board schools the accommodation of the board schools would have to be increased, and that would add to the cost, and make the ratepayers object. Thirdly, there was this powerful argument—that whether the consciences of the parents ought or ought not to be consulted, the matter should be looked upon from an educational point of view. It would be a hard enough matter to carry out general compulsion in this country under any circumstances, and the experience of every other country proved that if the unwilling parent were armed with this plausible argument against compulsion, that it forced his child into a school against which he entertained conscientious objections, no power on earth could carry the compulsory provisions out. It might be asked, what course did he intend to pursue in reference to the present Bill? He could not follow the example of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) for if a Bill was a bad one he thought it ought to be opposed, regardless of what the public outside might say, and if it was a good one it should be supported, independent of any consequences which might happen to the individual Member who supported it. He had listened with great attention to the able speech of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Torrens) but he had not been convinced by it, and therefore he should vote in favour of the second reading of the Bill. He did not pretend to say that it was a complete measure; but he did not think the arguments which had been urged against it were sufficient to counteract the advantages which the Bill, small as it was, undoubtedly offered. No one who listened to the hon. Member for Finsbury, and the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) could doubt what was at the bottom of their opposition. They were both as anxious as himself to see these pauper children educated, but they said—"Don't let it be done by the rates; let it be done out of the Imperial funds." This was the old story; he had exposed its fallacy over and over again. It was said that the education of these pauper children by means of the rates would have a tendency to increase out-door relief; but what would be the effect of obtaining the money from that inexhaustible mine of wealth, the Consolidated Fund, and having it administered by men who were not directly interested in economy? Differing in toto from the hon. Member for Finsbury, he believed this Bill would discourage out-door relief. The lavishness with which it was administered was responsible for no small portion of our pauperism, and therefore he welcomed anything which would indirectly bring into existence an influence to diminish it. It was notorious that there were people receiving out-door relief who ought to be in the union. Why did they receive out-door relief? Because it was said their children went to work, and therefore out-door relief was cheaper, since the children supplied them with a portion of what would otherwise come out of the rates. If that inducement were removed the granting of outdoor relief would be discouraged in a very important way. The hon. Member for Finsbury had spoken throughout as if this Bill was going to introduce compulsion for the first time in London; but, as a matter of fact, compulsion already existed there. Under the present law every pauper child ought to be at school; and therefore all that the Bill would do would be to give two securities instead of one in favour of carrying out compulsory education. In other districts where compulsion had not been introduced he admitted that this Bill would introduce the thin end of the wedge; and, that being so, as he was in favour of compulsory education, the objection of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon furnished him with an additional reason for voting in favour of the Bill. In conclusion he wished to make one suggestion to the Birmingham League. They were about starting an agitation, and he felt convinced that that agitation would involve them in a miserable sectarian squabble, which would not promote the intellectual development or assist the mental culture of a single adult or a single child. If they would, instead, unite their force in favour of the League's first object, general compulsion, and spend the winter months in advocating it instead of promoting sectarian wrangles, next year there might be a strong feeling out of doors which would enable Parliament to introduce compulsion with much greater success than it could if the League continued doing what they had done during the last 12 months. He knew these opinions would involve him in a considerable amount of unpopularity; but he started political life caring more about general compulsory education than he did about anything else. He had seen no reason to change his opinions, and he should be pursuing an unworthy course of conduct if he remained silent when he heard a course advocated which would lose the great question of the general education of the people in the mists of sectarian squabbles.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the course which the debate had taken had saved him from the necessity of making more than a few remarks, for the arguments against the proposition of the Government had been so ably answered, especially by his hon. Friend who had just sat down, in a speech which, even from him, showed almost more power than any other speech of his he had ever heard, that it was scarcely necessary now to make that answer which was generally expected from the Minister who was responsible for the proposals submitted to the House. There was, however, one remark made by his hon. Friend from which he confessed he did to some extent differ, and it would be hardly candid if he did not at once acknowledge the difference, and that was the remark applied to the Bill as it was originally brought forward, and to leaving Clauses 17 and 25 in the Act. His hon. Friend strongly opposed any remission of fees or payment of fees out of the rates not being considered parochial relief. He granted that there was a strong argument in favour of that view of the question, but he wished to put the House in possession of what could be said on the other side. Take the case of a poor widow who had, by a hard and bitter struggle, kept herself from receiving out-door relief. Because they imposed on her the duty of having her child educated and helped her to do it, to say that she had become a pauper, notwithstanding all her sacrifices—and once a pauper always a pauper—would be very hard indeed. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon), though he had made a remarkably fair speech, had attacked the Government somewhat severely for an omission on their part. The hon. Member regretted the absence of a general compulsory measure. He could only say, being as anxious for the adoption of that principle as his hon. Friend, that he earnestly hoped his hon. Friend would take home the advice of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett). He was sure the more his hon. Friend thought over the subject, the more he would see that before he could get carried out such a proposal for general compulsion as he advocated—be it right or wrong—he would have to wait years, he might, perhaps, almost say generations. His hon. Friend's proposal was that the present voluntary school managers should hand over the management of the largest portion of their education to the school boards. He would not now give the reason why he should be opposed on principle to that; but his hon. Friend must feel, as he did, that the enormous majority of the voluntary school managers would not assent to it. He was not surprised at the remarks of the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard), although they hardly applied to the question before the House, but rather to the Act of 1870. He would not detain the House except with the most cursory reference to that hon. Member's observations upon himself. But he had rather complain of the statement that his previous course had given that hon. Gentleman and his friends a right to suppose that his educational policy would have been different from what it was. The hon. Member for Merthyr was mistaken about that; for there was nothing that he had ever said, either in or out of the House, which was inconsistent with what he had done in 1870 or this year. The hon. Gentleman said that the Act of 1870 gave a large grant to denominational schools. But the fact was the grant was to all schools, whether denominational or not, and it was equal to all. Further, it was a grant simply to supply that aid which the original Bill contemplated should be given out of the rates, and which it was thought better to drop. The hon. Member said a large extension of time was given for the building grants. That was a mistake. The Bill as first brought in made no cessation of the building grants; but, as it passed, it provided for their stopping at a certain time. The hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Heygate) while kindly promising his support to the present Bill, brought forward a case in which he thought the Act as administered by the Department had been unjust. He could not then enter into the details of that case; but he would observe that they could not call local bodies into existence without giving them power, and on that ground the Department thought they ought to have the strongest possible grounds before they interfered with a school board that had been elected. He would suggest to the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt) that he should give the Bill another chance and not vote against it that night, but wait a week or so, until he had consulted with his constituents. The hon. Member said that an attendance of one-tenth or one-twelfth of the population was as large as they could fairly expect; but in a town not far from Stafford he believed they had already succeeded in securing a much better attendance than that. The hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens) complained that the Bill provided that children should be clothed as well as taught. ["No, no!"] At least, that appeared to be the purport of the hon. Gentleman's argument. There was, in fact, no such proposition in the Bill. The children would be taught but not clothed and fed. The hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) thought the Bill would entail an expenditure of £500,000; but if the whole of those 200,000 children were taken into the schools, the 2*½*d. per week per child would only amount to about £80,000. But the further relief to be given if necessary would not be required for all that number of children. Many of them were receiving education at this moment by voluntary help, and many also by the action of the different school boards. The hon. Baronet also said neither the prison rate nor the pauper rate had been diminished by the operation of the Act. The children had not yet had time to become either paupers or criminals; and he hoped the Act and this Bill would prevent their ever becoming so. His hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) informed him that in that town Denison's Act was very effectually carried out, and was practically compulsory. The result was, that while the Poor Law Expenditure of Liverpool fluctuated from £150,000 to £180,000, the cost of working Denison's Act was between £500 and £600, which was partly if not more than compensated by the fact that drunken idle parents were deterred from going on the rates on the terms of withdrawing their children from begging, stealing, and working in order to send them to school. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy) was correct in describing the present Bill as a small one. He (Mr. Forster) should have been very glad if it could have been made larger; but, at the same time, he believed it to be a practical step in the direction of improved education, and he therefore hoped the House would accept it.

MR. CRAUFURD rose to address the House amid continued cries of "Divide, Divide," which rendered his speech inaudible.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 343; Noes 72: Majority 271.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed; considered in Committee, and reported; to be printed, as amended [Bill 245]; re-committed for Monday next.

AYES.

Acland, Sir T. D.	Cardwell, rt. hon. E.	Finnis, W.	Jackson, R. W.
Adderley, rt. hon. Sir C.	Carter, R. M.	FitzGerald, right hon.	James, H.
Agnew, R. V.	Cartwright, F.	Lord O. A.	Jardine, R.
Akroyd, E.	Cartwright, W. C.	Fitzmaurice, Lord E.	Jenkinson, Sir G. S.
Amcotts, Colonel W. C.	Cave, T.	Fitzwilliam, hon. C.	Jessel, Sir G.
Amphlett, R. P.	Cavendish, Lord F. C.	W. W.	Johnston, A.
Anderson, G.	Cavendish, Lord G.	Foljambe, F. J. S.	Johnstone, Sir H.
Annesley, hon. Col. H.	Cawley, C. E.	Fordyce, W. D.	Kavanagh, A. MacM.
Anstruther, Sir R.	Charley, W. T.	Forrester, rt. hon. Gen.	Kennaway, Sir J. H.
Antrobus, Sir E.	Childerh, rt. hon. H.	Forster, C.	Kensington, Lord
Arbuthnot, Major G.	Cholmley, Sir M.	Forster, rt. hon. W. E.	King, hon. P. J. L.
Armitstead, G.	Clive, Col. hon. G. W.	Foster, W. H.	Kingscote, Colonel
Ayrton, rt. hon. A. S.	Clowes, S. W.	Fortescue, rt. hon. C. P.	Kinnaird, hon. A. F.
Backhouse, E.	Cochrane, A.D.W.R.B.	Fortescue, hon. D. F.	Knatchbull-Hugessen,
Baggallay, Sir R.	Cogan, rt. hn. W. H. F.	Fowler, R. N.	rt. hon. E. H.
Baines, E.	Colebrooke, Sir T. E.	Fowler, W.	Knightley, Sir R.
Barclay, A. C.	Coleridge, Sir J. D.	Gavin, Major	Laing, S.
Barclay, J. W.	Collins, T.	Gladstone, rt. hn. W. E.	Laird, J.
Bass, A.	Corrigan, Sir D.	Gladstone, W. H.	Lambert, N. G.
Bassett, F.	Cowper, hon. H. F.	Goldney, G.	Lawrence, Sir J. C.
Bates, E.	Cowper-Temple, right	Goldsmith, Sir F.	Lawrence, W.
Bathurst, A. A.	hon. W.	Gooch, Sir D.	Lawson, Sir W.
Baxter, rt. hon. W. E.	Crawford, R. W.	Gore, W. R. O.	Lea, T.
Beaumont, Major F.	Cross, R. A.	Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.	Leeman, G.
Beaumont, H. F.	Oubitt, G.	Gourley, E. T.	Latève, G. J. S.
Beaumont, S. A.	Cunliffe, Sir R. A.	Gower, hon. E. F. L.	Leith, J. F.
Beaumont, W. B.	Dalrymple, C.	Graham, W.	Lennox, Lord H. G.
Benyon, R.	Dalway, M. R.	Gray, Colonel	Leelie, J.
Biddulph, M.	Davenport, W. B.	Gray, Sir J.	Lewis, C. E.
Bingham, Lord	Davies, R.	Greene, E.	Lindsey, hon. Col. C.
Birley, H.	Delahanty, J.	Gregory, G. B.	Lindsey, Col. R. L.
Blennerville, Sir R.	Denison, C. B.	Greville, hon. Captain	Lloyd, Sir T. D.
Bonham-Carter, J.	Dent, J. D.	Greville-Nugent, hon.	Looke, J.
Bourne, Colonel	Dick, F.	G. F.	Lowe, rt. hon. R.
Bouverie, rt. hon. E. P.	Dickinson, S. S.	Grey, rt. hon. Sir G.	Lowther, J.
Bowring, E. A.	Dickson, Major A. G.	Grey de Wilton, Visq.	Lubbock, Sir J.
Brand, H. R.	Digby, K. T.	Grieve, J. J.	Lusk, A.
Brassey, H. A.	Dodds, J.	Grosvenor, hon. N.	Lyttelton, hon. C. G.
Brassey, T.	Dowdeswell, W. E.	Grosvenor, Lord R.	Macfie, H. A.
Brewer, Dr.	Downing, M.C.	Grove, T. F.	M'Arthur, W.
Bright, J. (Manchester)	Duff, M. E. G.	Guest, A. E.	M'Claire, T.
Bright, R.	Dundas, J. C.	Guest, M. J.	M'Lagan, P.
Brinckman, Captain	Dyott, Colonel R.	Hamilton, I. T.	Magniac, C.
Brocklehurst, W. C.	Eaton, H. W.	Hamilton, J. G. C.	Mahon, Viscount
Brooks, W. C.	Edwards, H.	Hampton, R. W.	March, Earl of
Brown, A. H.	Egerton, hon. A. F.	Hardcastle, J. A.	Marking, S. S.
Browne, G. E.	Egerton, Adml. hn. F.	Hardy, rt. hon. G.	Masey, rt. hon. W. N.
Bruce, Lord C.	Elliot, G.	Hardy, J.	Matheson, A.
Bruce, rt. hon. Lord E.	Enfield, Viscount	Hardy, J. S.	Matthews, H.
Bruce, rt. hon. H. A.	Ennia, J. J.	Hartington, Marq. of	Mellor, T. W.
Burrell, Sir P.	Erskine, Admiral J. E.	Henderson, J.	Melly, G.
Bury, Viscount	Ewing, A. Orr	Henley, rt. hon. J. W.	Meyrick, T.
Butt, I.	Eykyn, R.	Henley, Lord	Milbank, F. A.
Cadogan, hon. F. W.	Fawcett, H.	Henry, M.	Miller, J.
Cameron, D.	Feilden, H. M.	Hermon, E.	Miller, W.
Campbell-Bannerman, H.	Fellowes, E.	Heygate, Sir F. W.	Milles, hon. G. W.
Candlish, J.	Figgina, J.	Heygate, W. U.	Mills, Sir C. H.
	Finch, G. H.	Hibbert, J. T.	Mitford, W. T.

O'Conor, D. M.
O'Conor Don, The
Ogilvy, Sir J.
O'Reilly-Dease, M.
Paget, R. H.
Pakington, rt. hon. Sir J.
Palmer, J. H.
Parker, C. S.
Parry, L. Jones-
Patten, rt. hon. Col. W.
Peel, A. W.
Pemberton, E. L.
Philips, B. N.
Phipps, C. P.
Pim, J.
Playfair, L.
Potter, E.
Potter, T. B.
Powell, F. S.
Power, J. T.
Price, W. E.
Rathbone, W.
Redmond, W. A.
Reed, C.
Royston, Viscount
Russell, Lord A.
Russell, Sir W.
Rylands, P.
Sackville, S. G. S.
St. Aubyn, Sir J.
Samuda, J. D'A.
Samuelson, B.
Samuelson, H. B.
Sandon, Viscount
Sartoris, E. J.
Seely, C. (Lincoln)
Seely, C. (Nottingham)
Shaw, R.
Sherlock, D.
Sherriff, A. C.
Simonds, W. B.
Sinclair, Sir J. G. T.
Smith, R.
Smith, W. H.
Staepoole, W.
Stanhope, W. T. W. S.

TELLERS.
Adam, W. P.
Glyn, hon. G. G.

NOES.

Arkwright, A. P.
Assheton, R.
Bagge, Sir W.
Barttelot, Colonel
Beach, Sir M. Hicks-
Beach, W. W. B.
Beauchamp, Earl of
Brise, Colonel R.
Buxton, Sir R. J.
Chambers, Sir T.
Craufurd, E. H. J.
Dalrymple, D.
Dawson, Col. R. P.
Dilke, Sir C. W.
Dillwyn, L. L.
Dimsdale, R.
Duncombe, hon. Col.
Dyke, W. H.
Fielden, J.
Galway, Viscount
Garnier, J. C.
Gilpin, Colonel
Goldsmid, J.
Gore, J. R. O.

Hambro, C.
Hamilton, Lord C. J.
Hamilton, Lord G.
Hamilton, Marques of
Hay, Sir J. C. D.
Hildyard, T. B. T.
Hoare, Sir H. A.
Hodgson, W. N.
Hogg, J. M.
Hood, Captain hon. A.
W. A. N.
Knight, F. W.
Lacorn, Sir E. H. K.
Langton, W. G.
Leatham, E. A.
Lennox, Lord G. G.
Lewis, H.
Liddell, hon. H. G.
Lopes, H. C.
Lowther, hon. W.
Lush, Dr.
Manners, rt. hon. Lord J.
Manners, Lord G. J.
Martin, P. W.

Miall, E.
Stanley, hon. F.
Stanfeld, rt. hon. J.
Stapleton, J.
Steere, L.
Stevenson, J. C.
Stone, W. H.
Stocks, rt. hon. Sir H. K.
Straight, D.
Strutt, hon. H.
Stuart, Colonel
Stuart, hon. H. W. V.
Sturt, H. G.
Talbot, C. B. M.
Talbot, J. G.
Taylor, P. A.
Tipping, W.
Tollemache, hon. F. J.
Torr, J.
Tracy, hon. C. B. D.
Hanbury-
Trench, hn. Maj. W. le P.
Trevelyan, G. O.
Trevor, Lord A. E. Hill.
Turner, C.
Turnor, E.
Vivian, A. P.
Vivian, H. H.
Wallace, Sir R.
Waterhouse, S.
Watney, J.
Wedderburn, Sir D.
Welby, W. E.
West, H. W.
Wheelhouse, W. S. J.
Whitbread, S.
White, J.
Whitwell, J.
Williams, W.
Wingfield, Sir C.
Woods, H.
Yarmouth, Earl of Young, rt. hon. G.

TELLERS.

Scalder-Booth, G.
Scott, Lord H. J. M. D.
Scourfield, J. H.

Lopes, Sir M.

Torrens, W. T. M'C.

JURIES BILL. [BILL 35.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General.)
COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS protested against going on with the Bill at a quarter to 1 o'clock in the morning, and he moved that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Cross.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that substantially the Bill was unopposed. There was only one clause opposed, and he would leave that one out.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that at the present period of the year, the effect of such a Motion would be to lengthen the Session.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, that there were four pages of Amendments.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the Amendments really were practically arranged.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS refused to withdraw in consequence of the extremely late sitting. On Monday the House sat till 4 o'clock, on Tuesday till 2, and they were to meet at 2 this day, it being now a quarter to 1 o'clock.

Question put.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 78; Noes 126: Majority 48.

MR. F. S. POWELL moved that the Chairman do now leave the Chair.

MR. J. LOWTHER wished to remind the Prime Minister who had warned the Committee that to agree to this Motion would lengthen the Session, that he had undertaken to find a day for a measure which could not possibly pass this Session, and which would therefore convert the House into a debating club.

MR. GLADSTONE had never said that he proposed to lengthen the Session by discussing a Bill that could not possibly pass. It was a harsh and unfair thing on the part of a small minority to press such a Motion; but as he did not wish to see a repetition of the divisions and late sittings of the last week, he would leave the hon. Gentleman to enjoy his victory.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE protested against the tone and manner of the right hon. Gentleman, and declared that it would be an act of tyranny on the part of the majority to attempt to force this Bill through Committee at such an hour. The Opposition had been sitting there during a long and arduous evening to protect the Government against its unruly and terrible children below the gangway, and at 1 o'clock in the morning they ought not to be subject to such comments.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

LICENSING LAW AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND)
BILL.

Considered in Committee.

In the Committee.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Licensing Laws of Scotland.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir ROBERT ANSTRUTHER, Sir GRAHAM MONTGOMERY, Sir DAVID WEDDERBURN, Mr. CHARLES DALBYMPLE, and Mr. FORDYCE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 247.]

REPRESENTATIVE COUNCILS IN COUNTIES (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. BUTT, Bill to provide for the better administration of public moneys now levied by Grand Jury Presentment in Ireland, and for the establishment of Representative Councils in the Irish counties for the management of local affairs, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BUTT and Mr. CALLAN.

RATING LIABILITY (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of The Marquess of HARTINGTON, Bill to amend the Law relating to the liability of property in Ireland for the purposes of Rates and Taxes, ordered to be brought in by The Marquess of HARTINGTON and Mr. Secretary BRUCE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 246.]

House adjourned at half after One o'clock.

Mr. J. Lowther

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 18th July, 1873.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Exchequer Bonds (£1,600,000)* (222); Treasury Chest Fund* (217); Steam Threshing Machines (210).

Committee—Conveyancing (Scotland) (141-227). Committee—Report—Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Provisional Order (No. 3)* (166); Highland Schools (Scotland)* (205). Report—Court of Queen's Bench (Ireland) (Grand Juries)* (224).

Third Reading—Blackwater Bridge* (197); Public Works Loan Commissioners (School and Sanitary Loans)* (193); Gas and Water Works Facilities Act, 1870, Amendment (201), and passed.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS—
DENBIGH FREE GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE BISHOP OF BANGOR rose to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to refuse her assent to the schemes of the Endowed Schools Commissioners for the management of the Free Grammar School and of the Blue Coat School Charity at Denbigh, in the county of Denbigh, North Wales. The school was in an altogether exceptional position, and ought not to be brought under the operation of the Act of 1869. This was a denominational school, and as such had received the annual Parliamentary grant, and therefore came under the exemption of the 19th clause. He understood that the Rector of Denbigh had applied for the necessary certificate from the Education Department, but he had not received it. The endowment possessed by these schools had hitherto extended the benefits of education over a very large population; but if the scheme of the Commissioners was approved of, the advantages would be taken from the poorer classes and transferred to the middle and well-to-do class. Another effect of the scheme of the Commissioners would be to sever the connection of the schools with the Church of England; but they were founded expressly in connection with that Church.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to refuse her assent to the schemes of the Endowed Schools Commissioners for the management of the Free Grammar School and of the Blue Coat School Charity at Denbigh in the county of Denbigh, North Wales.—(The Lord Bishop of Bangor.)

LORD LYTTELTON said, that the legal advisers of the Endowed Schools Commissioners and those of the Education Department had given opinions against the claim of exemption from the operation of the 19th section of the Act which the opponents of the scheme had set up. It was not correct to say that these endowments were intended solely for the poor—it was distinctly stated, that they were intended for the children of the labouring class and poorer tradesmen. What was intended by the Commissioners was to amalgamate these schools so as to make the several endowments belonging to them more serviceable than they could possibly be under the existing system. He denied that these schools were expressly Church of England schools. It was true that the boys had been sent to the National School, and that some of the funds had been applied to building the National School. But this he contended was a breach of trust, though not an intentional one, on the part of the Governors. There could be no doubt that the education of the poorer class of children at Denbigh would be provided for by the Elementary Education Act; and it was proposed by the aid of these endowments to provide the district with the means of higher education. The scheme had been much discussed in North Wales and had received general approval; and the town council of Denbigh were in its favour.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY denied that in considering any scheme of the Endowed Schools Commissioners either House of Parliament was bound by the precise words of the Act of 1869. If the terms of the Act were not properly carried out, there was an appeal to the Privy Council; but it was further provided—without limiting the grounds on which the House had to exercise its power—that either House should have power to see whether the Act was carried out in the spirit in which Parliament had passed it, or whether words and technicalities had been taken advantage of in order that the Act might be used in a way that had never been intended. What those who opposed this scheme complained of was the same as had been complained of in other and similar cases—not that the letter but that the spirit of the Act had been violated. The school with which it was now proposed to deal had hitherto been regarded as a Church school—the fact that the Rector of Denbigh for the time being had been appointed, by the founder an ex officio Trustee plainly indicated his intention that the school should be conducted as a Church school. The effect of the scheme of the Commissioners would be to hand it over to the Dissenters; and he submitted that it was not in accordance with any fair and honest dealing that a school which had hitherto belonged to the Church should be handed over to the Dissenters. If the Commissioners proposed to give over the school to the Dissenting Bodies, they ought openly to avow it, and discuss the question upon that basis. The Endowed Schools Act, however, was not passed with any such purpose, and he demurred to any scheme by which that object would be carried into effect. But the ground that attracted his sympathy most on the present occasion was the operation of the scheme in respect of the poor. It was said that elementary education in Denbigh would be cared for under the Act of 1870, and that middle-class education would be promoted by this scheme. But this was an elementary school. The noble Lord (Lord Lyttelton) said it was a school for the labouring class and poor tradesmen. He seemed to imagine that labourers and poor tradesmen were not proper subjects for an elementary school. Under the scheme it appeared that the tuition fees would amount to not less than 2s. 6d. per week, and not more than 5s. Such fees, he submitted, poor tradesmen would not be able to pay for the education of their children. The result therefore would be to throw the benefits of the endowment into the hands of the middle classes. The best way to encourage education was to treat educational endowments as sacred. Did they seriously believe that any man, anxious for a middle class or any other education, would give his money and alienate it from his family for ever if he knew that some generations hence it would be dissipated to suit the peculiar theories of the Lytteltons and the Robinsons of that day? There was another reason why this scheme should not be adopted. In a Bill now before the other House of Parliament it was provided that in the case of endowments under £100 a-year the Educational Department, and not the Endowed Schools Commissioners, should deal with the endowment. The Government had accepted that policy—the endowment of this school was only £70 a-year—yet, while their Bill was still before Parliament, they introduced a scheme in direct contravention to their own policy. It seemed hard upon the Governors of the Denbigh schools that they should be punished only because they were a little too early to come under the provisions of the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said; he did not dispute the proposition of his noble Friend opposite, that the reference of those schemes to both Houses of Parliament was with the view that each House might object if it thought that the spirit of the Act was not fairly carried out. He thought, however, that his noble Friend had entirely misunderstood the provisions of the Act of 1869, and the principles on which it was founded. He must deny that the foundation in this case was for elementary education, and also that the endowment was under £100 a-year. If his noble Friend would refer to the provisions made by the Founder, he would find that he intended his endowment for the benefit of the children of the labouring class and the poorer tradesmen, and he distinctly laid down that the children should be educated separately and not in a public school. He (the Marquess of Ripon) therefore contended that the Governors in applying these funds to elementary education and sending the children to national schools had been guilty of a distinct breach of trust. On a former occasion the Rector of Denbigh took a view the very opposite to that for which he now contended. In 1865, a grant was made to the Denbigh School by the Department of Education. It was then the rule that when there was an endowment for elementary education, the amount of the endowment was deducted from the grant. Well, the Department proposed to make a deduction in this instance; but the Rector met that proposition by the statement that the endowment was not connected with elementary education. The rev. gentleman's assertion was accepted in 1865, and up to the present time the managers had been receiving a grant of public money in consequence of the Rector's representation that the endowment was not connected with elementary education. It was said that the scheme which their Lordships were asked to reject took advantages from the poor and handed them over to the middle-class; but he must point out that the scheme provided for exhibitions which were to be competed for in the public elementary schools of Denbigh. Was not this an effectual method of fostering and raising the education of the labouring class? The exhibitions would enable those who gained them to pass to schools of a higher class. By agreeing to this scheme an undoubted stimulus would be given to the educational power of this school, which would be greatly injured were their Lordships to accept the Motion of the right rev. Prelate.

LORD CAIRNS remarked that the Bill now before the other House of Parliament—the Endowed Schools Act (1869) Amendment Bill—would exempt from the control of the Endowed Schools Commissioners all schools the aggregate educational endowments of which were less than £100 per annum. Seeing that the educational endowment of the present school only amounted to £70 per annum—for though its income as a charity amounted to £127 a-year, only £70 of that was applicable to the purposes of education—the establishment would undoubtedly come within that exemption if the Bill to which he referred had become law; and, in his opinion, it was unwise and unfair to allow the Commissioners to exercise with regard to this school a power which in a very few days would altogether cease. He had always protested against one of the views taken by the Endowed Schools Commissioners as being erroneous. The Commissioners seemed to consider that since the Elementary Education Act was passed—two years after their own appointment—they were entitled to take up that Act and say that now that Parliament had provided for the elementary education of the country, they must direct their efforts to devoting educational endowments to middle-class education, inasmuch as the rates levied under the Act would provide for primary education. But this was an entire perversion of the spirit and intent of Parliament in passing the Elementary Education Act. What they intended by that was, not that it should be exhaustive with regard to the primary education of the country, but that it should fill up any vacancies in that education wherever it might be found. The Endowed Schools Commissioners went upon the reverse principle, and sought to increase the vacancies by applying endowments intended for elementary education to the purposes of middle class education. This, he ventured to say, was a breach of faith towards Parliament and the country. For these reasons he should support the Motion for the Address.

The Marquess of Salisbury

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 68; Not-Contents 46; Majority 22.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS—
HEATH FREE GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to refuse her assent to the scheme of the Endowed Schools Commissioners for the management of the Free Grammar School of Queen Elizabeth at Heath, in the borough of Halifax, in the county of York, and of all the endowments thereof. The only question at issue in this matter was whether this school was or was not a Church of England school. The school was founded by the Vicar of Halifax in 1584, by a patent from Queen Elizabeth, under which the Archbishop of York was to have the power of making statutes for the management of the school. The school had been, since its foundation, a Church of England school on the strictest principles. As often as it had been dealt with by the Court of Chancery the consent of that Prelate had always been obtained, and its scholars had always up to the present time received a religious education according to the doctrine of the Church of England. To all intents and purposes, therefore, it had been a Church of England school. But the Endowed Schools Commissioners had refused to recognize that character in the constitution of the new trust. The Vicar was no longer, as all his predecessors had been, one of the ex officio members of the Governing Body—the Archbishop of York disappeared; and, in fact, the school was filched altogether from the Church of England, and handed over to the chances of management and co-optative government. He thought this scheme ought to be set aside.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to refuse her assent to the scheme of the Endowed Schools Commissioners for the management of the Free Grammar School of Queen Elizabeth at Heath in the borough of Halifax in the county of York, and of all the endowments thereof.—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON was understood to say that the Archbishop of York offered no opposition to the scheme of the Commissioners. Neither by the will of the Founder, nor according to the scheme settled by the Court of Chancery in the reign of George II., was the Vicar of Halifax constituted an ex officio member of the Governing Body, and he had never been one of that body except as an elected member. There was no desire to deprive the Vicar of his position, and by the present scheme not only the present Vicar, but every one of the existing Governors, was placed upon the Governing Body. Therefore he did not think the scheme was fairly open to the objection of the noble Marquess. There appeared to be a disinclination on the part of the Governing Body of this school to have an interview with the officials of Education Department for the purpose of discussing its condition with reference to the provisions of the Endowed Schools Act. He regretted that the noble Marquess should have thought it his duty to propose this Motion, when no complaint had been made with reference to the new plan for the government of this school either to Mr. Forster or to himself.

After a short discussion, in which Lord Cairns, the Marquess of Ripon, and the Marquess of Salisbury took part, but which was almost inaudible,

On Question? Resolved in the Negative.

CONVEYANCING (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

(no. 141.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Estates of superiority and property to be separate. Certain reserved rights shall import an estate of property.)

LORD COLONSAY said, the Bill looked like an attempt to reconcile two things which were in themselves irreconcilable — namely, the conversion of feu tenure and the preservation of the right of superiority. Hitherto the superiors had in law been held to be the proprietors of the land, subject to the burden of such feus as had been granted, and as such they had been in the enjoyment of important rights. That system had hitherto worked well. It was now proposed to divest the superiors of these rights, and to leave them only the name. This clause went to upset the existing system, to which no objection had been taken, but which, to judge by the reception this Bill had met with, was popular in Scotland. Men of business throughout the country were opposed to the change. Petitions against it had been presented from Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and other places in Scotland, where feuing was much resorted to. It was the favourite practice of persons who had been successful in trade to feu small pieces of land for the purpose of building dwelling-houses which they could call their own and of which they could never be deprived. They preferred land on this tenure to leases of any length; feus were rights in perpetuity and maintained their value throughout, whereas leases were temporary rights and diminished in value with the efflux of time. But the provisions of this Bill interfered so much with the safety of superiors in regard to feus that they would be compelled to limit themselves to the granting of leases only, which would be much less satisfactory to the people. Feu duties were at present a favourite investment, and money could be borrowed upon them on more favourable terms than on leases; but he was informed that since this Bill had been introduced this species of property had fallen two, three, and even four years' purchase. Nobody in Scotland wanted this change, and for himself he doubted much whether it would be an improvement. He certainly thought that before accepting a legislative change of this kind, there ought to be some Parliamentary inquiry whether the change was wanted. It seemed to him that it was a mere speculative view, opposed to the Report of a Royal Commission made in 1838, and also opposed to the opinion both of those interested and of those who were best qualified to judge of the effects of such a change. He therefore felt bound to move the omission of the clause.

Moved, to omit Clause 3.—(The Lord Colonsay).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that notwithstanding the high authority of the noble and learned Lord, he felt bound to differ from him. The Bill would certainly introduce changes in the existing system of land conveyancing in Scotland, but he did not believe that these changes would have any but a beneficial effect upon such transactions. It was not intended to alter substantially any of the rights of the superiors or their feuars. What was intended by the Bill was to introduce a system whereby those rights might be more conveniently enjoyed. However, to meet the wishes of the noble and learned Lord, he had no objection to omit from the clause the definitions of estates of superiority and property, and leave only that portion of the clause which provided that estates of property should, with respect to title, be independent of any estate of superiority.

LORD COLONSAY said, this did not at all meet his objection.

On Question, That the Clause stand part of the Bill? Resolved in the Negative.

Clause struck out.

Clause 4 (Renewal of Investiture abolished).

On the Motion of Lord COLONSAY, the latter part of the clause struck out and new paragraphs inserted—(Investiture to imply confirmation. Implied confirmation not to affect rights of superiors to feu duties, &c. Action in lieu of declarator of non-entry.)

New clauses added.

Clause (A.) (Corporation to pay composition every 25 years).

Clause 5 agreed to.

Clause 6 struck out.

Clause (B.) (Conveyance to vassal to operate as consolidation of superiority with property) in lieu of Clause 7.

Clause (C.) (Memorandum of allocation of property) in lieu of Clause 8.

Clauses 9 and 10 struck out.

Clause (D.) (Completion of title when deceased heir not served).

Clauses 11 to 20 agreed to, with Amendments.

New Clause (E.) after Clause 20—(Where feu rights with casualties are contracted to be granted).

Remaining clauses agreed to, with Amendments.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Thursday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 227.)

STEAM THRESHING MACHINES BILL.

(The Earl of Morley.)

(No. 219.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF MORLEY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the object of the Bill was to prevent accidents arising from the use of these machines owing to their not being properly fenced. Last year 12 of those accidents occurred to women and children, some of them being of the most horrible description. The Bill, therefore, required that the drum of every steam threshing machine shall be provided with a sufficient fence whenever it shall be in use, and inflicted a penalty of £10 on the owner of the machine for not so providing it. Another clause provided that if any person suffers bodily injury in consequence of default of the owner of the machine, after notice in writing has been given to him by an Inspector of Factories that such machine is dangerous, such owner shall be liable to a penalty of £50. The measure was very much needed, and the Government had been strongly pressed to bring it in. There was ample precedent for it in their factory legislation; and altogether there was sufficient justification for its introduction, even at this late period of the Session. It had been suggested that it was necessary to give some time to enable the fencing to be effected before the Bill came into full operation, and the Government would therefore consider, before the Committee was taken, what the length of that time should be.

Moved, that the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>.—(The Earl of Morley.)

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM thought that five or six months should be given for the putting up of the requisite fencing.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>o</sup> accordingly and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

GAS AND WATER WORKS FACILITIES ACT (1870) AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Earl Cowper.)

(No. 201.) THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3<sup>o</sup> according to Order.

LORD REDESDALE moved an Amendment restricting the increase of rates to cases where the companies could prove, that in spite of careful economy, they were likely to incur a loss.

Amendment moved, Clause 7, line 25, to leave out ("with a view to prevent undue loss.")—(The Lord Redesdale.)

EARL COWPER said, that the companies' dividends having been limited while the price of materials was low they were entitled to increase their rates, provided the dividends obtained by the increase did not exceed 5 per cent.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND also thought the increased price of coal entitled companies to increase their rates so as to secure dividends of 5 per cent.

LORD REDESDALE said, the companies had had a monopoly, and in many cases the works were expensively carried on. Some companies still earned dividends with low rates.

On Question, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 13 : Not-Contents 9 ; Majority 4.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

House adjourned at half past Ten o'clock, to Monday next,
Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 18th July, 1873.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE — Report — Public Departments (Purchases, &c.) [No. 311]; Locomotives on Roads [No. 312]; Coal [No. 313].

PUBLIC BILLS — Second Reading — Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 6) * [244].

Committee — Report — Considered as amended — Rating (Liability and Value) (re-comm.) [205-250].

Considered as amended — Local Government Board (Ireland) Provisional Order Confirmation (No. 2) * [229].

Withdrawn — Valuation * [147].

The House met at Two o'clock.

CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL—ALLEGED “PILGRIMAGE”—QUESTIONS.

MR. WHALLEY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, with reference to the recent pilgrimage of Roman Catholics to the tomb of Saint Thomas à Becket, Whether he is aware that the Reverend A. J. Christie, a Jesuit Priest, was permitted to have the exclusive use of Canterbury Cathedral while lecturing, for above an hour to a large concourse of pilgrims in eulogy of the abbots, monks, and priests of old who built and were connected with that Cathedral, and in disparagement of the Protestant Reformation; and, whether he deems it expedient that any and what steps should be taken to prevent the recurrence of such proceedings?

MR. GLADSTONE: I need hardly observe, Sir, that I have no authority which enables me to give to my hon. Friend any account of the proceedings which occurred in Canterbury Cathedral on the occasion in question; but as an old College friend of mine has been canon of that Cathedral for some 30 years, I wrote to him, and mentioned this Question, and said if he gave me any information I should be happy to communicate it to my hon. Friend. Well, Sir, after a careful perusal of my friend's letter in reply I have arrived at the conclusion that, as far as I can see, there are only two suspicious circumstances connected with the case. One is, that a body of Roman Catholics did visit the Cathedral of Canterbury upon a day which seems to be in some manner connected with the memory of St. Thomas à Becket; and the other is, Sir, the colour of the paper which they issued, containing the announcement of the projected visit, and which seems to have some mysterious connection with his martyrdom. [Laughter.] In all other respects I think my hon. Friend will consider my answer satisfactory. The facts are these:—In the first place, there was no “pilgrimage.” A local paper referred to this visit as a “pilgrimage,” but the Roman Catholic priest of the congregation which exists at Canterbury put a letter into that paper stating that it was simply a visit of pleasure and not a religious ceremonial. Then as regards the conduct of the Dean and Chapter, I am not aware, and I have not been informed, that there was any exclusive use of Canterbury Cathedral. The gentlemen to whom my hon. Friend refers very judiciously paid their visit during the hours when the Cathedral is open to the public, and they, of course, were not excluded. There is no limitation as to the particular number of persons, and I hope there never will be, who may enter our cathedrals; and they went—and I cannot blame them for it, under the guidance of a gentleman, who it appears is a Priest, and has made himself thoroughly conversant with the history of a great deal of the extremely interesting matter that is connected with that great metropolitan church. But I am told they behaved themselves in a most unexceptionable manner; they made no assumptions whatever. They endeavoured apparently to get what they could from the lecture of Mr. Christie, and I am sure the hon. Gentleman would think them quite right, as he himself shows great interest in obtaining information in this House. I am told there was nothing whatever in the conduct of the visitors, nor, as far as my informant knows, in their language which could give offence to anyone. I hope that, upon the whole, is a pretty satisfactory account of the matter. My hon. Friend asks me whether any steps will be taken hereafter to prevent the recurrence of such proceedings. I can only understand two modes of preventing the recurrence of such proceedings, one is to shut the cathedrals against the public. But as one of the great triumphs, as I may call it, in a small way that has been achieved in recent times is, that whereas the cathedrals used to be shut against the public, they are now thrown open free of fee or cost of any kind, except where much inspection of valuable monuments may be required, for whose safety it may be requisite to levy a small fee, I think it would be a very great pity to reverse that practice. The other mode would be to administer a religious test, which I do not think would be satisfactory, and I doubt whether it would be effectual. Moreover, there is very great reason for doubting it; for although many Roman Catholics belonged to this party, yet I believe it is a fact that a considerable number of Protestants also were so injudicious as to be anxious to be present and themselves take advantage of the lecture. I wish, at all events, to appear not disinclined to give my hon. Friend the information he asks for.

MR. WHALLEY: I am extremely obliged to the right hon. Gentleman, and perhaps he will allow me to ask him this Question—Do I understand that I, who take a great interest in St. Thomas & Becket, might be allowed to address a number of persons in Canterbury Cathedral?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have no authority in Canterbury Cathedral; but I have no doubt, if my hon. Friend likes to issue an advertisement of this character—to have a party come down and give them the same kind of useful information as that which appears to have been given on this occasion—that he would receive the same courtesy and kindness which they received, and which I believe is afforded to all who visit that Cathedral.

IRISH LAND ACT.—QUESTION.

MAJOR TRENCH asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has, under the sixty-third section of the Irish Land Act of 1870, directed any and what sums to be paid to the clerks of the peace for the additional duties imposed upon them by that Act; and, if so, whether he can state how soon the issue of the additional salaries to those officers will be authorized, and what has been the cause of the delay in approving of them?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, the question with respect to the remuneration of clerks of the peace for additional duties imposed on them by the Act had been answered yesterday.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS— RULES AND PRACTICE OF THE HOUSE. QUESTIONS.

MR. HERMON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, looking to the fact that the House could not be made till one o'clock on Wednesday last, it is the intention of the Government to appropriate the remaining Wednesdays of the Session for the despatch of Government Business?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, we are very desirous, and I believe it would be for the convenience of the House, to obtain as large a portion of time as possible for Public Business during the remainder of the Session. At the same time, that must be done within the rules and precedents which I find are applicable to cases of this kind. It has been usual to ask the House to give up Tuesday evenings to the Government about three weeks before the termination of the Session, and as I hope the Session will terminate within three weeks or somewhat less from the present time, it would not be unreasonable to ask the House for the remaining Tuesday evenings. There is, however, on the Notice Paper a Motion for Tuesday evening of my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), who intends to ask the House to agree to a very important question with respect to the distribution of seats and matters connected therewith. That may constitute a reason why we should not ask for that particular evening; but my impression is that, on the whole, viewing the period of the Session, the House would not be disposed to entertain it, or think it a practical proposal at the present time, particularly as a Bill stands on the Paper for several months, which should be discussed, and the discussion of which will give my hon. Friend the opportunity of advancing all he wishes on the question. If, however, my hon. Friend wishes to bring it on, of course he will be at liberty to do so; but the Government must meet the Motion with a direct negative. I do not think, then, it would be quite fair to ask for next Wednesday, because it would not be quite conformable to usage, and I do not wish to go beyond usage. The practice appears only to have been to ask for the very last Wednesday in the Session. I hope the hon. Member will approve that method of proceeding. I believe my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton is out of town; but after this public intimation, I shall probably give Notice on Monday that on each remaining Tuesday evening Government Orders have precedence.

In reply to Mr. R. N. FOWLER,

MR. GLADSTONE said, he hoped the prospects of the Session would justify the Government in asking that Wednesday, the 30th of July, should be given to Government Business.

THE VALUATION BILL.
QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. ASSHETON CROSS,

Mr. STANSFELD said, he was reluctantly obliged to withdraw the Valuation Bill, in consequence of the advanced period of the Session.

METROPOLIS—BETHNAL GREEN MUSEUM.—QUESTION.

Mr. WHEELHOUSE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it be intended immediately, or if not immediately, when, to put the land within the iron railing now surrounding the Museum at Bethnal Green into proper order?

Mr. AYRTON, in reply, said, that instructions had for some time been given to lay down the piece of land within the railings of the Museum with turf, and he hoped it would soon be done.

IRELAND—THE LETTER-MULLEN COASTGUARD.—QUESTION.

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he can now give the House an explanation of the circumstances attending the arrest and imprisonment for eight days of John Larkin, one of the chief witnesses against the coastguard in the Lettermullen shooting case; and, whether the Government is aware that this man was imprisoned on the charge of perjury upon the sole testimony of the person already awaiting his trial for manslaughter, and at a time when Larkin had voluntarily visited Galway for the purpose of obtaining his salvage money, thirty miles from where the inquest had been held, at which the accused person said Larkin had perjured himself?

The MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, he had received a report on the subject from Mr. Hill, the resident magistrate in Galway, and he did not think he could answer the hon. Member's question more briefly than by reading an extract from that report. Mr. Hill stated that John Larkin was brought before him charged with being drunk and disorderly in the public streets of Galway, and was fined 5s. and costs, or in default, seven days' imprisonment. Immediately after his conviction for the above offence, Lieutenant Drew, of the Royal Navy, tendered an information, in which he charged Larkin with having committed wilful and corrupt perjury at the coroner's inquest, and added that he had reasonable grounds to believe that Larkin was about to leave the country, and upon that information, tendered in open Court, he (Mr. Hill) considered it his duty to remand Larkin to the next petty sessions, but he subsequently went to the gaol and informed Larkin that he was ready at any time to take ordinary bail for his appearance. No one appeared to bail him, and when he was brought up on the remand warrant eight days after, he got one man to enter as security for his appearance at the petty sessions, and he was forthwith discharged. Having appeared at the petty sessions, he was fully committed for trial at the next Galway Assizes for wilful and corrupt perjury, bail being offered and accepted for his appearance. He (the Marquess of Hartington) did not know that there was anything in that statement absolutely inconsistent with that contained in the question of the hon. Member; but he was unable to perceive that the resident magistrate, under the circumstances, could have acted otherwise than he did. He trusted that pending the trial, which would take place next week, there would be no further discussion on this subject.

ARMY—ROYAL MARINES AND ROYAL MARINE ARTILLERY.
QUESTIONS.

Mr. HENRY SAMUELSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, with reference to his statement of June 30th, that—

"A proposal to grant the identical promotion to the Royal Marine Artillery which had been granted to the Royal Artillery had never been placed before the Admiralty, and, therefore, he never had an opportunity of consenting or refusing."

Whether Petitions or Memoranda were not received by the Admiralty in 1872 from the Senior First Captains serving (1) at Head Quarters, (2) in the Channel Fleet, and (3) in the Mediterranean, praying for the same promotion which had been granted to First Captains in the Royal Artillery; and if such Petitions were received, whether he has any objection to state what answers were given to them?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, that Memorials were received from three First Captains serving at Head Quarters, in the Channel Fleet, and in the Mediterranean in the course of July, relative to the general position of the Royal Marine Corps. They were only individual Memorials, and dealt, not exclusively with the position of the Royal Marine Artillery, but generally with the position of the Royal Marine Corps; nor did they pray, as a practical remedy for the grievances complained of, the same promotion which had been granted to First Captains in the Royal Artillery. The answer given to them was, that proposals had been made to the War Office, in which the Admiralty endeavoured to remedy the position both of the officers of the Royal Marine Artillery and of the Light Infantry. But the officers themselves never suggested that any difference ought to be made in their position.

MR. HENRY SAMUELSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it is true, as stated in the "Times" of the 7th July, that—"There is considerable discontent at present existing among the officers of the Royal Marine Artillery at the Head Quarters of the Corps at Eastney, Portsmouth, at what they consider the unjust way they are treated for promotion in comparison with Officers of the Royal Artillery stationed in Portsmouth garrison. It is averred that many Officers of the Royal Artillery have been promoted to Majorities over the heads of Marine Artillery officers, where the latter have had very much greater length of service;"

And, whether the allegation contained in the last sentence is a true one?

MR. GOSCHEN, in reply, said, that all he could say on the subject was that he had received a Memorial from an Artillery officer at Eastney, Portsmouth, expressing dissatisfaction. No doubt, the officers of the Royal Marine Artillery felt dissatisfied at being superseded in certain cases by the officers of the Royal Artillery. The allegations of discontent were so far correct. On the other hand, as he had endeavoured heretofore to explain, the officers of the Royal Marine Artillery were never treated on different grounds in respect of promotion from those on which the officers of the Royal Marines and of the light Infantry were treated. If promotion were granted to the officers of the Royal Marine Artillery now in the same way as had been granted to officers of the Royal Artillery, those officers would supersede the officers of the light Infantry, with long services, and in thus endeavouring to redress one grievance they would be establishing another. The Admiralty had applied to the War Office for the rank of major, both for the Royal Marines and the light Infantry, but the objection of the War Office was that such a concession would have the effect of superseding a large number of the officers of the Line. A compromise, however, was being effected which he trusted would give satisfaction to all parties concerned, and by it the Government had met the grievance as far as they could.

RATING (LIABILITY AND VALUE)
(re-committed) BILL—[BILL 205.]

(Mr. Stansfeld, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Hibbert.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 15th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause—

(Valuation of land used as plantation, &c.)

(The gross value of any land used for a plantation or a wood, or for the growth of saleable underwood, or for both such purposes, shall be estimated as follows:—

- (a.) If the land is used only for a plantation or a wood, the gross value shall be estimated as if the land were in its natural state, and let for agricultural or grazing purposes without any trees growing thereon;
- (b.) If the land is used only for the growth of saleable underwood, the gross value shall be estimated as if the land were let for that purpose;
- (c.) If the land is used for the growth of trees and of saleable underwood, the gross value shall be estimated either as if the land were used only for a plantation or wood, or as if the land were used only for the growth of the saleable underwood growing thereon, as the assessment committee may determine.)—(Mr. Stansfeld,)

—brought up, and read the first and second time.

Amendment proposed, in sub-section (a.) line 3, to leave out the words "in its natural state."—(Mr. Goldmid.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'in its natural state' stand part of the clause."

MR. STANSFELD explained that the words of the sub-section would be taken in their natural sense, and in the case of land used for a plantation or wood, the value of the land would be assessed simply as if the trees were not there.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL RUGGLES BRISSE moved, as an Amendment, in line 5, to insert after "natural" the words "or unimproved." He said if they were not inserted the clause would introduce a new principle into rating—namely, that you were not to be rated on what you have, but on what you ought to have. Many woodlands, indeed, would be rated at less than they were at present under the word "natural" only. What he and his hon. Friends complained of was, that land such as that alluded to was rated at its full value before any money was laid out upon its improvement. At the same time, there were many lands which, through long rest and the deposit of leaves, would, if cultivated, be as valuable as the lands by which they were surrounded; but the clause as it stood would require that these should be rated without any consideration for the outlay which would be required to bring the lands into a state of cultivation; and that suggested the question how far the principle was to be carried, and whether fens and marsh lands were to be assessed at that which might be made their value by a large outlay.

Amendment proposed, in line 5, after the word "natural," to insert the words "or unimproved."—(Colonel Brisse.)

MR. HENLEY said, he was not prepared to say whether the words proposed to be added would cover the difficulty. Upon consideration, however, he thought the words ought to be inserted. He would wish to see the right hon. Gentleman introduce into the measure some provision for making allowance for bringing the soil into cultivation, not that that would do away with all injustice, but it would render it less unjust. There would not be much difficulty in dealing with little bits of woods; but the clause would involve injustice in its application to large masses of woodland which could not be cultivated without large outlay for grubbing, farmhouses, and water supply, which in some cases there was great difficulty in procuring.

MR. CLARE READ thought the word "natural" might meet all the right hon. Gentleman had in view, because the assessment committee would have very little difficulty in arriving at a just conclusion by applying the word "natural" in its natural sense. That word would give more information than the word "unimproved." Farm buildings were not natural improvements. Where there was woodland surrounded by arable land people were very likely to consider it of the same value as the land by which it was surrounded; whereas the one when the trees were removed was in its natural state, and the other in an improved condition. They therefore should not be rated on the same scale; and when the woodland came into cultivation, it was but reasonable that an allowance should be made for the capital to be invested, with the view of bringing about that result. But as the words proposed by his hon. and gallant Friend could do no harm, and might do some little good, he hoped the Government would accept them.

MR. STANSFIELD opposed the Amendment, and considered the word "natural," being a comparative expression, met all the difficulties of the case.

MR. HERMON, in supporting the Amendment, suggested that it would be better to use the word "unreclaimed," as having reference to the great cost of clearing the land of stumps and roots when the timber was cut down.

MR. HIBBERT, on the part of the Government, said, he would accept the Amendment.

MR. CANDLISH complained that the time of the House should have been taken up in the discussion of a matter so trivial, and opposed the Amendment. He should press the matter to a division.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 154; Noes 21: Majority 133.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Clause—

(Valuation and rating of rights of shooting, &c.)

(1.) Where any right of fowling, or of shooting, or of taking or killing game or rabbits is severed from the occupation of the soil and is not let, and the owner of such right receives rent for the land over which such right is exercised, the said right shall not (save as in this section mentioned) be separately valued or rated, but the gross value of the land shall be estimated as if such right were not severed, and the occupier of the land were entitled to exercise the same;

(2.) In the following cases, namely,—

- (a.) Where any right of fowling, or of shooting, or of taking or killing game or rabbits is let to some person who is not the occupier of the land over which such right is exercised, or
- (b.) Where the owner of any right of fowling, or of shooting, or of taking or killing game or rabbits severed from the occupation of the soil does not receive rent for the land over which the right is exercised, the owner of the right may be rated as the occupier thereof;

(3.) Where the rateable value of any land occupied under any lease or agreement existing at the commencement of this Act is increased by reason of the gross value of such land being estimated in pursuance of this Act as if the right of fowling or shooting, or taking or killing game or rabbits, were not severed from the occupation of such land, the occupier of such land shall be entitled during the continuance of such lease or agreement to deduct from any rent he may pay for such land, or to recover as a debt from the person to whom such rent is payable, the amount of any poor or other local rate payable by such occupier in respect of such increase of rateable value, and any payments so authorised to be deducted shall be a good discharge for such amount of rent as is equal to the amount of such payment, and shall be allowed accordingly;

(4.) Every assessment committee, on the application of the occupier of any land who is authorised by this section to deduct any part of any rate, shall certify in the valuation list or otherwise the increase in the gross value and rateable value of such land by reason of the same being valued in pursuance of this section as if the right of fowling or of shooting, or of taking or killing game or rabbits were not severed from the occupation of such land;

(5.) Where the occupier is authorised by this section to deduct from any rent any sum in respect of any increase of rate, the person receiving such rent shall have the same right of appeal and objection with reference to such rate and to the valuation of the hereditament in respect of which such rate is payable as he would have if he were the occupier of such hereditament;

(6.) The owner of any right of fishing when severed from the occupation of the soil may be rated as the occupier thereof;

(7.) For the purposes of this section the person who, if the right is not let, is entitled to exercise any right of fowling, of shooting, or of taking or killing game or rabbits, or of fishing when severed from the occupation of the soil, or who, if the right is let, is entitled to receive the rent for the same, shall be deemed to be the owner of such right;—(Mr. Stansfeld,) —brought up, and read the first and second time.

On Question? “That the Clause be added to the Bill,”

MR. STAPLETON moved, as an Amendment, in sub-section 2, division (b), after “exercised,” to insert the words “either the tenant or.” His object was to ensure that where the owner of any right of shooting, &c., severed from the occupation of the soil did not receive rent for the land over which the right was exercised, either the tenant or the owner of the right might be rated as the occupier thereof.

MR. MUNTZ thought that there would be considerable difficulty in settling who was to pay the rent under the clause. In his opinion they should rate the shooting.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted.

MR. J. S. HARDY moved, as an Amendment, in sub-section 3, line 1, after “land,” to leave out “occupied under any lease or agreement existing at the commencement of this Act,” and in line 6, after “entitled,” to leave out “during the continuance of such lease or agreement.” His wish was that not only during the existence of any lease or agreement, but also in the absence of any lease or agreement, the tenant-farmers should be entitled to deduct from the landlord on the next payment of rent the amount of rate paid in respect of the increase of rateable value caused by the gross value of the land being estimated as if the right of shooting, &c., were not severed from the occupation.

MR. STANSFIELD expressed his willingness to accept the Amendment, on condition that words should be inserted with the view of making the arrangement subject to any future contract or agreement between the landlord and the tenant.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN thought the rate for game should be paid by the landlord, he therefore opposed the Amendment.

COLONEL BARTTELOT feared that such an Amendment would not be for the interest of the tenant, because it would lead to the re-valuation of estates and an increase of rents.

Amendment agreed to.

On Question? That the Clause be added to the Bill.

LORD HENRY SCOTT protested against the principle of the clause, and contended that all land should be assessed irrespective of the purposes for which it was used.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, added to the Bill.

On the Motion of Mr. STANSFIELD, new clauses (Rating of property occupied by local authority); (Saving of special enactments as to valuation); and (Repeal of 43 Eliz. c. 2, as to saleable underwood) agreed to, and added to the Bill.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, considered.

MR. COLLINS, in rising to move a new clause, providing for exemptions from rating of public elementary schools, said, he desired to put the non-board schools on the same footing as the board schools, and the elementary schools on the same footing as the ragged schools with respect to exemption from rating. If it were right to exempt Sunday and ragged schools, which were not a public necessity, the case in favour of public elementary schools was far stronger, because the State ordered the latter to exist, and their existence was a saving of the money of the ratepayers.

Clause (Exemption from Rates of Public Elementary Schools,) — (Mr. Collins,) — brought up, and read the first time.

On Question? That the clause be now read a second time,

MR. J. G. TALBOT, who had on the Paper a new clause of a similar kind, supported the Motion. A great portion of the property of the country was exempt from taxation, such as places of worship and public roads, and therefore the only thing to be considered was, whether the exemption now proposed was a fair one. He contended that it was. Whatever the State required to exist must be considered a public necessity. The country could go on without hospitals; for if there were none, the man who could not be treated in his own home could go to the workhouse infirmary. But the law said that elementary schools must exist, and they should therefore be exempted from rates. If the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. C. Reed) were present, he (Mr. Talbot) would claim his vote on the ground that these public elementary schools were used as Sunday schools. There was no beneficial occupation; on the contrary, such schools were rather a source of loss to the managers. In some cases, the managers had to pay, not only a poor rate and a highway rate, but a school board rate as well.

MR. HIBBERT said, he wished to remind the House, that that was not a Bill to create exemptions, and such being the case, he maintained that the case of public elementary schools was entirely different from that of Sunday and ragged schools, which were exempt under the provisions of the Act of 1869; and the Bill merely allowed that exemption to continue. His hon. Friend, however, desired to extend the number of exemptions; but after the feeling expressed by the House in favour of rendering all property liable to rating, the Government could not consent to this proposal.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE denied that the Bill did away with all exemptions. It did not remove the exemption of Sunday and ragged schools, which might be considered the luxuries and fancy articles of elementary education. That being so, it would be most unfair that the great class of schools which by the Act of 1870 had been elevated into the position of national institutions should be liable to rates. He could see no logic or consistency in the exemption of the less necessary institutions, and insisting on the rating of the more necessary.

MR. CANDLISH said, that elementary schools were often the private property of the owners and conducted for their profit. It might be illogical to exempt Sunday and ragged schools; but the country had determined that they should be exempted. But if elementary schools should also be exempted, where were they to stop? There was no wish in the country for that unjust exemption, and he considered it mischievous and absurd.

MR. DIMSDALE said, he thought that if Sunday schools, which were principally supported by Nonconformists, were exempted, and elementary schools, which were principally supported by Churchmen were not, an advantage would be given to Nonconformists which was denied to members of the Church of England.

MR. M'LAUREN said, that every public elementary school received a grant equal to half its expenditure from the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but Sunday schools and ragged schools did not receive a farthing.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, on the contrary, that many of such schools received no public money whatever. He believed the refusal of exemption in this case would increase the difficulty of passing the Bill.

MR. HENLEY said, that after all their labour, he feared the Bill had got plenty of anomalies, if not of injustices, in it, and those who wished it to have a chance in "another place" should be anxious not to send it up bristling with more anomalies than need be. In a matter of that kind, it would strike everyone as an anomaly that one class of schools should be rated and another free from rate. He could not see why ragged schools ought to be exempted and public elementary schools rated, more especially when it was considered that the latter were in 19 cases out of 20 used as Sunday schools, and therefore he should vote for the clause.

MR. STANSFIELD rose to say in the most unmistakable manner, that it was impossible for him to assent to the clause, and he was not tempted by the suggestion that by doing so he might facilitate the passage of the Bill in "another place." It was not necessary for him to satisfy the House that Sunday schools ought to be exempted in order to justify him in refusing the clause. When the Bill was introduced it contained a clause abolishing the permissive exemption of Sunday schools, but hon. Members knew that they were compelled in this instance to yield to superior force. There was all the difference between continuing a statutory exemption which already existed and creating another by a Bill the object of which was to abolish all exemptions.

MR. REED said, understanding that reference had been made to himself during his absence, he wished to explain that the object of the proposal which he made in 1870 was, that one-half the Sunday schools in the country should be placed on the same footing as the other half. All the Sunday schools attached to churches and chapels were previously exempt from rates, and a legal question having arisen with respect to the others, it became necessary to settle the matter by legislation. He did not come to the House to ask for exemption as a new thing in the case of Sunday schools.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 91; Noes 130: Majority 39.

Clause 6 (Abolition of exemption of property used for local Government purposes).

MR. CAWLEY moved, as an Amendment, in line 40, to leave out from "otherwise" to end of clause. That qualification of the clause was surplusage, and the last three words were an invitation to the assessment committee to invent or imagine any purpose for which, in private hands, a building would command a high rental.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 40, to leave out from the word "otherwise" to the end of the Clause.—(Mr. Cawley.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. STANSFIELD said, the clause had been drafted by the best legal ability the Government could command, and he could not consent to any alteration. At best the words objected to were mere surplusage, and could do no harm.

MR. GOLDSMID suggested that the omission of the last three words, "for any purpose," would meet the difficulty.

MR. STANSFIELD said, he had no objection to the omission of the words "for any purpose," as verbal Amendments which he would at a later stage propose would, if adopted, secure that the object of the clause should be attained.

MR. HENLEY was glad the words were to be omitted, as, if they were surplusage, as he thought they were, their retention might lead in the carrying out of the Bill to mischievous results.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of Mr. STANSFIELD, Amendment made by leaving out, at the end of the clause, the words "for any purpose."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 7 (Payment of poor and other local rates for Government property, and scheme for defining and valuing the same).

MR. CAWLEY moved, as an Amendment, to omit lines 28 to 35, inclusive, containing words which provided that the acquisition, appropriation, and use of Government hereditaments should be taken into consideration by the assessment committee in dealing with the rating of Government property.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 27, to leave out from the word "mentioned," to the word "together," in line 36.—(Mr. Cawley.)

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

The House divided:—Ayes 147; Noes 42: Majority 105.

MR. CLARE READ hoped the Government would adopt some mode of rectifying an omission in the Bill with regard to the liability of a tenant to assessment in the case of timber. He had moved an Amendment on the subject which the Government were willing to accept, but through some oversight it had not been inserted in the amended Bill. He only asked in this case what was admitted in other cases—namely, that the tenant should be entitled to deduct any increase of rates arising out of the operation of the Bill from the landlord.

MR. HENLEY hoped the Bill would be reprinted before the third reading.

MR. STANFIELD said, it was proposed to read the Bill a third time on Monday, and in the meantime it would be reprinted.

Bill to be read the third time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 250.]

And it being now ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

House resumed its sitting at Nine of the clock.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MERCANTILE MARINE—LOSS OF LIFE AT SEA.

MOTION FOR A COMMISSION.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE rose to move—

"That it is expedient that a Commission be appointed to inquire and report to the Board of Trade as to the practicability of stowing conveniently in Passenger Ships such a number of Refuge Boats or Rafts, or other insubmersible appliances, as may be sufficient in their aggregate capacity to receive all on board in the event of accidents to the ships."

Mr. Cawley

The right hon. Gentleman was addressing the House in support of his Motion, when—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at twenty minutes after Nine o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS, Monday, 21st July, 1873.

MINUTES.]—Set First in Parliament—The Lord Lytton, after the death of his father. Public Bills—First Reading—Rating (Liability and Value)* (231).

Second Reading—Consolidated Fund, &c. (Permanent Charges Redemption)* (198); Revising Barristers* (218).

Select Committee—Report—Metropolitan Tramways Provisional Orders [No. 228]; Pollution of Rivers.

Report—Metropolitan Tramways Provisional Orders* (139-229); Pollution of Rivers* (59-230).

Third Reading—Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Provisional Order (No. 3)* (166); Court of Queen's Bench (Ireland) (Grand Juries)* (224), and passed.

Royal Assent—Canonries [36 & 37 Vict. c. 39]; Canada Loan Guarantee [36 & 37 Vict. c. 45]; Thames Embankment (Land) [36 & 37 Vict. c. 40]; Shrewsbury and Harrow Schools Property [36 & 37 Vict. c. 41]; Tithe Commutation Acts Amendment [36 & 37 Vict. c. 42]; Indian Railways Registration [36 & 37 Vict. c. 43]; National Debt Commissioners (Annuities) [36 & 37 Vict. c. 44]; Sites for Places of Religious Worship [36 & 37 Vict. c. 50]; Railway and Canal Traffic [36 & 37 Vict. c. 48]; Blackwater Bridge [36 & 37 Vict. c. 46]; Blackwater Bridge (Composition of Debt) [36 & 37 Vict. c. 47]; Public Works Loan Commissioners (School and Sanitary Loans) [36 & 37 Vict. c. 49]; Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (No. 4) [36 & 37 Vict. c. cxxxvii]; Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (No. 5) [36 & 37 Vict. c. cxxxviii]; Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (No. 6) [36 & 37 Vict. c. cxxxix]; Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 4) [36 & 37 Vict. c. cxl]; Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 5) [36 & 37 Vict. c. cxli].

THE LATE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER AND LORD WESTBURY.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, before I proceed to the task I have undertaken on the present occasion, I cannot forbear from alluding to the very great loss this House and the country have sustained since our last meeting. We have lost two of our most distinguished Members, who since Friday last have passed to their rest. My Lords, one of them was a noble and learned Lord who had attained probably the highest rank which it is possible for a layman in this House to occupy, and he had done so by commanding talent and great eloquence. The other was a man whom, for a great many years, I had the privilege and gratification of claiming as one of my most intimate personal friends, whose genial and social talents were such that his removal from among us will long be lamented by a vast number of sorrowing friends. My Lords, I do not think that on the present occasion it is right or proper that I should dwell further upon this melancholy subject. I should not have felt it just to myself if I had remained altogether silent.

OFFICERS OF HER MAJESTY'S ARMY —ABOLITION OF PURCHASE.

ADDRESS FOR A ROYAL COMMISSION.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he had now, pursuant to Notice, to move an humble Address to Her Majesty for the issue of a Royal Commission to inquire into the allegations of officers of Her Majesty's Army in reference to grievances which they state they suffer consequent upon the abolition of Purchase. He had refrained till this very late period of the Session from bringing forward the Motion in the hope that Her Majesty's Government would see fit to recommend the appointment of a Royal Commission as their own act, and because he was most unwilling that the discipline and the management of the Army should be made a subject of discussion in either House of Parliament. We had not as yet "nationalized" our Army—it still continued to be the Army of the Queen, and was commanded and managed by officers appointed by Her Majesty, and for this reason, if for no other, he thought it undesirable that, without good cause, questions affecting its interior organization should be brought before Parliament. There were, however, exceptional cases even in respect of a matter like this, and had he not believed the case of those officers was an exceptional one, he should not have brought it under the notice of their Lordships three months ago, and he should not now be coming forward with a Motion for an Address to the Crown. He asked their Lordships not to suppose that in any remarks he might make he intended to ask for a restoration of the system of Purchase which was abolished in 1871. That abolition was an accomplished fact, and it furnished him with one of the strongest arguments in favour of his Motion. For himself, he then thought, and he thought now, the abolition of Purchase a great mistake, because the system of Purchase, though an anomaly, had worked most satisfactorily for a very long time, and because by doing away with it so much money was unnecessarily taken out of the pockets of the taxpayers. But Her Majesty's advisers had recommended that Purchase should be abolished, and had supplanted it by certain rules which were intended to facilitate the change, and Parliament had sanctioned their proposals. Therefore, whatever might be his opinions as to the effect of the change upon the Army, and the expediency of laying this heavy burden on the taxpayers of the country, he accepted abolition of Purchase as an accomplished fact not to be reversed, and should argue his case upon that basis. The first question was—did any grievances in reality exist? and the next was—was there any case for the redress of such grievances? He believed that there were real grievances; but even supposing there were not, he would still contend that there was a case for inquiry; because even if there were no grievances, he defied anybody to contradict him when he said there was great discontent. He could name several of the alleged grievances, and go into details to prove their existence; but, except so far as referring to one or two cases by way of illustration, he did not intend to go into details which, in his opinion, were for a Commission of Inquiry rather than an Assembly like their Lordships' House. He would, for example, mention the case of those officers who had been placed compulsorily on half-pay, and who, when they went before the Commissioners for their money, found themselves placed in a much worse position than they had any reason to think they would have been reduced to by reason of the abolition of Purchase. He would direct their Lordships' attention to a Return which he had moved for, and which had been presented to their Lordships' House, of the officers who, previously to the 1st of July, 1873, had memorialized the Commander-in-Chief with reference to their position and prospects consequent upon the abolition of Purchase. That Return showed the number to be 2,245. Those were officers quartered at home or in the home colonies. Now, what did such figures represent? Of Cavalry regiments they represented 9; of the Brigade of Guards, they represented 7 battalions; and of the Infantry of the Line they represented 68 battalions. Now, what were the total numbers of the officers of all ranks serving at home and in the home colonies? In the Household Cavalry there were 66; in the Line Cavalry, 333; in the Guards, 190; in the Infantry of the Line, 2,274 —making a total of 2,863, exclusive of colonels, who were not so much affected by the regulations for carrying out the abolition; so that their Lordships would see that rather more than two-thirds of Her Majesty's Army serving at home and in the home colonies felt themselves ill-used and ill-treated, and were therefore discontented. Although the General Officers who sent forward the memorials to the Horse Guards merely acted as machines in the transmission of the statement of grievances, some of them did express opinions which he would take the liberty of quoting to their Lordships. The first was from Major General Steele, commanding the forces in Ireland. He said—

"In forwarding these representations, I beg to say that it would appear therefrom that the officers serving in this command generally feel they have a grievance arising out of the abolition of the purchase system, and that they trust His Royal Highness may be able to devise some measures that may lead to the matter being duly considered."

Then Major General Horsford, commanding the South-East District, said—

"I have the honour to state that, while in no way offering an opinion on the merits of the various claims, it appears to me that it would be a satisfactory way of silencing complaint on the part of the officers that their claims should be referred to inquiry of such a nature as would satisfy them as to its impartiality."

Major General Grevathed expressed this opinion—

"There is a very strong feeling among officers that they have been dealt with in a summary manner, and I am of opinion that a very great relief would be given to this feeling of dissatisfaction by a full and impartial inquiry conducted by men whom the Army could trust."

A letter from Lord Strathnairn, forwarding a memorial, was in these terms—

"I have the honour to enclose to you, for submission to His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, a letter from Colonel Baillie, commanding the Royal Horse Guards, conveying the individual expression of the grievances of himself, five captains, and ten lieutenants, arising from the recent Army Warrents for the abolition of purchase, and to express the hope that their respectful request for an impartial inquiry into the subject may be granted."

In transmitting a memorial from officers of different regiments serving under his command at Alderhot, Sir Hope Grant stated—

"I am fully convinced as to the strong feeling of discontent and dissatisfaction which prevails amongst the mass of regimental officers on the subject. This is mainly owing to the idea they have, that their case has never been gone into before an impartial tribunal. Without some such investigation I am certain that this feeling will go on increasing in intensity. I would, therefore, beg very respectfully to suggest, for the consideration of His Royal Highness, that a Royal Commission, before which the officers could unfold their views, and state the points in which they regard themselves as having been unfairly treated, would do more than anything else could to allay the feeling which now so unfortunately prevails."

He would ask, was it a satisfactory state of things when 2,245 officers were discontented, and one of the most distinguished officers in the service stated that nothing but a Royal Commission would remove that discontent? If he had nothing more than those facts, they would have made out his case for a Royal Commission. No inquiry would be satisfactory if it were not conducted by a perfectly independent tribunal. When the scheme for the abolition of Purchase was before the House of Commons, Mr. Cardwell, Sir Henry Storks, and Captain Vivian, speaking for the War Department, stated that they did not wish to place the officers of the Army in a worse position than they occupied during the existence of the system of Purchase. He (the Duke of Richmond) quite believed that the Government were perfectly sincere in these statements, and that they had no intention of injuring these officers in the way they had been injured:—what he complained of was that the Government, in passing this measure, did not foresee the evils which would result from the operation of their scheme. But if they were sincere in their statement that they did not wish to place the officers in a worse position, and if the officers now said that they were in a worse position, were not the Government bound to grant them an inquiry, in order that the officers might have the means of showing how they had been injured and in what manner their grievances might be redressed? When the Army Regulation Bill was under discussion, the Government quoted the evidence of officers of distinction who were in favour of abolition. In March, 1871; Sir Henry Storks made this quotation from the evidence of Colonel Cameron, a distinguished officer commanding one of our infantry regiments.

The Duke of Richmond

"I am entirely in favour of the abolition of Purchase, and think the Government have acted in the matter with the greatest liberality. The Purchase System, in my opinion, is bad in every way."—[3 Hansard, cciv. 1739.]

But something must have happened since then to change Colonel Cameron's views—for when he looked to the Return containing the memorials sent in to the Horse Guards "consequent upon the Abolition of Purchase," he found attached to a memorial transmitted by Lieutenant General Lord Templeton, commanding the Southern District, the name of "Colonel Cameron, 4th Regiment." So that this gallant Colonel, who, when the scheme was under discussion, thought "the Government have acted in the matter with the greatest liberality," now included his name among the officers who had grievances to complain of in consequence of the operation of a scheme which he had commended so highly. Did not this show the necessity for inquiry? He would quote the testimony of another distinguished officer who had not only been an advocate of the scheme, but had himself acted as one of the Commissioners for the abolition of Purchase. On the 10th of March last, when the subject was before their Lordships' House, the late Lord De la Warr said—

"He would now point to a defect in the new system. He thought the powers of the Commissioners for the abolition of Purchase ought to be enlarged, so as to enable them to include among those entitled to compensation officers who ought never to have been excluded—for instance, old officers who, at the time of the reduction, were placed on the half-pay list without any desire of their own. They had lost an opportunity, and he thought they ought to be compensated for the loss; but if that one inequality were redressed, he would say that a large measure of substantial justice had been and would be meted out to the officers of the British Service under the arrangements of 1871."—[3 Hansard, coxiv. 1598.]

There was one great blot in the scheme which had given rise to the present state of things—there was no appeal from the Commissioners—their decision was final. If the officer who went before them did not like what they had to say, there was nothing for him but to make his bow and walk out. Nor was that all—for the Commissioners were not bound by the Act of Parliament to exercise their functions at all. Section 13 of the Act provided—

"No appeal shall be had from any decision of the Commissioners under this Act, and the Commissioners shall not be compelled by mandamus, injunction, or order of any Court to exercise or abstain from exercising any power conferred on them by this Act."

So that if any officer represented his case as one of hardship, and the Commissioners chose to say they would not entertain it, there was an end of the matter—they could not be compelled to go into the merits of the case. He must say that he thought the fact of there being no appeal from the Commissioners was an additional reason why a Royal Commission should be granted. By the Members of the Government the British Army had always been spoken of in the handsomest terms. The Secretary of State for War had stated—he was not sure whether it was not at the meeting of "The Druids" of which their Lordships had heard so much—that all which could be wished for was that the Army should be the same as the Army of Wellington and Marlborough. He quite concurred with the right hon. Gentleman, but he did not think the Government were going the right way about it. The servants of the Queen in the Army should not be put in a worse position than Civil servants; and what had the Chancellor of the Exchequer said as to the position of the latter?—

"The Civil servants make a bargain with the State, and the State makes a bargain with them for their whole lives, and every man comes into the service under well-known rules and conditions, and neither the Government nor the servant can depart from those rules and conditions. We hold the Civil servants to their bargain, and they hold us to ours, and beyond this we cannot go."

Surely, officers serving in the Army ought not to be placed in a worse position than that? But the officers of the Army were not treated in that fashion—the bargain under which they entered into the service of the State had been broken by the State, and it was not to be wondered at that discontent should be the result. He now came to the point that the tribunal of inquiry ought to be an independent one—he would not say an impartial tribunal, because he assumed that the Secretary for War would not make it anything but an impartial one. He ventured to say that no tribunal would be satisfactory if its members were nominated by the War Department. He meant no offence by this; because, with all respect for His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, he should say the same of any tribunal nominated by the Horse Guards. He held that no one sitting on the Commission should have the slightest interest, official or otherwise, in the subject matter of investigation. If a railway company proposed to take a man's land, he was reconciled to the proceeding because it was allowed only after an investigation by a thoroughly independent Committee. When it was remembered that Purchase was put an end to by an exercise of the Royal Prerogative, it could not be expected that officers who felt aggrieved would be satisfied with an inquiry conducted by a tribunal named by the Ministry who had advised that exercise of the Royal Prerogative. It might be said that the terms could not have been so bad for the officers, or they would have thrown up their commissions. The obvious answer to that argument was, that as the Act of 1871 had passed the officers could not sacrifice everything, but must put up with the terms of that Act, unless redress were given them by means of an inquiry. It would be a mistake to suppose that the discontent was only among the officers. It was felt by the men. Everything which affected the interest of the officers the men felt—and rightly felt—to affect themselves; and they felt that their chance of getting any grievance of their own inquired into by an independent tribunal was very remote, when their officers failed in a case like this. He would now anticipate an objection which might be urged against his Motion. Such a Motion was not without precedent. On the 28th of April, 1863, Colonel Lindsay moved—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that she will be graciously pleased to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the claims of 21 Officers of the Army, who were promoted to the rank of Colonel in 1855 and 1856, as Aides de Camp to the Queen, and for distinguished service in the Crimean War, who, by a recommendation of the Royal Commission of 1858, which had reference to another class of Officers, have been deprived, to an undue extent, of the position they attained by the promotion conferred upon them; and to report to Her Majesty whether they are entitled to any redress; and, if so, to recommend in what form such redress should be accorded to them."—[3 Hansard, clxx. 864.]

At the end of the debate Lord Palmerston said—

"Sir, there are two things which I think it desirable to avoid, if possible. One is, the habitual interference of this House with the detailed management of the Army, because that is no part of the Constitutional functions of the House of Commons, and, if continued, must naturally lead step by step to very objectionable results; and the other is, the presence in the public mind of any circumstances which give rise to the opinion that injustice has been done to any class of deserving public servants . . . . The course which I would venture to suggest to the hon. and gallant Member opposite would, in my opinion, meet both objections. I should propose to him to withdraw his Motion, thereby avoiding committing this House to an interference with the detailed military administration of the Army; and, if he adopts that course, I will, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, engage that a Commission shall be issued. I trust that that will show that Her Majesty's Government have no desire to avoid inquiry, and have no wish to resist any suggestion which is founded upon a sense of injustice, whether rightly or wrongly entertained."—[Ibid., 873-4.]

Under these circumstances Colonel Lindsay did not press his Motion—a Royal Commission was issued; General Peel was appointed Chairman, and the Commission was in these terms—

"Whereas it has been represented to us that 21 officers who were promoted to the rank of Colonel in the years 1855-1856 as our aides-de-camp, &c., 'consider that by the operation of our Royal Warrant of the 14th October, 1858, founded on the recommendation of the Royal Commission of 1858, they have been deprived to an undue extent of the position they attained by the promotion bestowed upon them,' and whereas it has been represented to us that certain captains and lieutenant-colonels of the Guards, &c., 'consider that their positions have been unduly injured by the operation of the said Warrant,' &c. . . . . Commission to report whether these officers are entitled to redress, and if so, to recommend in what form such redress should be accorded to them."

But it might be urged, by way of objection to the Motion, that it would be against precedent to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the working of an Act of Parliament. He thought he would be able to show that there was abundant precedent for the course he asked to have adopted in this case. In 1837, when the Marines complained of the inferiority of their position, as compared with the rest of the Army, a Royal Commission was at once issued to inquire into their complaints. When the Indian officers were transferred to the Royal Army in 1858 they received a Parliamentary guarantee that all their privileges should be preserved to them, and when certain Petitions were presented to Parliament complaining that this guarantee had been violated, a Royal Commission was at once issued to inquire into the alleged grievance. When the Royal Artillery complained of the slowness of their promotion, inquiry was at once made into the question. After that a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the laws regulating the sale and consumption of excisable liquors in Scotland. In 1862, one was appointed to inquire into the operation of the Act to substitute in certain cases other punishments in lieu of transportation, and an Act to amend that statute. In 1865, there was one appointed to inquire into the operation of the marriage laws; in 1866 there was one on capital punishment, and in the same year one on oaths and affirmations, and in 1870 one to inquire into the operation of the Contagious Diseases Acts passed so recently as 1866 and 1869. He would now leave the case in their Lordships' hands, feeling perfectly satisfied that by their votes they would grant to the officers of the Army that justice which the humblest man in this country had a right to demand.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that she will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the allegations of the officers of Her Majesty's Army contained in the memorials mentioned in the Return made to this House (Parliamentary Paper 196.) as to the grievances which they state that they suffer consequent upon the abolition of purchase.—(The Duke of Richmond.)

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, it was always a matter of regret to him to differ from the conclusions of the noble Duke opposite, and on the present occasion he regretted it the more because he felt he was differing not only from the conclusions at which the noble Duke had arrived, but also from those of no inconsiderable number of gallant officers whose confidence the Government desired to retain, and whose interests the War Department was always anxious to promote. But the question now brought before their Lordships was of such importance that he thought it was his duty to look beyond the mere approval or disapproval of any class or profession, and to take care that nothing should be done which could impede the future administration of a Department or disparage the authority of Parliament. Their Lordships were confronted upon the present occasion with one fact of great importance, the large numerical signature of the officers' memorials, and from that fact the noble Duke drew two inferences, first, that there existed widespread discontent among the officers of the Army; secondly, that the only legitimate remedy for that discontent was the appointment of a Royal Commission. He (the Marquess of Lansdowne) would endeavour to ascertain what were the limits and what was the cause of the discontent, and then endeavour to show that the remedy which the noble Duke proposed was not the one which their Lordships should concur in. He thought the House would agree with him when he said that the fact that these memorials had been signed by so many officers was a very important event in the history of the British Army; and he proposed to treat it with that kind of treatment which an historical event generally received. He proposed to make some inquiry as to its antecedent circumstances; then to refer to external evidence in order to see whether the explanation suggested by the antecedents was confirmed by it or not, and thence to pass on to the evidence contained in the body of the memorials themselves. As to the antecedents, he would remind the House that the Government had found, as the result of inquiries by a Royal Commission, that an illegal system of Purchase was in existence, and that it was impossible to put an end to the over-regulation payments without putting an end to the regulation payments also. Purchase was accordingly put an end to by Royal Warrant, and a measure was submitted to Parliament providing the terms, on which officers should be compensated for any loss which they might sustain, and he thought it would not be denied that the scale of compensation agreed to by Parliament was not only liberal, but amply liberal. But during the discussions on the subject, a strong opposition to the abolition of Purchase had been offered by a large body of the officers and their friends. He did not say that opposition was an universal one, but there was unquestionably a wide and determined opposition to the general policy of the proposition of the Government, and not to the terms proposed. Now, he ventured to think that if their Lordships looked into the memorials referred to by the noble Duke they would detect in them that old opposition to the policy of the Government rather than dissatisfaction with the terms. In the first place it might have been supposed that if the position of the officers was so unbearable as had been represented, an exodus from the Army would have taken place; but nothing of the kind had occurred, though those gallant officers would have been entitled to the full value of their commissions had they at once taken advantage of the Act. The Estimate voted on this account last year amounted to £2,035,000, and the sum voted on the 31st March this year was £2,056,000. Again, beyond all question the memorials had been signed by a large number of officers who could not pretend that they themselves had suffered anything from the change. He would give their Lordships one or two instances. A colonel of the Household Brigade complained that he was deprived of the power of exchange; that he sustained injury in respect of chances of promotion, and that he suffered in consequence of the amalgamation of the English and Indian Armies. He had inquired into the case of the gallant officer and found that there being no corresponding rank to that held by him in any regiment except the regiments of Guards, he could not have exchanged. He had not suffered in respect of promotion; and the amalgamation of the English and Indian Armies was in no way connected with the abolition of the Purchase system. There was no system of Purchase in the Indian regiments, although there were bonuses for which officers would be compensated, and on account of which they would certainly not be losers. Another officer in the Household Cavalry complained generally that he was aggrieved and prayed for an inquiry; but as a matter of fact, that gallant officer had obtained his colonelcy since the abolition of Purchase, and had thereby retained £3,250 which otherwise he would have had to expend in obtaining his promotion. The list of memorialists was closed by one or two sub-lieutenants, who, having joined the Army subsequently to the abolition of Purchase, had had nothing to pay, and must, he should think, have been under the impression that they were signing a vote of want of confidence in the Sandhurst system or a petition against the Civil Service Commissioners. Turning to the contentions contained in the memorials themselves, without going into much of detail in regard to the grievances complained of, he would mention a few in order to prove how groundless many of them were. In the first place, there were grievances to be attributed to alterations in the position and prospects of officers, which alterations were clearly foreseen and contemplated at the time when Purchase was abolished. Certain officers said they entered the Army while the Purchase system was in existence, and that they held the Government bound to continue that system until the end of their career. But the answer to this was that the Purchase system was abolished by Parliament in order to terminate such a right as this, and also the further right which was claimed to purchase higher steps because admission to the lower grade had been paid for by them. Another class of complaints was directed against alterations which had been made with a view to the efficiency of the Service, and with which no guarantee or understanding could possibly be held to interfere. That class of grievance was well described in the Report of a Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the position of the Indian Colonels, a Commission of which the noble and learned

Lord opposite was a member. In the Report occurred this passage,—

"The guarantee does not in our opinion secure the Indian officers from changes in the rules of the service which may be desirable to be made with a view to the improvement or exigencies of the service. These changes could, without any breach of faith, have been made by the East India Company, and can be now made by the Crown."

These words, read as bearing upon the case now before their Lordships, seemed to establish beyond dispute that no guarantee could secure an officer against changes which, upon their own merits and for the sake of the efficiency of the Service, the Crown might subsequently determine to make. Such changes had been made repeatedly by different Governments—for example in 1856, Lord Panmure decided that majorities and lieutenant colonelcies in the Guards should be for the future unsaleable; and by this arrangement several gallant officers lost the value of the higher commission which they might have sold. One of them was a Member of their Lordships' House, for Lord Abinger lost £3,500, and Colonel Stevenson £700 by this regulation; but he had not heard that any claim was made for compensation in consequence of their loss. Another category of grievances was that in which the position and prospects of officers were prejudiced as compared with those of their brother officers, in consequence of their ill-luck; such cases must always arise whenever large re-organizations were made; but these were losses not previously ascertainable, for which therefore it was impossible to provide compensation. There were some of the grievances mentioned by the noble Duke which he must admit seemed to involve hardship. One of these was that of the officer who had remained for a long time at the top of his rank waiting for an unbought vacancy which would give him a saleable commission which he could turn to account. A further instance was that of officers upon the reduced half-pay list, who might have been placed by the Commander-in-Chief on full pay in order to sell, but who were now, if brought back, unable to sell their commissions. There was a hardship there undoubtedly; but, as far as he could see, this was the misfortune of these officers rather than the fault of anybody else concerned, and any scheme of compensation for them would have entirely given up the whole principle of the settlement of 1871. There was another small and unimportant class of grievances which might be described by the phrase "mares' nests." Certain cavalry officers for instance said that the terms of compensation to cavalry should be higher than in the case of any other branch of the Service, because the over-regulation in cavalry regiments was higher than in the other branches; but those who thus contended seemed to forget that the Army Purchase Commissioners in fixing the compensation took this fact into their consideration. The whole of the grievances were, in his opinion, reducible into narrow limits. There was an element of gain and an element of loss; and, on the whole, he thought the element of gain to the officers outweighed the element of loss. The pledges of the Government in regard to the matter were based upon a belief that this would be the case, and he believed that everyone of the pledges had been faithfully redeemed. Now, with respect to the remedy proposed by the noble Duke. The remedy proposed took the form of a Royal Commission; but upon what assumption could the demand for such a Commission proceed? It could only proceed upon the assumption that neither from Parliament nor from the Government was there to be expected any such redress as that for which, said the noble Duke, the situation of the officers called. He (the Marquess of Lansdowne), on the other hand, contended that the War Department had always been prepared to deal with cases which came within the equity, but not within the letter, of the Act of 1871, and that the House of Commons had on several occasions been asked to provide compensation for officers who by a strict interpretation of the Act of Parliament were not entitled to it. Their Lordships were aware that by the Army Regulation Act, a limitation was put on the number of officers who might be allowed to sell out in any one year. When that limitation was found to work to the prejudice of those officers, it was without difficulty withdrawn, a similarly liberal concession had been made to the staff officers of pensioners, and he could give their Lordships other instances of individual officers who had been similarly treated by the Government. It seemed to him that if a case of individual and a Royal Commission, that an illegal system of Purchase was in existence, and that it was impossible to put an end to the over-regulation payments without putting an end to the regulation payments also. Purchase was accordingly put an end to by Royal Warrant, and a measure was submitted to Parliament providing the terms, on which officers should be compensated for any loss which they might sustain, and he thought it would not be denied that the scale of compensation agreed to by Parliament was not only liberal, but amply liberal. But during the discussions on the subject, a strong opposition to the abolition of Purchase had been offered by a large body of the officers and their friends. He did not say that opposition was an universal one, but there was unquestionably a wide and determined opposition to the general policy of the proposition of the Government, and not to the terms proposed. Now, he ventured to think that if their Lordships looked into the memorials referred to by the noble Duke they would detect in them that old opposition to the policy of the Government rather than dissatisfaction with the terms. In the first place it might have been supposed that if the position of the officers was so unbearable as had been represented, an exodus from the Army would have taken place; but nothing of the kind had occurred, though those gallant officers would have been entitled to the full value of their commissions had they at once taken advantage of the Act. The Estimate voted on this account last year amounted to £2,035,000, and the sum voted on the 31st March this year was £2,056,000. Again, beyond all question the memorials had been signed by a large number of officers who could not pretend that they themselves had suffered anything from the change. He would give their Lordships one or two instances. A colonel of the Household Brigade complained that he was deprived of the power of exchange; that he sustained injury in respect of chances of promotion, and that he suffered in consequence of the amalgamation of the English and Indian Armies. He had inquired into the case of the gallant officer and found that there being no corresponding rank to that held by him in any regiment except the regiments of Guards, he could not have exchanged. He had not suffered in respect of promotion; and the amalgamation of the English and Indian Armies was in no way connected with the abolition of the Purchase system. There was no system of Purchase in the Indian regiments, although there were bonuses for which officers would be compensated, and on account of which they would certainly not be losers. Another officer in the Household Cavalry complained generally that he was aggrieved and prayed for an inquiry; but as a matter of fact, that gallant officer had obtained his colonelcy since the abolition of Purchase, and had thereby retained £3,250 which otherwise he would have had to expend in obtaining his promotion. The list of memorialists was closed by one or two sub-lieutenants, who, having joined the Army subsequently to the abolition of Purchase, had had nothing to pay, and must, he should think, have been under the impression that they were signing a vote of want of confidence in the Sandhurst system or a petition against the Civil Service Commissioners. Turning to the contentions contained in the memorials themselves, without going into much of detail in regard to the grievances complained of, he would mention a few in order to prove how groundless many of them were. In the first place, there were grievances to be attributed to alterations in the position and prospects of officers, which alterations were clearly foreseen and contemplated at the time when Purchase was abolished. Certain officers said they entered the Army while the Purchase system was in existence, and that they held the Government bound to continue that system until the end of their career. But the answer to this was that the Purchase system was abolished by Parliament in order to terminate such a right as this, and also the further right which was claimed to purchase higher steps because admission to the lower grade had been paid for by them. Another class of complaints was directed against alterations which had been made with a view to the efficiency of the Service, and with which no guarantee or understanding could possibly be held to interfere. That class of grievance was well described in the Report of a Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the position of the Indian Colonels, a Commission of which the noble and learned

Lord opposite was a member. In the Report occurred this passage,—

"The guarantee does not in our opinion secure the Indian officers from changes in the rules of the service which may be desirable to be made with a view to the improvement or exigencies of the service. These changes could, without any breach of faith, have been made by the East India Company, and can be now made by the Crown."

These words, read as bearing upon the case now before their Lordships, seemed to establish beyond dispute that no guarantee could secure an officer against changes which, upon their own merits and for the sake of the efficiency of the Service, the Crown might subsequently determine to make. Such changes had been made repeatedly by different Governments—for example in 1856, Lord Panmure decided that majorities and lieutenant colonelcies in the Guards should be for the future unsaleable; and by this arrangement several gallant officers lost the value of the higher commission which they might have sold. One of them was a Member of their Lordships' House, for Lord Abinger lost £3,500, and Colonel Stevenson £700 by this regulation; but he had not heard that any claim was made for compensation in consequence of their loss. Another category of grievances was that in which the position and prospects of officers were prejudiced as compared with those of their brother officers, in consequence of their ill-luck; such cases must always arise whenever large re-organizations were made; but these were losses not previously ascertainable, for which therefore it was impossible to provide compensation. There were some of the grievances mentioned by the noble Duke which he must admit seemed to involve hardship. One of these was that of the officer who had remained for a long time at the top of his rank waiting for an unbought vacancy which would give him a saleable commission which he could turn to account. A further instance was that of officers upon the reduced half-pay list, who might have been placed by the Commander-in-Chief on full pay in order to sell, but who were now, if brought back, unable to sell their commissions. There was a hardship there undoubtedly; but, as far as he could see, this was the misfortune of these officers rather than the fault of anybody else concerned, and any scheme of compensation for them would have entirely given up the whole principle of the settlement of 1871. There was another small and unimportant class of grievances which might be described by the phrase "mares' nests." Certain cavalry officers for instance said that the terms of compensation to cavalry should be higher than in the case of any other branch of the Service, because the over-regulation in cavalry regiments was higher than in the other branches; but those who thus contended seemed to forget that the Army Purchase Commissioners in fixing the compensation took this fact into their consideration. The whole of the grievances were, in his opinion, reducible into narrow limits. There was an element of gain and an element of loss; and, on the whole, he thought the element of gain to the officers outweighed the element of loss. The pledges of the Government in regard to the matter were based upon a belief that this would be the case, and he believed that everyone of the pledges had been faithfully redeemed. Now, with respect to the remedy proposed by the noble Duke. The remedy proposed took the form of a Royal Commission; but upon what assumption could the demand for such a Commission proceed? It could only proceed upon the assumption that neither from Parliament nor from the Government was there to be expected any such redress as that for which, said the noble Duke, the situation of the officers called. He (the Marquess of Lansdowne), on the other hand, contended that the War Department had always been prepared to deal with cases which came within the equity, but not within the letter, of the Act of 1871, and that the House of Commons had on several occasions been asked to provide compensation for officers who by a strict interpretation of the Act of Parliament were not entitled to it. Their Lordships were aware that by the Army Regulation Act, a limitation was put on the number of officers who might be allowed to sell out in any one year. When that limitation was found to work to the prejudice of those officers, it was without difficulty withdrawn, a similarly liberal concession had been made to the staff officers of pensioners, and he could give their Lordships other instances of individual officers who had been similarly treated by the Government. It seemed to him that if a case of individual and particular hardship were submitted to the responsible Department of the Government a remedy would be afforded. But he wished to ask this question—would it be a right thing to set a Royal Commission in motion to revise a settlement effected by a statute passed so recently as 1871?—because it was a revision of that settlement which the noble Duke's Motion aimed at. It was perfectly conceivable that the noble Duke might have asked for an independent inquiry into the measures taken by the Government to carry out the Act; but he sought to set aside the principle itself of the settlement of 1871. The noble Duke would pardon him for saying that not one of the cases mentioned by him in which a Royal Commission had been issued had the slightest bearing on the subject of his Motion. The noble Duke had mentioned that Royal Commissions had been issued to inquire into the operation of the Contagious Diseases Act, into Capital Punishment, into the sale of Excisable Liquors, into the operation of the Marriage Laws. Did the noble Duke seriously mean to contend for a moment that the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the Marriage Laws was any precedent for issuing a Royal Commission to re-open the great and important settlement made in 1871? Why, in no one of the cases instanced by the noble Duke had there been such a settlement as that which he now desired to disturb—a settlement between parties—between the officers of the Army on the one hand and the public on the other, as recipients and payers of the sums payable under the Act, for something like £2,000,000 had already been expended, or would shortly have been expended, subject to its provisions. Were all these awards to be re-opened and the whole of the financial arrangements consequent upon the abolition of Purchase to be re-cast without a sign of dissatisfaction on the part of the other House of Parliament which had made so liberal a provision in obedience to the Motion of the noble Duke and the request of the memorialists whose cause he supported? Then there was the precedent of Lord Cranworth's Commission. There was no resemblance whatever between that Commission and the Commission which might be appointed in compliance with the noble Duke's Motion. In the case of Lord Cran-worth's Commission a statutory guarantee had been given to certain officers, and an inquiry was instituted in order to ascertain whether as was alleged, warrants subsequently issued by the Government were or were not consistent with that guarantee. In the present case it was not the subsequent action of Government which was questioned, the noble Duke himself did not dispute the fairness of the interpretation placed by the Government and by the Army Purchase Commissioners on the provisions of the Act. It was the first principles of the Act itself which the noble Duke attacked, and which the memorialists objected to. Lord Cranworth's Commission told directly against the noble Duke. If he wished for a Commission analogous to that of Lord Cranworth he would not be opposed by the Government. They had no desire for an inquiry which could lead to little good; but if their conduct in carrying out the Act, or that of the Army Purchase Commissioners, or that of the Secretary of State, was impugned, they were prepared to abide the results of an investigation. Therefore he would not object to a Motion limited to this object; but if the noble Duke persisted in his present Motion, involving as it did a re-investigation of the principles of the Army Regulation Act, then the Government would resist, and would resist to the utmost, a course fatal to the proper administration of the affairs of the Army and perilously subversive of the authority of Parliament.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, I am bound to say something on this settlement, and also to say that nothing would induce me to utter one word on this occasion if it were not that I feel called upon to point out in the strongest manner to every Member of this House that anything more detrimental to the interests of the Army, to the interests of the service, or to the interests of the country, than to have a discontented set of officers it is impossible to conceive. Therefore, I hope, whatever your Lordships may decide—it is not my province to interfere in any political question—your Lordships will decide with the object of putting an end to that discontent which I am grieved to say I believe does exist. I think it is very much to be deplored that anything should engender among the officers of the Army a spirit of discontent which up to this moment, so far as I know, never has existed in the Army. So far as I am concerned, I should like to see an independent inquiry; but I must say that, in my opinion, an independent inquiry would at once put on one side the great bulk of the grievances of these officers. I think it would be deplorable if anything were now done to interfere with the Act. The Act was accepted by the country, and it must now be carried out in its integrity. Although I believe the bulk of these complaints would be eliminated by any tribunal which might undertake the task of inquiring into these grievances, there are minor points which, in my opinion, are entitled to an equitable consideration for the purpose of ascertaining whether they might not be brought within the intention with which the Act was passed;—for I do not suppose, nor can anybody suppose, that the Act was brought forward to do injustice to anyone. If injustice has been done in any individual case, I have no doubt a rectification would be most acceptable to the Government. Every endeavour has been made to meet the cases of those officers with regard to whom the Act has been found to work harshly. In one instance, where a clear case in equity had been made out in favour of a certain class of officers, the sum necessary to meet their case had been voted by the other House at the instance of Her Majesty's Government, and full justice had been done them. As I understand the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne), Her Majesty's Government intend to deal with every case of acknowledged hardship on the same principle, it will become my duty to bring all such cases under their notice—and I can only express an anxious hope that in every instance justice will be done. Since the passing of the Act it has been my anxious endeavour to carry out the intention of the Act in a spirit of fairness, and as far as possible to avoid all friction in its working. All I can say is, that in any case which may come to my knowledge where an officer has equitable claims to consideration I shall not shrink from bringing it under the notice of Her Majesty's Government, or from expressing my opinion as to how it should be dealt with. I must conclude these few observations by expressing a hope that the discussion that has taken place in your Lordships' House to-night may tend in a large measure to allay the discontent among certain of the officers, the existence of which I most deeply deplore as being highly injurious to the public service, and which I trust all those who possess influence amongst the officers will do their best to check and alleviate. I trust also that the officers themselves will feel satisfied when they more completely understand that their claims will be dealt with not so much according to the strict letter of the Act as according to justice and equity.

Viscount HARDINGE said, that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) had attempted to excuse the harshness of the Army Regulation Act, on the ground that its provisions had been agreed to by a considerable majority of the other House; but he appeared to forget that in passing the compensation clauses the Government majority had fallen from considerably over 100 to about 15 or 16. The noble Marquess had stated that the present discontent of the officers was merely a remnant of their old opposition to the abolition of the Purchase system; but whether that were the case or not, it was undoubted that the present discontent was bond fide and genuine. It was clear that the officers were not satisfied with the provisions of the Act. They felt that they had lost the interest of the money they had paid, as well as all prospect of the advancement and the other advantages they were certain to have obtained under the old system. As the illustrious Duke had remarked, those of the officers who were discontented with the working of the Act had a right to have their cases considered and their alleged grievances inquired into, and he trusted the Government would grant the inquiry. He had been greatly surprised at reading in the reports of what had occurred in the House of Commons the other night that Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Cardwell, in speaking on this subject, had said that if the officers were really aggrieved they had only to go to Victoria Street and get the money for their commissions. The fact that they did not do this was no proof whatever that they were not discontented with their position. A large number of officers, however discontented they might be, could not afford to sell their commissions, because they were too old to enter into any other profession, and would have no means of earning their living if they quitted the Army. The discontent among the officers was widespread and deeply-rooted, and after the speech of the illustrious Duke to-night it was impossible that an inquiry into their case could be longer refused. The noble Marquess had said that it would not do to alter the compensation clauses of the Act now, because by doing so the Estimates would be disarranged; —but was justice to the officers to be based solely upon the financial arrangements of the War Office? To show the opinion of eminent authorities on the subject, he would read the following extracts from letters which had been written by officers of high rank:—

"The officers of the Army feel that they are deprived of what, by every code of honour is theirs. This may be right or may be wrong, but it is the unanimous feeling of the Army. The effect of this continued agitation on the discipline of the Army is, and will be most disastrous, and I sincerely trust this prayer for an impartial tribunal may be successful. Every barrack-room is ringing with this question. I saw with pleasure the abolition of Purchase, and have seen no reason to change my opinion had the substitution been carried out equitably."

"That the dissatisfaction is widespread and deep-tongued there cannot be the slightest doubt, and the state of affairs is most damaging to the morale of the Army."

What the officers complained of was, not the abolition of Purchase, but the terms which had been offered to them, which they regarded as not being equitable under the circumstances. When the Bill abolishing Purchase was before the House he stated that, in his opinion, the fairest mode of proceeding would be to pay the regulation money down and to give the over-regulation money on retirement. Another suggestion then made was that the interest of the purchase money should be paid and the money itself when an officer left the Army. Neither of those suggestions had, however, been adopted, and the officers were sufferers in that respect—as well as by the abolition of the system of exchanges, which they looked upon as a great boon. He begged leave to tell the noble Marquess that the officers of our Army did not conjure up imaginary grievances—that they were able, conscientious, and honest, and that they were men who would not put their hands to anything which they did not thoroughly believe and understand. He wished merely to add the expression of his satisfaction that after the speech of the illustrious Duke on the cross-benches the House could have little doubt as to the vote which it would give on the present occasion. If we desired to have an efficient Army we must take care that it was a contented one.

VISCOMTE TEMPLETOWN said, he felt that he would be wanting in a sense of duty if he failed to bear testimony to the fact that in the district in which he commanded, great discontent prevailed among officers of all ranks. Strict measures were taken to prevent the soldier from making any representations with regard to an increase of pay; and when that was so Parliament ought surely not to refuse to take steps to protect that which was the property of the officer—the value of his commission. He hoped the House would not forget that it had it now in its power to do something which would greatly tend to promote satisfaction in the Army and to remove the existing discontent.

THE MARQUESS OF HERTFORD said, he could not but regret that the Government had not thought fit to assent to the proposal for the issue of a Commission. He would fully confirm the statement that great discontent prevailed among the officers, and expressed it to be his belief that the Government did not even yet really understand all that was involved in the abolition of Purchase. Considering that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) had never been in the Army, he had spoken with great ability on the question; but it was evident that the Government was only now arriving at a due sense of the fact that the Army was a very complicated and delicate piece of machinery, which they had been pulling about for the amusement of the more Radical section of their supporters—extremely to the annoyance of the officers—and which they were beginning heartily to regret they had not let alone. He (the Marquess of Hertford) had always maintained that the abolition of Purchase affected the poor officer even more than the rich; and when the Bill was before the House he had produced the letters of 20 or 30 old officers who had been promoted from the ranks, almost everyone of whom was opposed to the Government measure, and which letters he had forwarded to Lord Northbrook, but without result. Out of the 2,245 officers who complained that they had been aggrieved, he believed a great number would be found who had not paid a farthing for their commissions, but would never have allowed themselves to be promoted were it not for the prospective advantages which had been held out to them by the Warrant of 1866. He was, he might add, informed that there was at the present moment the greatest difficulty in getting adjutants from the ranks in cavalry regiments. One of the provisions of the Warrant of 1866 was that a captain retiring should receive £1,800, and, if he rose to be a major, and finally a lieutenant colonel, £4,500, and many a captain had allowed himself to be superseded by his juniors in the hope of obtaining promotion by death vacancy or augmentation, and of then selling what he had never bought. But by the new Act, under no circumstances, whether he went now, or 20 years hence, would an officer ever be allowed to receive more than the £1,800, instead of the £4,500, the value of his Commission being no longer cumulative. Further, the poor officer was prevented from exchanging either from full pay to half-pay, or from half-pay to full pay, or from one regiment to another. The sub-lieutenant of infantry who came from the ranks had not the prospective advantages he formerly enjoyed, while his pay was very inadequate—namely, £95 16s. 3d., his necessary expenses at the most moderate computation amounting to no less than £115 15s. 1d. He did not see how they could ever again get non-commissioned officers to accept promotion from the ranks under the present rate of pay, or how they could secure the services of the sons of poor clergymen and other professional men—the very classes they wished to obtain for the Army. Now, that the conditions under which poor men entered the service had been so much altered, he was convinced the Government would find that they must increase the pay of officers. The purchase sub-lieutenant who entered before that Act was passed had probably borrowed money to enter into the service, and also on going abroad with his regiment to insure his life. Such an officer, it was evident was even worse off than the poor man who was shown to have only £95 a-year; although his expenses amounted to £115. The pay was positively not sufficient to defray their necessary regimental expenses, leaving out uniforms and family expenses. Was it singular, then, that there should be discontent in the Army? The purchase officers, more particularly from the majors downwards, complained that the Government were actually in possession of their money, which money was being kept to keep up a fictitious promotion. In five or six years' time, however, there would and must be a stagnation. Could their Lordships wonder, then, if the officers were without hope? Whether or not the Government, in consequence of their Lordships' vote that evening, granted a Royal Commission, he appealed to them to treat the Army with far more consideration and justice than they had hitherto done. By doing so they might, perhaps, lose the support of their extreme and advanced followers; but, on the other hand, they would earn the gratitude of the Army, and also, he believed, the approval of the country. There was the same chivalry and high sentiment in the Army as was displayed at Waterloo and at Inkerman; but men who entered the service liked to cherish the idea that if they imperilled life and limb, and underwent any hardship in the discharge of their duty, they did it not for the War Office, but for their Queen and country.

Viscount Hardinge

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, the Motion before the House was confined to the grievances of officers consequent on the abolition of Purchase; but the noble Marquess who had just sat down (the Marquess of Hertford) had referred to various matters of complaint which had little or nothing at all to do with that measure. The noble and gallant Lord who commanded the Southern district (Viscount Templetown) said that it was undoubtedly that great dissatisfaction existed among the officers of the Army, and that it was most desirable that that dissatisfaction should be put an end to; but his noble and gallant Friend neither stated from what that dissatisfaction arose, nor did he state to what extent he believed it to be well founded. With regard to the non-purchase officers of the Line, their case was met by the regulation of the Act of 1871 under which they were to receive £100 for every year of foreign service, and £50 for every year of home service. The noble Duke who brought forward the present Motion said he would be content to rest his case on the fact that discontent existed in the Army. But what was the nature of the grievances of the officers? His noble Friend the (Marquess of Lansdowne) had been obliged to pick out of the memorials the grounds of complaint which he supposed, if the inquiry were granted, would be urged, but the Motion did not show what causes of complaint existed. As for the precedent relied on by the noble Duke, the Motion proposed by Colonel Lindsay in the House of Commons in 1863 distinctly stated the grounds for the discontent that then existed among certain officers; whereas the noble Duke might content himself with saying that discontent existed, but he did not attempt to say what cause there was for it. Nothing could be more unfortunate than widespread discontent among the officers; but as a matter of fact a great portion of the complaints were, as remarked by the illustrious Duke (the Duke of Cambridge), of a minor and comparatively unimportant character, and it had been shown that many of them did not spring from the abolition of Purchase. One complaint was that the post of commanding officer of a battalion had been made terminable; but such complaints were occasionally preferred before the abolition of Purchase, and indeed formed one of the strongest arguments against its continuance. Lord Dalhousie, whose absence he regretted, and who did not advocate the abolition of Purchase, always laid down that officers had no vested rights of that kind which they could urge against measures required for the improvement of the Service, and it would be dangerous now to admit claims which during the existence of Purchase were uniformly denied by the military authorities and the War Department. He knew too well the character of the officers to doubt that they felt they had distinct complaints; but they had not drawn a distinction between grievances attendant on the abolition of Purchase and those arising from alterations required in the interests of the Service, and from the changes going on everywhere in military systems. The noble Duke had also aduced an argument of another kind—he stated that the discontent not only prevailed in the mess room, but had extended to the barrack room. That was a very grave statement; but he ventured to think that it was one in respect of which it would be very difficult to produce any evidence, nor if the Motion were adopted could any grievances but those of the officers be inquired into. His noble Friend (the Marquess of Lansdowne) had been represented as saying that the opening of this question would interfere with the financial arrangements of the War Office; but all that he had said was that if compensation were given it would be necessary to reopen the case of the officers, to whom something over £2,000,000 had been already paid. His noble Friend distinctly said that Mr. Cardwell had, in several instances gone beyond the law and entered into the equity of the case, and that in no instance had he experienced any difficulty in obtaining the sanction of the Treasury and of the House of Commons to the payment of an increased sum, and it had been distinctly stated by the illustrious Duke the Commander-in-Chief, and by the noble Marquess who spoke on behalf of the Secretary for War, that Mr. Cardwell would continue to give the most equitable consideration to any such cases which might be brought before him by the illustrious Duke. He had understood the illustrious Duke to express no opinion on the course he should adopt on this occasion, but to express a hope that their Lordships would take the course most calculated to allay any discontent which might exist among the officers, and he (the Marquess of Ripon) concurred most cordially in the expression of that desire. At the same time he asked their Lordships not to agree to this Motion, not only because the Government were quite willing to take every step in their power to allay any discontent arising from reasonable causes, but also because if their Lordships adopted this vague Motion, which did not define or confine the matters to be inquired into, they would give rise to large and unfounded expectations which it would be impossible to gratify, and thus, instead of allaying, they would only increase any discontent that might exist.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND, in reply, said, he was fully justified in pressing the Motion by the statement of the illustrious Duke, which nobody acquainted with the Army could dispute, that discontent existed. The person more eminently qualified than any other to describe the feeling of the Army had told their Lordships in unmistakeable terms that discontent existed among the officers. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) had taken him to task for not having entered into the details of the grievances alleged by the officers. But he had a perfect answer to this. In the first place, he thought it extremely irregular and inconvenient for the noble Marquess who represented the War Department to have quoted from documents which were not before the House, and to which there was no possibility of his obtaining access. The complaints had been addressed to the illustrious Duke the Commander-in-Chief, and he should have thought it the height of impertinence to have knocked at the door of His Royal Highness and asked permission to inspect the documents in order to support the view which he was putting before their Lordships. To have done this would have been to put the Commander-in-Chief in a position in which he ought not to be put by any Member of their Lordships' House. It had been urged that it was out of order to ask for a Royal Commission to inquire into the operation of an Act of Parliament. But in answer to this he would call to their Lordships' recollection the fact that in 1870 a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the operation of the Contagious Diseases Act, which had been passed in the previous year. It was not with any view to obtain a decision in favour of the re-enactment of Purchase in the Army that he had brought this question forward—he should as soon think of obtaining a re-enactment of the Corn Laws by the issuing of a Royal Commission to inquire into the operation of the Act of Parliament which repealed them—he had brought the question forward because he believed that the officers had a substantial grievance to complain of, and on the grounds which he had stated he asked their Lordships to accede to the Motion for an Address.

LORD STRATHNAIRN supported the Motion. He believed that the officers of the Army had many and great grievances to complain of, arising out of the abolition of Purchase—that they had made out a good case for inquiry, and that the facts and arguments in favour of the issue of a Royal Commission had not been answered.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents, 129; Not Contents, 46; Majority, 88.

Resolved in the Affirmative:—Ordered, That the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

CONTENTS.

Beaufort, D.	Waldegrave, E.
Buckingham and Chandos, D.	Westmoreland, E.
Leeds, D.	Wicklow, E.
Northumberland, D.	Clancarty, V. ( E. Clancarty. )
Richmond, D.	Falmouth, V.
Somerset, D.	Gordon, V. ( E. Aberdeen. )
Wellington, D.	Hardinge, V.
Bath, M.	Hawarden, V. [ Toller. ]
Bristol, M.	Hood, V.
Bute, M.	Sidmouth, V.
Hertford, M.	Strathallan, V.
Salisbury, M.	Templetown, V.
Winchester, M.	Arundell of Wardour, L.
Abergavenny, E.	Aveland, L.
Airkie, E.	Bagot, L.
Amherst, E.	Bateman, L.
Aylesford, E.	Branceth, L. ( V. Boyne. )
Bantry, E.	Brodrick, L. ( V. Middleton. )
Carnarvon, E.	Cairns, L.
Cawdor, E.	Calthorpe, L.
Dartmouth, E.	Carrington, L.
Denbigh, E.	Chelmsford, L.
Derby, E.	Charnbrassill, L. ( E. Roden. )
Devon, E.	Clement, L. ( E. Leitrim. )
Doneaster, E. ( D. Buckingham and Queenberry. )	Cloncurry, L.
Faversham, E.	Colchester, L.
Fortescue, E.	Colonsay, L.
Gainsborough, E.	Colville of Culross, L.
Harewood, E.	Crofton, L.
Harrington, E.	Delamere, L.
Howe, E.	De L'Isle and Dudley, L.
Ilchester, E.	De Saumarez, L.
Lanesborough, E.	Digby, L.
Leven and Melville, E.	Dormer, L.
Lichfield, E.	Dunmore, L. ( E. Dunmore. )
Lonsdale, E.	Dunsany, L.
Lucan, E.	Ellenborough, L.
Macclesfield, E.	Elphinstone, L.
Malmesbury, E.	Fisherwick, L. ( M. Donegal. )
Manfield, E.	Foxford, L. ( E. Limerick. )
Manvers, E.	Gifford, L.
Nelson, E.	Gormanston, L. ( V. Gormanston. )
Powis, E.
Rosse, E.
Roslyn, E.
Selkirk, E.
Strabroke, E.
Strange, E. ( D. Athol. )
Verulam, E.

Hartismere, L. (L. Henniker.)
 Heytesbury, L.
 Howard de Walden, L.
 Hylton, L.
 Keane, L.
 Kenlis, L. (M. Headfort.)
 Ker, L. (M. Lothian.)
 Kesteven, L.
 Leconfield, L.
 Lismore, L. (V. Lismore.)
 Lovel and Holland, L. (E. Egmont.)
 Lyttelton, L.
 Manners, L.
 Monson, L.
 O'Neill, L.
 Oranmore and Browne, L.
 Penrhyn, L.
 Raglan, L.
 Ranfurly, L. (E. Ranfurly.)

Bededale, L.
 Rivers, L.
 Saltoun, L.
 Sheffield, L. (E. Shiffield.)
 Silchester, L. (E. Longford.)
 Sinclair, L.
 Skelmersdale, L. [Teller.]
 Sondes, L.
 Stewart of Garlies, L. (E. Galloway.)
 Stratheden, L.
 Strathairn, L.
 Strathpey, L. (E. Sleaford.)
 Templemore, L.
 Tauris, L.
 Vernon, L.
 Vivian, L.
 Walsingham, L.
 Wigan, L. (E. Crawford and Balcarres.)
 Wynford, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Selborne, L. (L. Chancellor.)
 Saint Albans, D.
 Ailesbury, M.
 Lansdowne, M.
 Ripon, M.
 Westminster, M.
 Camperdown, E.
 Chichester, E.
 Cowper, E.
 Essex, E.
 Granville, E.
 Kimberley, E.
 Morley, E.
 Canterbury, V.
 Eversley, V.
 Halifax, V.
 Sydney, V.
 Torrington, V.
 Barrogill, L. (E. Caithness.)
 Boyle, L. (E. Cork and Orrery.) [Teller.]
 Camoys, L.
 Carew, L.

De Mauley, L.
 Eliot, L.
 Foley, L.
 Gwydir, L.
 Hanmer, L.
 Hare, L. (E. Listowel.)
 Hatherley, L.
 Hatherton, L.
 Kenmare, L. (E. Kenmare.)
 Kildare, L. (M. Kildare.)
 Meredith, L. (L. Athlumney.)
 Methuen, L.
 Mostyn, L.
 O'Hagan, L.
 Poltimore, L. [Teller.]
 Ponsonby, L. (E. Bessborough.)
 Robartes, L.
 Rosebery, L. (E. Rosebery.)
 Seaton, L.
 Stanley of Alderley, L.
 Sundridge, L. (D. Argyll.)
 Waveney, L.
 Wenlock, L.
 Wrottesley, L.

AGRICULTURAL CHILDREN BILL.
(no. 220-221.)

COMMONS AMENDMENT CONSIDERED.

Commons Amendment to Lords Amendments and Commons Reasons for disagreeing to one of the Amendments made by the Lords considered (according to Order).

Clause 8 (Power to suspend temporarily restrictive provisions of Act) omitted by the Lords; re-inserted by the Commons.

Lord HENNIKER proposed to agree to the re-instatement of the clause, but to disagree to the Commons Amendment to the new Clause B, inserted by their Lordships, with one exception—namely, to omit the words “hay-harvest” from the new clause.

The MARQUESS OF SALISBURY thought the power should comprehend the period of the hay as well as of the corn-harvest. He thought, however, it would be best to adhere to their Lordships’ original decisions and omit the clause altogether.

After a few words from The Earl of KINNAULY,

On Question, whether to insist? Resolved in the Negative.

The Amendment to which the Commons have disagreed not insisted on; The Commons Amendment to Lords Amendment disagreed to; and a Committee appointed to prepare Reasons to be offered to the Commons for the Lords disagreeing to the said Amendment; The Committee to meet To-morrow, at Five o’clock.

UNCONSTITUTIONAL LANGUAGE — NOTTINGHAM LIBERAL DINNER.
QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: I rise for the purpose of putting a Question to the noble Duke opposite, the Captain of the Yeomen of the Guard, relative to certain language which has been attributed to him, as having been used at a dinner over which he presided during the past week. I have carefully examined the different accounts of what took place on that occasion which appeared in various newspapers, and I scarcely think that the expressions attributed to the noble Duke in those accounts are incorrect. In anticipation that the noble Duke will not be able to contradict those accounts I will venture to protest in the strongest manner against the way in which he is stated to have introduced Her Majesty’s name in the course of his speech. I cannot conceive anything more irregular, more unconstitutional, or, happily, more uncommon than the language attributed to him. Upon all festive occasions in this country it is the invariable custom for the loyalty of Englishmen to be displayed by drinking the health of Her Majesty the Queen, and that toast is on all occasions and in all societies received with the loyalty and acclamation which the character of Her Majesty demands that it should be received with. But on the occasion to which I refer, of a Liberal dinner held by a Liberal club—possibly in anticipation of a not far distant Dissolution of Parliament—the noble Duke (the Duke of St. Albans) presided over the banquet as President of the club. He was supported by a noble Earl, who spoke on the occasion, but to whose speech I shall not allude further than to remark that it partook too much of a personal character, and gave a detailed statement with regard to various Members of your Lordships' House in no very elegant language. But the noble Duke was also supported by a Cabinet Minister who appears to have gone down specially for the occasion; and it appears also that other Cabinet Ministers were expected, but that various duties detained them in town. The intention of one of these Cabinet Ministers to attend the dinner was defeated by his having to give evidence before a Committee of the other House of Parliament, which was appointed to inquire into the conduct of the Department over which he presides, in connection with the Zanzibar Mail contract. Under these circumstances, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was unable to visit the county which had the honour of giving him birth. The noble Duke, in proposing the health of Her Majesty, said—

"I may remind you that her earliest impressions on Government were guided by the great Liberal leader of the day—Lord Melbourne—and she is supposed never to have forgotten the principles and party of her teacher."

Although I do not want to make too much of this matter, I feel bound to say that statement is an insult to the Queen. If there is one point in Her Majesty's character which has been more often alluded to than another, and for which she is more remarkable than any other—and if there is one point in her character which has been referred to by Prime Minister after Prime Minister in both this and the other House of Parliament—it is this, that it does not signify what party is in power; whether Liberal or Conservative, the Ministry of the day have the undivided confidence of the Sovereign; and that nothing of any kind ever escapes from Her Majesty which would enable the party in power to know what her political opinions are. From the time she first ascended the Throne until the present moment Her Majesty has always acted in a constitutional manner, and therefore I must most earnestly protest against the assumption that by any act or deed on her part the political opinions of Her Majesty have become known. Under these circumstances, I feel bound to say that the statement of the noble Duke was an insult to the Queen, and that it is most irregular and unconstitutional to couple her name with that of any party, however respectable. I beg to ask the noble Duke the Question which stands in my name—namely, Whether the following is a correct report of expressions attributed to him in proposing the Queen's health at a dinner at Nottingham:—

"I may remind you, that her earliest impressions on Government, were guided by the great Liberal leader of the day, Lord Melbourne, and she is supposed never to have forgotten the principles and party of her teacher."

THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS: The noble Duke deprecates Her Majesty's name being brought into political discussions, and to carry out his principle he has brought up in Parliament words spoken by me at a political dinner in a provincial town. Your Lordships can decide on the consistency of the course he has adopted. He has correctly stated my words in giving "The Queen!" on that occasion. They were unnecessary to secure the reception and acceptance of her health with every mark of loyalty and respect; but, as is the usual custom, I sought for appropriate remarks in proposing this toast. I therefore thought, and still think by the facts of the case, I was justified in my allusion to Lord Melbourne. It is a just cause of congratulation to the party to which I belong that an accident of time and circumstances should have given to one of our most eminent leaders the opportunity of being the first adviser of Her Majesty when, in her early youth, she began the long and successful reign which has been attended with so many blessings to this country, and which has marked her place in history as the most constitutional Sovereign who has ruled in England. The manner in which Lord Melbourne performed the task, his devotion to her honour, and the care which he bestowed on her political education in constitutional doctrines are matters of history. They were acknowledged at the time by no one with more warmth and cordiality than by the late Duke of Wellington, who, in the course of the debate on the Address in answer to the Queen's Speech in 1841, said—

"I am willing to admit that the noble Viscount has rendered the greatest possible service to Her Majesty. I happen to know that it is Her Majesty's opinion that the noble Viscount has rendered Her Majesty the greatest possible service in making her acquainted with the mode and policy of the Government of this country, initiating her into the laws and spirit of the constitution, independently of the performance of his duty as the servant of Her Majesty's Crown—teaching her, in short, to preside over the destinies of this great country."

[3 Hansard, lxx. 77.]

I do not mean anything personal to the noble Duke in saying I thought it well to have this high authority before using these words—on the principle of the American carpenter who was called as a witness in a case of assault and battery. He was asked how far was the defendant off when he advanced to strike the blow—"4 ft. 11½ in., Sir." "Why, you seem to be very accurate. How is it possible you can be so exact?" "Why, Sir, in case some fool might ask me the question, I went and measured the distance."

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, the noble Duke says, in effect, that he has prepared this extract in case any fool should ask him a Question such as I have done. I do not suppose that the noble Duke in interposing this American anecdote intended to be personal—I am, of course, in the hands of your Lordships in such a matter as this—but I should wish to know whether that is a proper mode of replying to a Question put by a Member of your Lordships' House. In my remarks I carefully avoided everything calculated to give offence; but the noble Duke, by the terms in which he answers my Question, leads it to be believed that he has been asked the Question by a fool. I leave it to your Lordships to say whether I am one or not.

THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS: My Lords, I did not intend that the anecdote I quoted should apply personally and in an offensive manner to the noble Duke. It appears to me a matter of praise that Her Majesty has "never forgotten" nor departed from the constitutional principles which it was Lord Melbourne's endeavour to instil into her youthful mind. I do not see that my words can be fairly taken to mean that Her Majesty is a partisan. It may have been an error on my part to have made use of the word "party". On referring to a very usual book of reference called Maunder's Biographical Treasury, under the head "Melbourne, Viscount," I find the following statement—

"In 1837 Lord Melbourne's Government, which had become gradually weakened by the attacks of a powerful majority in the Upper House and the hostility of a growing and powerful minority in the Lower, gained new strength from the accession of Queen Victoria, whose personal sympathies, it was alleged, were enlisted in favour of the party then in power."

I hope, however, your Lordships will consider it a venial fault to mention that, unlike some of her predecessors, Her Majesty has remembered and acted up to the popular views of her youth, while she has behaved with admirable impartiality and fairness to men of all parties in the State whose services Her Majesty has required. I have to thank the noble Duke for the opportunity he has afforded me of explaining any misconception my words may have conveyed, and for kindly attracting so public a notice to the late Liberal meeting in Nottingham, over which I had the honour to preside.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The noble Duke (the Duke of St. Albans) instead of exculpating himself from the charge which was brought against him, appears to me to have repeated the offence by calling his adversary a fool. I do not know to what extent the Ministers of the Crown consider they are responsible for what their subordinates may say—but when I heard that quotation from Maunder—a very suggestive word—brought up by the noble Duke, I fully expected some Cabinet Minister would have risen in his place to call him to Order, and that we should not be blamed for objecting to language in which Her Majesty is described as a partisan. The rule, my Lords, which almost invariably prevents the use of such language, is one which is just not only to Parliament but to the Queen, because she cannot answer these accusations. It may be true or false—we believe it to be thoroughly true—that the Queen has the most perfect appreciation in the performance of her duties of that which becomes her as a Constitutional Sovereign. But when one of those who hold a place in her Government accuses her of the contrary conduct, her mouth is closed and she cannot repudiate the charge. I feel the danger of a practice which if it extended to the higher ranks of the Government would assume a much more serious character than it does in the present instance. If this sort of thing is done in the case of one Sovereign it will be done in the case of another; and are we, I would ask, to take it as a rule for our future guidance that it will be fair at any future time to charge any future Sovereign with having adopted all the opinions of any statesman or party whom he might have honoured with his friendship or acquaintance in his youth? If any such course is pursued it may be a great libel on that Sovereign. I feel it, my Lords, very difficult to comment on this extraordinary dinner at which the noble Duke presided, because all the guests there appear to have dwelt in an enchanted land, and to have been entirely confused by something that I will not attempt to define. My noble Friend opposite, who represents the Board of Trade in this House (Earl Cowper)—than whom there could scarcely be a more calm and sagacious representative of the Government—felt himself tempted to indulge in some very remarkable phraseology with respect to Members of your Lordships' House, whether belonging to the Liberal or the Conservative party; but the word which he used was somewhat more elegant than that which has just now been applied by the noble Duke to my noble Friend behind me. But the noble Duke at this dinner made some other startling observations. He told the country that the House of Lords was divided into two classes—those who attended the debates and voted according to their convictions, and those who were brought down to the House from time to time and voted as they were told. I did not at first see who it was that used this language. I thought it must be the utterance of some unruly guest who was referring to the subordinate Members of the Government in the House of Lords. I believe they are the only Members of the House whose convictions by some miraculous intervention invariably coincide with the decisions of others in which they have themselves no concern. I found, however, on looking more attentively at the Report, that the remarks of the noble Duke were intended to be applied principally to those who sit on the Conservative side of the House. It is a favourite topic with noble Lords opposite that the Conservative party have a large majority within these walls, and that the decisions of your Lordships are come to by a blind majority at the back of my noble Friend the leader of the Opposition. I would however, remind the House, in the case of a critical division, 10 years ago, on the subject of the Danish War, the Conservative majority turned out to be nine, and that since that time the present Prime Minister has added 28 Members to this House; so that if you deduct 28 from nine you have the Conservative majority. The truth, I suppose, is, after the exhibition of this evening, that the Conservative party generally do carry out those Constitutional principles which Lord Melbourne recommended to Her Majesty, while those who were brought up under him do not continue to support them. I wish also to call attention to another point in the speech of the noble Duke—but he so seldom indulges in this refined epigrammatical style of speaking that I fear he may not have followed the proceedings in this House with great attention. I am afraid that I may be looked upon as one of those who are brought down here to vote as they are told; because he complained to the Nottingham dinner party that the Conservative party had not resisted a Bill brought forward by noble Lords opposite on its second and third readings in this House. Now, the noble Duke could not have been acquainted with the facts, or he would not have made the assertion. It is perfectly true that we found it hopeless to resist the second reading of the Bill in question. But we fought hard against its provisions in Committee for a whole night, and the irresistible Conservative majority was beaten. Though, therefore, it is literally true that we did not resist the second or third reading, the noble Duke has, nevertheless, been guilty of a suggestio falsi, because we resisted the Bill in Committee, not because it was hostile to the licensed victuallers, but because we objected to it on principle. I now hope that when any portion of the Body-Guard of the Government is in future retained to storm the provinces—and it is a remarkable fact that not a single independent Peer attended on the present occasion—they will abstain from representing the proceedings of this House and those who are opposed to them in politics in a way which will not bear criticism. Some of us may be fools and others may be bores; but that fact need not be openly proclaimed in every borough which Her Majesty's Government may desire to conciliate. Another observation which was made at the dinner was that the irresistible majority of which the noble Duke was speaking put forward inferior men in debate, and that the leaders did not take the trouble to explain their own policy. All this is really very hard on us who sit on this bench. My noble Friend near me is called a fool, and he is besides designated as an "inferior man," because he generally supports his own policy, and I, who in a humble way pursue the same system, must take my rank by his side in the list which has been assigned us. I am sure, however, there is no more mistaken charge which can be brought against my noble Friend and those who sit near him than that they shrink from supporting, on all possible occasions, the measures they approve. I sincerely hope that the next time the House of Lords is toasted there will be no Member of the Government present to respond for it, because otherwise I do not see how the character of this House is to be maintained.

EARL COWPER said, he had perhaps used an unfortunate expression on the occasion to which the noble Marquess referred, and he would not repeat it. He would remind the noble Marquess, however, that when the Petition signed by a certain number—450 he believed—of clergymen in favour of confession was under discussion a few days ago, he himself had spoken of the number of fools among the clergy as probably not being greater than were to be found in either House of Parliament.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY explained that he had said that these were only  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent of the clergy, and that  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent of folly was not greater than might be found in Parliament; but he had left it in doubt whether there was the greater amount of folly in that or in the other House of Parliament.

EARL COWPER said, he did not wish to retract what he had said, but wanted the House to know fairly what it was he had said. He stated that their Lordships' House might be viewed in two aspects—first, there were the ordinary nights when certain noble Lords who devoted themselves to politics came down to attend to the public business, and next there were the great occasions when noble Lords appeared whose faces were not so familiar and were not seen there at other times, but who then gave their votes, and it so happened that a large majority of them were Conservatives. That statement of his rested on evidence which was open to the whole world—the published records of their Lordships' Votes and Proceedings. If, therefore, it was erroneous, the whole country could judge of its error; but he believed that it was correct.

House adjourned at Nine o'clock, 'till to morrow, Eleven o'clock.

H O U S E O F C O M M O N S ,

Monday, 21st July, 1873.

MINUTES.] — NEW WRIT ISSUED — For Stafford (Eastern Division), v. John Robinson McClean, esquire, deceased.

PUBLIC BILLS.—First Reading—Public Schools (Eton College Property)* [251]; Gas and Water Works Facilities Act (1870) Amendment* [252].

Second Reading—Crown Private Estates [223]; Endowed Schools Act (1869) Amendment [207].

Second Reading—Committee—Report—Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment [162-253]. Committee—Report—Ecclesiastical Commissioners* [234]; Extradition Act (1870) Amendment* [220]. Considered as amended—Supreme Court of Judicature [237].

Third Reading—Rating (Liability and Value) [260]; Local Government Board (Ireland) Provisional Order Confirmation (No. 2)* [229], and passed.

Withdrawn—Land Settlement* [80]; Union of Benefices (re-comm.)* [92]; Registration of Births and Deaths* [180]; Municipal Officers Superannuation* [6].

ARMY—THE GENERAL COMMANDING IN IRELAND.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Secretary of State for War, If it be not the fact that the Commander-in-Chief of the Forces in Ireland has been absent from duty about fifteen months out of the last thirty; and, if not, how many; whether, during all that absence, he was allowed to draw command allowance and table allowance while the duties and expenses for which these allowances are made devolved on others; and, whether, since this question was first asked, the accounts containing these allowances have been examined over the above period in order to ascertain the facts; and whether they have been found in order?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, the General Commanding in Ireland had been absent from Ireland the time mentioned. His absence was occasioned partly by professional duty in England, partly by attendance in Parliament, and partly by sick leave. His pay and allowances had been drawn by him. The Accountant General had, however, raised objections to certain portions of them, extending over the years 1871-2 and 1872-3, and these objections were the subject of a Correspondence not yet concluded.

MR. ANDERSON: I shall move for the production of the Correspondence when completed.

LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANIES' ACT, 1870 —LIFE ASSURANCE OFFICES RETURNS.—QUESTION.

SIR. FREDERICK W. HEYGATE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been directed to the imperfect nature of the Returns made by Life Assurance Offices under the provisions of the Act of 1870, particularly in regard to the Fifth Schedule of the Act; and, whether it is not possible to enforce a more strict compliance with the Act?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: Sir, I should demur to the phrase that the Returns made under the Act are imperfect. From the Returns made, it is possible, without difficulty, for any person conversant with the principles of life assurance to form a sound judgment as to the conditions of the offices. It is hopeless by any compilation of figures to do more than this, or to enable persons unacquainted with the science of accounts and life assurance to form such a judgment. It is very possible that the form of Return might be improved in some respects; but I believe the present forms were settled after having been discussed by the Institute of Actuaries, the highest authority in such matters in the kingdom. As to enforcing a more strict compliance with the Act, that is again begging the question. The Companies are only required by the Act to make Returns in forms prescribed, and the Board of Trade has used to the utmost such powers as it has, of enforcing a strict compliance with the forms prescribed, and has endeavoured by every means in its power to secure uniformity. I am aware that the Schedules would, in some respects, admit of improvement, especially the fifth Schedule, in respect to the valuation of the "Office premium" and the net premiums—the present form not suiting the case of every Company. But, on the whole, the Act has worked well, although it may be expedient hereafter to see whether it cannot be improved. We have, as yet, only had the experience of two years' Returns.

THE MAURITIUS—ECCLESIASTICAL ESTABLISHMENTS.
QUESTIONS.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any reply has been sent to the Despatch of the Acting Governor of Mauritius, (dated 2nd May 1872), submitting Petitions to Her Majesty from the representatives of the Anglican Church and the Roman Catholic Bishop against the Ecclesiastical scheme proposed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies; and, if not, whether the Secretary of State proposes to assent to the suggestions embodied in those Petitions; or, if no decision has yet been arrived at by him, he will direct that no changes in the Ecclesiastical arrangements of the Colony shall be pressed until the subject shall have been discussed in Parliament?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: Sir, having considered the Memorials upon the subject received from the colony, Her Majesty's Government have determined not to proceed further with the measures they had proposed with a view to remove the inequalities between the different religious communions. It is right I should add, that we cannot consent that the total amount of money voted for ecclesiastical purposes in the colony should be increased. I wish also to take this opportunity of correcting an error into which I inadvertently fell in speaking upon a kindred subject on Tuesday last. I stated that in St. Lucia, with some 30,000 Roman Catholics and 2,000 Protestants of all denominations, the endowments of the former were £900, and the Church of England £800. I had mistaken the purport of a despatch that £400 was received by two Anglican clergymen. It is not £400 each, but the total endowment is £400; so that the inequality is less than I imagined, though still great.

MAJOR ARBUTHNOT inquired whether matters had remained in status quo?

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, no further steps had been taken.

UNION OF BENEFICES BILL. BILL WITHDRAWN.

MR. CANDLISH asked the right honourable the Member for Cambridge University, If he intends to proceed further with the Union of Benefices Bill this Session?

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE, in reply, said, that it was not his intention to proceed further with this Bill during this Session, but that he should re-introduce it next year. He would take that opportunity of moving that the Order for the Adjourned Debate upon going into Committee on the Bill should be discharged.

Motion agreed to.

Order discharged; Bill withdrawn.

METROPOLIS—SMALL-POX HOSPITAL AT HATCHAM.—QUESTION.

MR. WATNEY asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he is aware that ten acres of land adjoining the New Cross Road, Hatcham, has been bought by the Metropolitan Asylums Board for the purpose of erecting temporary hospitals in the event of small-pox or any epidemic fever again occurring in the Metropolis; and, whether he will take any steps to prevent a hospital of this description being placed in the midst of such a densely populated neighbourhood?

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

MR. STANFIELD, in reply, said, about nine acres of land adjoining the New Cross Road, Hatcham, had been purchased by the Metropolitan Asylums Board for the purpose of erecting, in case it should be needed, a temporary small-pox hospital. The site was conveniently contiguous to the population who were likely to require such a hospital, and at the same time it was sufficiently isolated to prevent the spread of contagion. According to the information he had received, the site was admirably adapted for the purpose for which it had been acquired, and it had been favourably reported on by the Inspector of the Local Government Board.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS—ENGLAND AND IRELAND.—QUESTIONS.

MR. DELAHUNTY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, under legislative enactments, the Public Works Loan Commissioners, with the sanction of Her Majesty's Treasury, are enabled to grant loans bearing interest at 3*1/2* per cent. per annum to local authorities in England to obtain water supplies for their respective districts; whether the Board of Public Works in Ireland, with the sanction of the Treasury, are enabled to grant similar loans at 4 per cent. per annum to local authorities in Ireland for like purposes; and, whether the Treasury has not this year fixed 5 per cent. as the rate to be charged on a loan recommended by the Irish Board to be made to the Municipal Corporation of Waterford for their water supply; and, if so, whether he will state the reasons or motives for charging loans for sanitary purposes in Ireland with a rate of interest nearly fifty per cent. in excess of similar loans in England?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have to answer the first three Questions put by the hon. Gentleman in the affirmative. As to the fourth Question, I may state that we have not the power by law of charging for waterworks in Ireland the same rate of interest as is now allowed in England—namely, 3*1/2* per cent. The general rule in such cases is to charge 5 per cent., with a rather long period for the repayment of the principal; but it is in the power of the Treasury to charge 4 per cent., with a shorter period for repayment. After taking the best advice, we thought this was not a case in which we ought to deviate from the ordinary rule that has hitherto been adopted in regard to the matter.

MR. DELAHUNTY said, he wished to be informed whether the time for repayment was not 50 years in England, whereas in Ireland it was only 22 years?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he really did not know.

MR. DELAHUNTY said, that in consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, he should on an early day ask whether the Treasury were justified in charging 5 per cent for loans in Ireland, when they were allowed to lend money on loan at 4 per cent in England?

IRELAND—ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.—QUESTION.

MR. KAVANAGH asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, having provided by the Supplementary Estimates for an increase of pay to the Men of the Royal Irish Constabulary, Her Majesty's Government were prepared to take any steps towards adopting the Recommendations of the Commissioners in favour of the Commissioned Officers of that force?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, he did not quite understand the hon. Gentleman's Question. In the first place, the Report of the Commissioners had not yet been laid upon the Table, and, consequently, the hon. Gentleman could not be aware what the recommendations of the Commissioners were. The Report would probably be laid on the Table that day, and he trusted the hon. Gentleman would then perceive that the regulations respecting the commissioned officers had been entirely carried out.

ARMY—THE ROYAL ENGINEERS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL LEARMONT asked the Secretary of State for War, When the two additional battalions of the Royal Engineers alluded to in Clause 85, Army Circular 1st July 1873, will be formed, and when the Officers will be gazetted?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the formation of the battalions has been proceeding gradually, as the additional officers have been obtained from Woolwich. Eighty officers have already been added to the corps; the captains were gazetted last year, and the majors are now about to be gazetted. The higher ranks will be gazetted, as soon as the 16 officers still wanting to complete the number are supplied.

THE BOARD OF TRADE—REGISTER OF SHIPPING OFFICE—THIRD CLASS CLERKS.—QUESTION.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether a certain number of Temporary Clerks were promoted in 1872, after passing examinations before the Civil Service Commissioners, to the Establishment as Third Class Clerks in the General Register and Record Office of Shipping and Seamen; whether the annual leave, to which the Third Class Established Clerks were entitled according to the printed regulations of the Board of Trade of 1866, was thirty-six days; whether, on the 30th May 1873, the following Order was issued:

"The question of annual holidays will be reconsidered by the Board of Trade; pending the Lord's decision no more than four weeks (twenty-four days) will be allowed, Third Class Clerks who were appointed to the Establishment subsequent to August last;"

and, whether, on the 16th June 1873, an Order was issued signed by the President of the Board of Trade, fixing the annual leave of these Clerks at twenty-four days; and, if so, whether he adheres to the statement that the annual leave of a certain number of established Clerks has not been diminished?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, that with regard to the portion of the noble Lord's Question respecting the Order of the 30th May, that it was correct, and that such an Order had been issued. No temporary clerks had been "promoted" in the ordinary sense of that word in the year 1872, and there had been no curtailment in anybody's leave of absence. Thirty-six days of leave were allowed to the old third-class establishment clerks; but the three gentlemen who had been fortunate enough to interest the noble Lord in their cause reached the position of third-class clerks on the establishment under very peculiar circumstances. They were temporary clerks, or writers, in connection with the Office of the Board of Trade and the dependent department of the General Register and Record Office of Shipping and Seamen. They then had a week less of leave of absence than they now enjoyed, and they had no claim whatever either to an increase of leave or to be on the establishment; but when the new system under the Order in Council was introduced which limited the non-established officers to the lower class of writers and copyists, and which interfered unfavourably with the prospects of many of the non-established gentlemen who had been employed before, these temporary clerks were placed on the establishment as an act of grace, with the permission of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.

QUESTIONS.

In reply to Mr. BOURKE,

MR. HOLT said, that having regard to the recent discussion on the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), he did not intend to proceed with his Motion on Friday next, for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the state of the law respecting Conventual and Monastic Institutions or Societies in Great Britain.

MR. ASHLETON CROSS said, he understood it would not be in his power to bring forward as an independent Motion the Motion of which he had given Notice, respecting the Reports of the Select Committee of Public Accounts as to the conduct of the Post Office. He, therefore, wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would put down Supply for an earlier day than Monday, or else allow the Standing Order to be dispensed with, so that the subject might be discussed?

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he wished to know whether the Real Estate (Intestacy) Bill, which was set down for the morning sitting to-morrow, was intended by the Government to be discussed?

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was his intention to give his hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Locke King) a day for his Bill; but not without considering the prior claims of Government business. He hoped, on Thursday, to make arrangements for that purpose. It would not be in the power of the Government to give a day to the hon. Member (Mr. Asheton Cross) for his Motion on Telegraph Accounts before Monday. It would be necessary for the House to give its undivided attention and to use considerable exertion during this week in order to pass many important Bills through the remaining stages. The evidence taken before the Committee of Public Accounts was only printed that day, and it had not yet been read by the Government. There would, however, be no difficulty in finding an opportunity for the Motion of the hon. Member. He was afraid it could not be done on going into Committee of Supply; but it would be necessary to bring in a Bill for a further allocation of money for the purpose of supplying the deficiency in the Telegraph Capital Accounts, and therefore the hon. Member would have a better opportunity to bring forward his Motion than if it were brought on on a Supply night.

In reply to Mr. WHEELHOUSE,

MR. GLYN stated that it was not the intention of the Government to proceed with the Registration of Births and Deaths Bill that Session.

In reply to Questions from MR. DIXON and MR. DILLWIN,

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he proposed to take the Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment Bill to-morrow at 2 o'clock. He should also proceed with the Endowed Schools Commission Bill to-morrow, if he could not make progress with it that evening.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that since he had given Notice of a Motion respecting Government Orders of the Day having preference during the remaining Tuesdays of the Session, he had received from his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) a protest against that Motion. It was his (Mr. Gladstone's) duty to inform him that, as far as the Government were concerned, they could under no circumstances assent to his proposal, which stood for Tuesday evening, to refer to a Royal Commission the question of electoral power. That was a matter entirely for the House to decide. He, therefore, thought it would be for the convenience of the House that Tuesday evenings for the remainder of the Session should be devoted to Government Business. He should, therefore, conclude by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That To-morrow, and upon every succeeding Tuesday during the remainder of the Session, Orders of the Day have precedence of Notices of Motion, Government Orders of the Day having the priority."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. DISRAELI said, he was sure that the House would be glad to assist the Government at that period of the Session, and to facilitate in every way the progress of Public Business; but, in granting that addition to the considerable concessions already made, the House had a right to expect that the confidence placed in the Government should be used with discretion and in a satisfactory manner. On Friday night, when it was generally expected that the Government influence would be exercised to prevent it, the House was unfortunately counted out; at a period of the Session, too, when time was precious. Next he must say that the remarks made by the right hon. Gentleman on the course of Public Business were not altogether satisfactory. He understood that the next morning sitting was to be appropriated to a private Member. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No.] Then it was for another morning sitting; but however that might be, he did not understand that it was absolutely appropriated to the Real Estate (Intestacy) Bill, although it was put down on the Paper for that day; and it might appear on the Paper for a subsequent day. He wished to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Bill of the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Locke King), which was favoured by the Government, was of a very speculative and controversial character, which under any circumstances could not be brought to a conclusion that year, and it appeared to him, therefore, that it was not expedient that the time of the House should be occupied in discussing it, and especially that the time of private Members, given up to the Government, should be applied to the purpose. It did seem very hard upon those hon. Gentlemen, who by the Motion would forfeit any chance of bringing on their Resolutions, that the first use the Government should make of their privilege should be to secure a favour for a private Member which was quite unnecessary. Then there was another question, and one of a most eminently practical character, in which the whole House took an interest—namely, that with reference to those strange proceedings that had taken place with respect to the telegraphs. He thought some arrangement should be made to facilitate and advance the discussion of that important subject, which had been brought forward by the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire. The right hon. Gentleman had said that a Bill on the subject would probably be introduced, and that the hon. Member might then raise the discussion on his Resolution, which appeared to be very moderately expressed, in the form of an Amendment. But the Bill to be brought in by Her Majesty's Government was a Bill which he (Mr. Disraeli), so far as he knew, should deem it his duty to support, and the hon. Member for South-west Lancashire also; and it would be unprecedented to ask his hon. Friend to put himself in a hostile position towards a Bill which he believed to be advantageous to the public interest, in order that he might ask the opinion of the House on another subject. In agreeing to the Motion of the Prime Minister, therefore, he thought there should be an understanding that the privilege thus cheerfully accorded should be used for no other purpose than the advancement of Public Business.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that there never was any intention on the part of the Government to apply any of the time that had been asked from the House for the purpose of giving a preference to his hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey over his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton. The Order of the Day for the Second Reading of his hon. Friend's Bill, no doubt, stood for to-morrow, but it was never promised that it should come on. His hon. Friend had, perhaps, some reason to complain, and the Government, he was afraid, had drawn largely upon his patience, seeing that his hon. Friend's Bill had been on the Order Book during the entire Session. Still, he quite acceded to what the right hon. Gentleman had said as to the duty of the Government to apply the additional time for which they now asked to those subjects which were recognized by the House generally as most important with reference to the close of the Session. He would give the hon. Member for Southwest Lancashire (Mr. Cross) an assurance that, come what might, he should have an opportunity of bringing forward his Motion independently of Supply. But he would not stop there. As he had stated, the evidence given before the Committee of Public Accounts had only been published that morning, and the hon. Gentleman would no doubt think it proper that it should have some days to circulate before it was brought on; but if he could find an occasion for bringing on his Resolution as an independent Motion, the Government would have every reason to forward his views. He did not think that the Government could give him an opportunity this week, unless the progress of legislative business should be very rapid; but the Government would give him every assistance in bringing on his Motion.

MR. T. HUGHES said, he had a Motion down on the Paper for to-morrow night, and as it in some degree involved the question of Privilege, he should like, before withdrawing it, to put a question to the Government with regard to it. About that time last year the Postmaster General, in reply to a Question, expressed himself favourable to his (Mr. Hughes's) proposal to give facilities to small investors for obtaining Government securities through the machinery of the Post Office. He, therefore, introduced a Bill to that effect in the present Session. When he came to place that Bill on the Paper for a Second Reading, he was informed that it was necessary first to obtain the consent of the Treasury. For that consent he applied to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. For some time, he received no answer, and ultimately the right hon. Gentleman refused him the consent he required. It so happened, too, that the copy of the Bill which he forwarded to the right hon. Gentleman was the only one he had, and when he came to inquire for it he found that it had been lost by the Treasury. What he desired to learn was, whether the Treasury possessed this power of prohibiting the Second Reading of a Bill proposed in the ordinary way. If such a power existed, he could not help feeling that it was a great infringement of the rights of private Members.

MR. BOUVERIE, referring to the count-out on Friday evening last, complained of the unsatisfactory working of the present arrangement, and said it was calculated to have a damaging effect on the character of the House. Hon. Members after the morning sitting were exhausted, and did not get down to the House in time for the evening meeting; the result being that there was constantly a count-out, and much business of importance was neglected. He would suggest that as a remedy for that state of things, the present plan should be reversed, and the Tuesday and Friday mornings be given to private Members, the evenings being appropriated to Government Business. In that case, the Government would be sure to take care to keep a House.

LORD JOHN MANNERS reminded the House that he at the commencement of the Session made a similar suggestion, without receiving any support. If he could anticipate any encouragement for it, he would with pleasure renew it at the commencement of next Session.

MR. ANDERSON, as one of the victims of last Friday's count, had not noticed the presence of either of the two last right hon. Gentlemen on that occasion. He felt bound to testify to the fact that, while there were only three hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House, the Treasury bench was unusually full.

MR. J. LOWTHER hoped the Government would allow all the Motions of private Members now on the Paper to be disposed of, before the Government took all the time of the House. He also trusted that under no arrangement would undue preference be given to one Member over another.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he would reply to the Question of the hon. Member for Frobis (Mr. T. Hughes) to-morrow.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he had, in common with other hon. Members, protested against the Two o'clock sittings when introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) as tending to the utter destruction of the rights of private Members. Under the arrangement that was made it was not merely a matter of courtesy for the Government to keep a House, but it was their duty—a duty, moreover, which could be performed by no one else. The fact, however, was, that the sittings were so late that hon. Members could not come down again after adjourning at 3 o'clock. He hoped that before long Parliament would abrogate the Standing Order, and restore the constitutional right of redressing grievances before voting Supplies.

MR. R. N. FOWLER thought the Government ought to fix a day for the India Budget, before they gave one for the Bill of the hon. Member for East Surrey.

Question put, and agreed to.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE:

BILL—[Lord]—

(Mr. Attorney General.)

[BILL 237.] CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration." — (Mr. Attorney General.)

MR. GREGORY moved, that the Bill be re-committed with reference to Clause 14, which related to the salaries of the future Judges. In his opinion, the arrangements which had been agreed to, were exceedingly objectionable in many respects. As the clause stood certain of the Judges of the Divisional Courts would be in receipt of higher salaries than those of the Judges whose duty it would be to revise their decisions on appeal. For instance, while Judges of Appeal would be receiving £5,000 per annum, the President of one Division would have £8,000, of two £7,000, and of the other £6,000 a-year. The natural consequence would be that these offices would be more sought after by men of distinction at the bar, and their decisions would be subject to the revision of men of inferior standing who had accepted the lower salary. It must be remembered also that this might be done by a decision of three Judges of the Court of Appeal with reference to the judgments of a President and two Judges of the Court below.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "now taken into Consideration," in order to add the words "re-committed in respect of Clause 14 (Salaries of future Judges)," — (Mr. Gregory,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. CHARLEY asked what would be done with the Queen's Counsel of the County Palatine after the passing of the Bill; and, what the Government proposed to do with the present Chamber clerks of the Judges?

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that he had put an Amendment on the Paper to meet the case of the Queen's Counsel of the County Palatine. With reference to the Chamber clerks of the Judges, that question had already been fully discussed, and he would not enter into it again. He must also decline, with all respect, to the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), to renew again the discussion on the subject of the Judges' salaries.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered.

Clause 22 (Transfer of pending business)

The ATTORNEY GENERAL moved in page 10, line 32, at end, to add the following words:—

"In all cases of appeals from any Ecclesiastical Court, where her Majesty shall be advised that the judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed or varied, and that any sentence of suspension or deprivation ought to be passed on any clerk, it shall be lawful for her Majesty to remit the cause to the Court to pass such sentence, and such Court shall pronounce such sentence accordingly."

The object of the Amendment was to continue the existing practice, by which the formal passing of the sentence was remitted to the inferior Court.

SIR GEORGE GREY did not understand the object of the Amendment, and thought it could only be agreed to on the understanding that it would confer no new power on the Ecclesiastical Courts, but would continue to them the duty—acting ministerially—of communicating the sentence to the party to be affected by it. He thought, however, that they should have some further explanation with regard to its effect, and the necessity for introducing it. If its object was to give to the Ecclesiastical Courts the power of pronouncing sentence without that control or check to which they were now subject from the superior civil Courts, it would be a dangerous innovation. If, on the other hand, the function of the Court below was to be purely ministerial, and they had merely, as at present, formally to pronounce the sentence of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, then he did not see the object of introducing it. He thought it would be much better to leave to the Superior Court the duty of pronouncing and enforcing obedience to its own sentences. With regard to the general question of the transference of ecclesiastical cases from the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to the new Court effected by the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy), his strong conviction was that the subject had not been treated by the House or by the Government in the manner in which it ought to have been treated. When the Bill was brought in, it was distinctly stated by Her Majesty's Government, that the question involved many delicate and important considerations, that it ought, if dealt with at all, to be made the subject of a separate measure, and that it was not desirable to include it in a Bill for the reform of the civil judicature of the country. Well, 17 days ago, when the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman opposite was agreed to, there was not the slightest intimation given by Her Majesty's Government that they had in any way modified that opinion. The Amendment was made in the most precipitate manner, and practically without any Notice. There was technically a Notice put on the Paper for the omission of certain words between brackets, but the Notice did not itself clearly indicate what the effect would be. Independently of that, the Notice was given only on the night immediately preceding the Two o'clock sitting, at which the Amendment was moved. He believed there were very few hon. Members of the House who knew that the Motion would be made, and still fewer who thought it would be accepted by Her Majesty's Government. He came himself down to the House without the slightest idea that such an Amendment would be moved. It might be said—"You ought to have looked at the Notice Paper, and seen what Amendments were to be proposed." But the fact was, it was very difficult to read through the multitudinous Amendments on such a Bill. He was, therefore, greatly surprised when his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, without having given any intimation that the Government had changed their mind on the subject, and without any communication with the heads of the Church, accepted the Amendment. He was not going to deny that the change might be a right one; but it was a change which required the most careful and deliberate consideration, whereas it had received no consideration whatever, and had been adopted in a very hasty and precipitate manner. He must say that the wisdom, the learning, and the strict impartiality which characterized the decisions of the Privy Council in ecclesiastical cases had conferred great benefit on the Church, and he was not himself prepared to take away its jurisdiction, without being fully satisfied as to the Court to be substituted for it. He agreed with what had been said by Her Majesty's Government, that that was a question which demanded and ought to receive separate consideration. [Mr. GLADSTONE: By whom?] By the Lord Chancellor in the other House. If, in the case of decisions by the Privy Council, there were to be found persons in the Church who were slow to accept them, he should be very much surprised if those persons would receive with deference and willing obedience the decisions of this new Court of Appeal. If that transfer of jurisdiction was made, they would apparently have a stronger reason for refusing obedience; because it would be said that the judgments which would be come to would be the judgments of laymen only. He would not ask the House now to reverse the decision at which it had arrived; but he hoped the matter would receive in "another place" more deliberate care and attention than it had received in that House.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, no doubt the Notice he had given was a very short Notice; but it was given under peculiar circumstances. His right hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) had referred to what had been said "elsewhere;" but he was not quite accurate in saying that the Government had made so broad a statement as that they would not deal with the ecclesiastical appeals in that Bill. As far as he (Mr. G. Hardy) understood, the Government made a very modified statement on the subject. What they did say was, that there were certain difficult questions which should be the subject of future consideration, and that the Government did not take up the subject of ecclesiastical cases, because they were afraid they would not succeed in the House of Commons, even if the transfer of jurisdiction were agreed to in the House of Lords. He had not himself intended to propose any change in the Bill as introduced by the Government. But when the question of including Scotch and Irish appeals was agreed to he began to make inquiries among hon. Gentlemen with whom he usually acted, and also among some on the other side of the House, one of whom was the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), whether he should receive their support if he brought forward the Amendment, and he found that there was an almost general agreement in favour of it. He also spoke to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government the day before he moved it. The right hon. Gentleman finding that there was no difference of opinion on the subject, and that everyone took the same view, assented to the striking out of the words; but he was bound to say that the right hon. Gentleman told him the night before that he could not pledge himself to accept the Amendment, but would leave it open to the consideration of his Colleagues. His right hon. Friend stated that he was not aware that the Amendment was about to be proposed; but it stood first on the Notice Paper, and anybody who looked at the Paper could not but see it. His right hon. Friend further said he did not intend to take any steps to reverse the decision to which the Committee had come, but would leave the matter to be dealt with by the other House. Well, he (Mr. G. Hardy) was quite prepared that it should go to the other House to be considered there. He said, when bringing forward the Amendment, that if the Government were hostile to it he would not press it; but he was still of the same opinion as when he moved the Amendment, that the change was a proper one to be made, and that it was a much better course to send those ecclesiastical causes to the new tribunal.

Sir George Grey

MR. BOUVERIE said, he shared in the regret expressed by his right hon. Friend near him (Sir George Grey), and he likewise agreed with him in thinking that the adoption of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. G. Hardy) was a very hasty and precipitate step. The principle involved was, in the minds of many men, even of more transcendent importance than the whole question of final appeal in other cases, and had excited the greatest interest throughout the country at various times, and in regard to it he (Mr. Bouvierie) contended that, in the opinion of a great many persons, a lay tribunal ought not to be the only Court to determine questions of doctrine and discipline within the Church of England. No one could be more fully aware of that than the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, who well knew that from the time of the Reformation downwards every tribunal which had been constituted to decide upon the doctrines, practice, and discipline of the Church of England had been a mixed tribunal, lay learning being in the ascendant, but there being also an infusion of the ecclesiastical element. Indeed, a great complaint on the part of the Church was that it was not entirely ecclesiastical. His right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, more than 20 years ago, wrote an elaborate paper, which he published in his own name, to demonstrate that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was an absolutely unfit tribunal to try these cases, because it was composed of laymen. [MR. GLADSTONE: No, no! Read the whole book.] He had read the whole book several times, and he could quote chapter and verse for it. He sometimes refreshed his memory by reading over what the right hon. Gentleman had written; and he could only attribute the denial of his right hon. Friend to the fact that he did not adhere to the opinion he had expressed 20 years ago. These were the right hon. Gentleman's words—

"No one pretends that the constitution of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council is adapted to the due and solemn decision of cases of doctrine. Before the decision in the Gorham case was delivered, and when no man had an interest in upholding unduly the credit of the Court, there was but one voice of reclamation throughout the country against the gross indecency of such a mode of provision for such causes."

Several Prelates sat as assessors with the other Judges in that case, but this did not satisfy the right hon. Gentleman, who went on to say—

"And even now, when the case is much altered in that respect, there is still a nearly universal acknowledgment that the law requires material alteration. It is enough for me to stand on this acknowledgment, and upon the further fact that so many persons of the greatest weight—from the Episcopal Bench downwards, will find themselves precluded from acquiescence, at any time or under any circumstances, in the law as it now is, because they are convinced that it is a state of law which has already led to the violation, and would ultimately lead to the destruction, of the faith and work of the Church."

In a subsequent part of his essay, the right hon. Gentleman said—

"The transference, then, of these functions to the Court of Privy Council is not progress, but retrogression and decay. The maxim overthrown and disregarded is not one antiquated and unfit for these times, but one deeply founded in the nature of things, and in right human and divine. It being such a maxim, justly may we say that the statute which thus tramples it in the mire is an unconstitutional statute. It is a statute as truly unconstitutional as would be our investing the Executive Committee with the right of taxation or with the dispensing power; as was one which, in the time of Henry VIII., gave to the Royal Proclamation the force of law, or one which, in the time of Charles I., perpetuated the Long Parliament."

Thus, in the right hon. Gentleman's judgment at that time, a mixed tribunal, containing laymen appointed by the Minister of the day, was totally unfit to decide these questions; yet he was now going to make bad worse by removing entirely the ecclesiastical element—a step which would never have been assented to by any Minister of prudence and moderation who had to consider the interests of the Church as well as of the State. He believed that many who favoured the proposal would hereafter advocate the doctrine which his right hon. Friend's pamphlet was written to advocate—that questions of doctrine and discipline should be decided by ecclesiastics only. The Bishop of London at that time proposed that the Court should merely decide questions of law, and that all questions of doctrine should be referred by it to the Bench of Bishops, and it was in support of that, that the essay was written. He feared that a large portion of the clergy and a not unimportant portion of the laity, on finding cases decided by a purely lay tribunal, no longer modified by the good sense and moderation of some of the most distinguished Prelates in the Church, would set up a howl for the creation of a purely ecclesiastical tribunal. That would be an evil day for the Church of England. There was still a notion among a large body of the clergy, that they were a distinct nation within a nation, entitled to determine questions which, however, affected the laity as much as the clergy. The tendency of the Amendment would be to give a leverage by which that view would be urged, and he lamented, therefore, that any Minister charged with the responsibility of governing Church and State, and of enforcing wisdom and moderation on the contending factions which from time to time almost rent it in twain, should have assented to what would be the beginning of the letting out of water.

DR. BALL said, that when the question was last discussed, the majority of hon. Members who spoke seemed to be in favour of not introducing the episcopal element into the Court for the decision of ecclesiastical cases. Being an Irish Member, representing an Irish constituency, he did not then think it was for him to come forward with a proposition to the effect that, in the High Court of Justice, the Archbishops and the Bishop of London should be members of the Court when ecclesiastical cases came before it. It did not appear to him that the particular Amendment now being considered was open to such objections as had been made to it. Apart from the question of the effectiveness of the Privy Council as a legal tribunal to decide ecclesiastical cases, there was another question—namely, whether, when these cases were transferred to the High Court of Justice, assistance should not be called in before their decision? In the Privy Council the two Archbishops and the Bishop of London sat, and the same provision must be made with regard to the High Court of Justice when ecclesiastical cases were to be heard. It was a serious question whether there should not be an admixture of the ecclesiastical element in decisions upon cases that involved questions of doctrine, and its consideration must be governed by what was found to be the feeling generally in the Church of England. Unless the Amendment were introduced in that House, it could not be introduced in the House of Lords, and therefore it was better to insert it, and allow the Bishops and the House of Lords either to strike it out, or to agree to it as they thought fit.

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, the Amendment was inconsistent with the spirit of the main decision of the House, inasmuch as it endeavoured to clothe with some ecclesiastical sanction a decision which was essentially a lay decision. The main point was whether the House was right in determining that the judgment itself should be purely lay, and not a mixed ecclesiastical judgment. He had had no difficulty in concurring in that course. He had been a party to the abolition of juris de mediata lingua, in which a certain number of foreigners were mixed with a certain number of Englishmen for the purpose of giving what was supposed to be more complete justice. That Court of the Privy Council was a sort of jury de mediata lingua, where it was expected that one class of persons would administer one sort of law, and that another sort of persons would dash it with views of a different description. He had never approved of that course. He had always regarded the Church of England as essentially an Act of Parliament Church, and a Church standing exclusively on lay foundations. He could never forget that in the great statutes of the 1st of Elizabeth, which established the Prayer Book in this country, it was recorded, he believed, as a solitary exception—that those statutes on which the Reformed Church of England stood had been made by the Lords temporal and the Commons, to the exclusion of the Lords spiritual, who were named in almost every other statute. Why was that so? The Prayer Book of Queen Elizabeth was established by William Cecil. He settled the Book at a private conclave in his own house, upon doctrines not altogether consistent with those sometimes promulgated by the descendants of that eminent statesman, and he established it by Act of Parliament against the unanimous remonstrances of the whole of Convocation, and against the opinion of the whole of the English Bishops, except one. The course taken on that subject was to establish the supremacy of the Crown against the clergy and Bishops. That being the foundation of the Established Church, it had always seemed to him that the doctrine and discipline of the Church should be interpreted by a lay, and not an ecclesiastical tribunal. He therefore entirely concurred in the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford, and would vote against the Amendment proposed to be inserted, because it seemed to cast a doubt on the purely lay character of the judgment by introducing some ecclesiastical element in order to give it execution.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that they had begun that evening by the adoption of a small Motion for the purpose of enlarging the little store of time at their command for getting through the necessary business; and immediately after having thus added to their resources in a slender degree, but still in a sensible degree, they were invited by the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down, to discuss the foundation of the Church of England in doctrine and discipline. He must decline to follow his hon. and learned Friend into such a discussion, but must also acknowledge that he was not the first who had endeavoured to draw them from the consideration of the Amendment, for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) had preceded him in adverting to a matter not connected with the provision before the House. Then came his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), who often recalled the House to its duties, who wound up the discussion by reviving the memory of a pamphlet he (Mr. Gladstone) wrote some 23 years ago; but although he (Mr. Gladstone) frequently found occasion to lament the failure of his own memory, yet he had found that day that his recollection of that pamphlet was better than the recollection of his right hon. Friend, although he appeared to have read it only that morning. His right hon. Friend said that the proposition in that pamphlet was that ecclesiastical causes should be tried by an exclusively ecclesiastical tribunal, and he said he would prove it by reference to the pamphlet itself. But every line which his right hon. Friend read had to be followed by several lines of his own comments; yet he did not produce a single word to affect the cardinal proposition of that pamphlet. He still thought that pamphlet contained a great deal of important and valuable matter. [MR. BOUVERIE: It is very difficult to understand.] The conduct of the Government had been animadverted upon in two points—first of all, it was said they had departed from the opinion they had expressed when they adopted the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford; and, secondly, his own conduct on that occasion had been animadverted upon. Now, there had been no change of opinion on the part of the Government. The Government had never put forth that, upon the merits of the case, it would not be wise to make that transfer from the Court of Privy Council to the purely lay Court of Appeal, and he did not find recorded a single word disapproving of that transfer on its merits. The only opinion expressed on the subject was in the other House, and was to the effect, that to introduce such a transfer into the present Bill would increase its burden, and might endanger its passing. And what happened when the Amendment was introduced? Why, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hardy) said very considerately, he did not wish to force the Amendment against the opinion of the Government. No fewer than nine hon. Members had addressed the House, representing every view, and he was desirous that the expression of opinion should be as full as possible. When he (Mr. Gladstone) rose to speak, he was determined to ascertain whether there were two opinions on the subject. The words he used were as nearly as possible to this effect—that from the debate which had arisen, he was fully convinced there was not a single hon. Gentleman in that House who did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hardy), in the desire to bring ecclesiastical causes within the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal; and he must say, when the change was adopted by the House, he thought it was supported by the high authority of his right hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth. If they had declined adopting that change, and a division had been called for, the Government, he believed, would have been left in a minority, and they did not wish to place themselves in that position. Under all the circumstances, he did not think it could be considered that any great haste had been shown in the adoption of the Amendment; and as it was quite impossible now to have any satisfactory discussion upon the merits of the question, he hoped they would be allowed to proceed. Beyond that, the matter had been, he thought, fully and freely discussed, and he objected to its being now again brought forward in an irregular and collateral manner.

SIR GEORGE GREY wished to say in explanation that he had been misunderstood. He did not say that the Government had expressed any opinion adverse to the Amendment; he himself had not done so, provided it were adopted after due deliberation. He said, they had expressed an opinion it ought not to be included in this Bill, but ought to be reserved for separate consideration. On the occasion alluded to, he came to the House utterly unconscious that any such proposal was about to be made towards the close of the discussion; and, not knowing what had been already said, he did not feel qualified to take part in the debate.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. HENLEY thought the change had been made somewhat hastily, and he very much doubted whether it would lead to peace or quietness. For the last 30 years, one party had sought to diminish the weight of the judgment of the Court, on account of the preponderance of the lay element, and they would now have their hands strengthened in a way that must work most inconveniently. He regretted the change had been made without more deliberation. He did not mean to say anything had been informally done, because due Notice was given; but he did not think anybody in the House had the least notion of what was being done, and everyone now seemed to be taken by surprise.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN asked whether anything was to be gained by the Amendment. Why should not the Court execute its own decree?

MR. HOLT wished to enter his protest against the Government allowing a question of that magnitude to be mixed up with the main question before the House. That opinion was expressed by the Lord Chancellor, and he had reason to know that many hon. Members who concurred in the Amendment, still thought it would have been wiser to have left this matter over for more consideration. He thought that the result might be the placing in ecclesiastical hands the very power which they all wished to keep in the hands of both ecclesiastics and laymen.

MR. COLLINS observed that that could not be considered a new question, for when a Bill connected with the subject had been brought forward by Sir Robert Collier, then Attorney General, he (Mr. Collins) moved that the Bishops should not form part of the Privy Council. On that occasion, he was told that the subject ought to be dealt with in some such a general scheme as the one before the House. It was hardly fair to turn round now and say that this House was taken by surprise. There was no grievance whatever. It was ascertained that the feeling of the House was that these cases ought to be decided by laymen, and not by ecclesiastics. They might be called in as assessors or experts by order of the Court, just as they were in other cases. Bishops, from their position, must be partisans, and it was far better that laymen should decide dry questions of law, as to whether a man did or did not render the obedience required of him.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the Bill carefully provided that the Court of Appeal should take the place of the Privy Council in advising Her Majesty, so that their fellow-subjects in the colonies, and especially in India, should have the sentences in their appeals pronounced, as hitherto, by Her Majesty herself. By a change in the Act establishing the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, careful provision was made for remitting its order to the Court below—say in India—to be enforced. When ecclesiastical jurisdiction was first given to the Judicial Committee, by the 3rd and 4th of the present reign, no such provision was made: A discussion arose as to whether the practice of the Privy Council was to be followed in these cases; and it was held that under the particular statute the Judicial Committee had power to pronounce sentence. In order to avoid a similar dispute, the Attorney General, in response to the hon. Member for Lancashire (Mr. Assheton Cross), brought up on the Report, the Amendment to set at rest the question of practice, and to prevent there being any doubt as to the law in the future. In all these matters the ultimate Courts of Appeal had always remitted their sentence to the Court below; that was as much the practice of the House of Lords as of the Privy Council. The House of Lords did not carry out its own orders, so that the Amendment simply maintained the present practice and preserved consistency. It would be inconsistent if Her Majesty were to remit to the Court below in every case except in ecclesiastical cases.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS thought the House ought to take care that, in transferring that appeal to a purely lay tribunal, they should do so in such a manner as to interfere as little as possible with the consciences of the clergy of the Church of England. He thought the Amendment proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman would give great satisfaction.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 55 (Divisional Courts of Appeal).

MR. W. H. SMITH in moving an Amendment, to add at end of clause the words—

"If such divisional Court shall differ from the judgment of the Court below, such appeal shall be reheard before a full Court consisting of not less than five Judges on the application of either party."

said, a feeling prevailed among suitors in the Courts of Law, that if the clause remained in its present form, and if there were to be no redress in the event of the Judges of the Appeal Court differing in opinion from the Court below, injustice would be done to them on very many occasions. In all probability the Appeal Court would only consist of three Judges.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "if such divisional Court shall differ from the judgment of the Court below, such appeal shall be reheard before a full Court consisting of not less than five judges on the application of either party."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, no good could arise from reviving the point which was discussed and decided while the Bill was in Committee. If the addition were adopted there might be repeated re-hearings of the particular case. He considered it most important that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be final, and hoped that, as a rule, more than three Judges would sit in the Court of Appeal.

MR. HINDE PALMER denied that the subject had been thoroughly debated in Committee, and expressed his opinion that when the Judges of the Appellate Court differed among themselves it would be a most desirable thing to have another re-hearing. Where they were unanimous, it should be final with respect to the judgment of the Court below.

MR. AMPHLETT said, that when he proposed this Amendment on a former occasion it was supported by a substantial minority of 144. As the question was then virtually decided, he should recommend his hon. Friend not to press it to another division, although if he did he should feel bound to divide with him.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he could not accept the Amendment. It proceeded on the fallacy that the Judges of the Court of Appeal would be weaker than the Judges of the Court below, and that question having been argued at great length on a former occasion he trusted that the House would not reverse the decision of the Committee.

MR. JAMES said, that the Court of Appeal ought to be stronger than the Court appealed from, and if there were three Judges of the Court below it would be unsatisfactory to the suitor to have his case decided by less than five Judges of the Court of Appeal.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 97: Majority 42.

Clause agreed to.

AYES.

Adderley, rt. hn. Sir C.	Harcourt, W.G.G.V.V.
Amphlett, R. P.	Hardy, rt. hon. G.
Ashton, R.	Henley, rt. hon. J. W.
Baggallay, Sir R.	Holt, J. M.
Ball, rt. hon. J. T.	Hope, A. J. B. B.
Barclay, A. C.	James, H.
Barttelot, Colonel	Jenkinson, Sir G. S.
Beach, W. W. B.	Lennox, Lord G. G.
Beaumont, H. F.	Locke, J.
Bective, Earl of	Mitford, W. T.
Bright, R.	Morgan, G. O.
Bristowe, S. B.	O'Conor, D. M.
Brooks, W. C.	Pim, J.
Butt, I.	Powell, F. S.
Buxton, Sir R. J.	Powell, W.
Charley, W. T.	Raikes, H. C.
Clay, J.	Sandon, Viscount
Collins, T.	Scourfield, J. H.
Craufurd, E. H. J.	Stanley, hon. F.
Dilke, Sir C. W.	Taylor, rt. hon. Col.
Dowdeswell, W. E.	Torr, J.
Dyke, W. H.	Wait, W. K.
Dyott, Colonel R.	Waterhouse, S.
Ewing, A. Orr	Wells, E.
Fellowes, E.	Wheelhouse, W. S. J.
Figgins, J.
Fowler, R. N.	TELLERS.
Goldsmit, J.	Fowler, W.
Gore, J. R. O.	Smith, W. H.
Gore, W. R. O.

Mr. Hinde Palmer

NOES.

Anderson, G.	Kingscote, Colonel
Ayrton, rt. hon. A. S.	Knatchbull-Hugessen, rt. hon. E.
Baines, E.	Lambert, N. G.
Baker, R. B. W.	Lawson, Sir W.
Barclay, J. W.	Leatham, E. A.
Bassett, F.	Lefevre, G. J. S.
Baxter, rt. hon. W. E.	Leith, J. F.
Bentall, E. H.	Lowe, rt. hon. R.
Bolkow, H. W. F.	Lyttelton, hon. C. G.
Bouverie, rt. hon. E. P.	Mackintosh, E. W.
Bowring, E. A.	McClure, T.
Brassey, T.	McLagan, P.
Brewer, Dr.	McLaren, D.
Brocklehurst, W. C.	Matheson, A.
Brown, A. H.	Miller, W.
Bruce, rt. hon. H. A.	Mitchell, T. A.
Campbell-Bannerman, H.	Monk, C. J.
Candlish, J.	Munts, P. H.
Cardwell, rt. hon. E.	Norwood, C. M.
Carter, R. M.	O'Donoghue, Thc
Cave, T.	O'Reilly-Dease, M.
Cavendish, Lord F. C.	Palmer, J. H.
Childers, right hon. H.	Parker, C. S.
Colebrooke, Sir T. E.	Parry, L. Jones-
Coleridge, Sir J. D.	Peel, A. W.
Corrigan, Sir D.	Philips, R. N.
Cowen, Sir J.	Playfair, L.
Davies, R.	Power, J. T.
Delahunt, J.	Price, W. E.
Dickinson, S. S.	Reed, C.
Ennis, J. J.	Roden, W. S.
Finnie, W.	Rylands, P.
Fitzwilliam, hon. C. W. W.	Seymour, A.
Forster, rt. hon. W. E.	Stansfeld, rt. hon. J.
Fortescue, rt. hon. C. P.	Stone, W. H.
Gilpin, C.	Stuart, hon. H. W. V.
Gladstone, rt. hn. W. E.	Talbot, C. R. M.
Gladstone, W. H.	Trevelyan, G. O.
Goldsmid, Sir F.	Villiers, rt. hon. C. P.
Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.	Vivian, H. H.
Gray, Sir J.	Wedderburn, Sir D.
Greville, hon. Captain	Weguelin, T. M.
Grieve, J. J.	West, H. W.
Grenvenor, Lord R.	Whitwall, J.
Hartington, Marq. of	Williams, W.
Henderson, J.	Woods, H.
Hibbert, J. T.	Young, rt. hon. G.
Holma, J.	TELLERS.
Hurst, R. H.	Adam, W. P.
Jessel, Sir G.	Glyn, hon. G. G.

Clause 59 (Power to direct trial before Referees).

On the Motion of Mr. LOPEZ, Amendment made in page 31, line 3, by leaving out the words "or any scientific or local investigation."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 79 (Transfer of existing staff of officers to Supreme Court).

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Amendment made in page 39, line 12, by adding the following words:—

"Nothing in this Act contained shall interfere with the office of marshal attending any Commission of Assize."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Schedule.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID moved an Amendment in page 51, paragraph 18, line 36, to leave out the words "be as brief," and insert "set forth the requisite facts as briefly." He proposed the Amendment on the ground that the Bill was not sufficiently definite, in his opinion, upon the point.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that what the Bill did in that respect was intended merely as a kind of outline or indication of what would be more fully provided for by general rules under the Bill. It was not intended, however, that every plaintiff should file a Bill or draw a declaration.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

RATING (LIABILITY AND VALUE)

BILL.—[BILL 250.]

(*Mr. Stanfeld, Mr. Secretary Bruce, Mr. Gosschen,
Mr. Hibbert.*)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he did not rise to oppose the third reading; but as it could not be denied that the Bill would impose considerable burdens upon real property, he wished to take that opportunity of asking the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, what course he intended to pursue after the Bill and the two other measures which would follow it next year became law, with regard to the relief of local burdens? This Bill, whatever else it would do, would not diminish the burdens on real property, and the Government were every day proposing measures which would increase those burdens. The other night they had given a second reading to a Bill for the extension of Denison's Act, which would also impose an additional burden, and had attempted surreptitiously to introduce a highway Bill into the Turnpike Continuance Act; and when the cuckoo cry was raised that if some portion of the money were paid out of the Consolidated Fund it would lead to extravagance, he denied it altogether, because nobody would increase his own burdens for the sake of dipping his hand into the pocket of the Government for so small a sum. They had been promised considerable things by the Government, and he wished before meeting his constituents to be able to say what it was that the Government intended to do.

MR. GOLDSMID expressed his great satisfaction at the willingness which the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill had shown in accepting the suggestions and Amendments of private Members. The conduct of the right hon. Gentleman in that respect had presented a marked contrast to that of the Government in other cases. Although it was not an entire settlement of the question, yet he had perfect confidence in his future dealing with the subject, and that when he came to consider the relief of local taxation out of Imperial funds, he would do so in the same direction as his predecessor, the present First Lord of the Admiralty.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON entered his protest against the Bill, on the ground that it did not advance one step in the direction of making personal wealth contribute to the expenses of local taxation. It simply extended and continued the liability which fell on real property. The noble Marquess the Chief Secretary for Ireland was reported to have said at Nottingham the other day—

"There is the question of local taxation and local government. The Conservative party are very much interested in that; but in what way are they going to settle it?"

Well, it was rather too bad considering the present Government had been in office five years, and that during all that time the Conservative party had been urging them to deal with that subject, that such a question should have been asked by a Member of the Cabinet. Why, a Resolution had been passed by the House in the strongest language calling on the Government to take measures in relief of local taxation, and they had done nothing whatever to carry it out. If the Government really made up their minds to deal with that subject, the machinery of the income tax supplied them with the means of making personal wealth contribute to the expenses of local government.

MR. STONE denied that the Bill increased the burdens on real property. It merely re-distributed them; but at the same time enlarged the incidence of taxation, and went in the direction of the equalization of burdens. It might be said that the Bill did not go far enough; but what it did, little or much, was in the right direction, and he thought Her Majesty's Ministers were entitled to gratitude for removing the exemption that had existed in favour of Government property.

MR. SOOURFIELD said, he must defend his hon. Friends the Members for West Sussex and North Wilts, who had taken exception to the Bill, which certainly was not distinguished for its logical accuracy. The professed object of the Bill was to abolish exemptions, but it stereotyped the huge exemption of four-fifths of the wealth of the country from local taxation. It did not even abolish the exemption of Government property, but merely stated that the Government would bring in a Bill for that purpose thereafter, which, perhaps, they might never have an opportunity of doing. The country knew exactly what the taxes were to be, but what would they say of a Chancellor of the Exchequer who brought in a series of income tax Bills of various amounts for various purposes? He did not grudge people the fortunes which they made, but at least if they did not pay rates themselves, they ought to refrain from raising a cry that those who did pay rates did not pay enough. Gentlemen who realized enormous fortunes by the sale of quack medicines, which rendered hospitals a necessity; gentlemen who successfully pursued the calling of flat-catching; and a great many others, who made large fortunes, did not contribute a farthing to the rates, yet were constantly swelling the chorus against those who did pay. He could not express any satisfaction with the Bill, which only perpetuated exemptions which were entirely wrong in principle.

MR. CANDLISH said, that the Bill did not increase the taxation of those who now paid it. In answer to the objections urged by hon. Members opposite, he would say that whatever this Bill was, it was not meant to increase local taxation. He thought that both with respect to Imperial and local taxation people ought to be taxed in proportion to their means; but the difficulty was to find a way by which personal property could be taxed. The right hon. Gentleman had tried to do so, and had not succeeded, and hon. Members who complained of that had not themselves suggested any practical measure for the purpose, and, in fact, it had been pronounced to be impossible by the concurrence of all parties in the Legislature. [Sir GEORGE JENKINSON: I never proposed to rate personal property.] Then there was an attempt to make local taxes payable out of income tax. [Sir GEORGE JENKINSON: I have not done that either.] At present they had exempted only ragged and Sunday schools. For himself, he tendered his thanks to the right hon. Gentleman for the pains and care he had bestowed upon the measure, and for the courteous and conciliatory manner in which he had conducted it through its various stages.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, the question of rating Government property was left in great obscurity under the Bill. He wished to know upon what principle of rateability the site now occupied by the British Museum would be assessed, and what was to be done with the large piece of waste ground on which the future Courts of Justice were to be erected? There had been a loss upon that ground for many years in the shape of interest upon capital amounting to £88,000 or £40,000 a-year. By the pulling down of the houses which formerly occupied the ground heavy burdens had been thrown upon the parishes of St. Clement Danes, St. Dunstan's in the West, and the Liberty of the Rolls. Another point which had always struck him was that whereas in Leeds, Hull, and other places, they had to pay rates for their museums, philosophical institutes, and even for their police courts, the metropolitan police courts were paid for out of the Consolidated Fund. He could not understand the reason why, and he had asked in vain for an explanation.

MR. STANFELD said, he had pleasure in gratefully acknowledging the tributes paid to his conduct of the Bill in Committee, and had to state that the rateability of the site of the Palace of Justice and of the British Museum would be governed partly by this Bill and partly by the existence or non-existence of any special statute affecting their rateability. The amounts to be contributed by the Palace of Justice to the local rates settled in the Act under which the site was purchased, were not and would not be disturbed by the Bill. So long as you did not increase the charges on the rates you could not be said to increase local burdens. The wider distribution of burdens must alleviate the pressure upon some of those who contributed. Where metallic mines came under rating for the first time, the occupiers of other property would experience a sensible relief, and the rating of Government property would afford distinct relief to the owners of adjoining property. As to the objection of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Colonel Bartleff), with regard to the second part of the Bill being of no value, he must point out that it not only directed the Treasury to endeavour to place a value on Government property, with a view to its contribution to rates, but it also empowered the Treasury to enter into negotiations with local authorities. The method which the Government had adopted could not be carried into effect without the preliminary of negotiation and arbitration. The hon. and gallant Member had asked for a renewal of the pledges which the Government had given to the House in reference to the subject of which the present Bill was only the beginning. For him, as the head of a Department of the Government, to undertake, on the third reading of that measure, to give pledges which were to be considered of greater weight than the explicit pledges which had been given by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister himself, would be to place a disproportionate value on his own declarations and those of his right hon. Friend who had in the broadest manner committed the Government to the responsibility of dealing at the earliest opportunity with the question of affording some substantial relief out of Imperial revenues to the local burdens of the country.

Mr. MUNTZ said, that although the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government did give the assurances just referred to, he would have preferred seeing the Valuation and the Rating Bills passed in the same Session. He urged hon. Gentlemen to endeavour to reduce local taxation in their own counties, and reminded them that if they accepted relief from Imperial taxation they could not grudge the Government the right to interfere with the management of their local affairs. For his own part, he thought nothing could be more dangerous to this country than the system of centralization which so generally prevailed on the Continent, and he would rather at any time than be subject to it pay double. As for the Bill itself, he approved some of its provisions, but feared it would do a good deal of mischief, and induce much litigation. England and Wales would now, through the instrumentality of committees, have to make their assessments, which again would be settled by the Court of Queen's Bench; and ultimately the result would be most extravagant. He thought that woods should be rated; for although a growing profit would not be visible year by year, it would be apparent enough in 20 years. Game ought also clearly to be rated.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the third time; Amendments made; Bill passed.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—[Bill 162.]
(Mr. Bonham Carter, Mr. Chichester Fortescue, Mr. Arthur Peel.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the second time."

Mr. NORWOOD said, that no doubt before the next Session the House would have before it a considerable portion of the labours of the Royal Commission which had been appointed, and would then have trustworthy evidence upon which to legislate upon the larger question about which many hon. Members were so anxious. It was a source of annoyance to the commercial community that there should be so many Amendment Acts with regard to the merchant shipping law. At the present time there were no fewer than eight or ten statutes which had to be consulted before it could be ascertained what was the law with regard to merchant shipping, and the original Act of 1854 had been so amended that its authors could hardly recognize it. With regard to the Bill itself, he thought some of the clauses were improvements, whilst others, again, were unnecessary or objectionable. He alluded especially to Clauses 10 and 11, which provided that every vessel should be supplied with sufficient boats, rafts, or other appliances for saving life. There was no objection to that provision on the part of shipowners, if only some rule was laid down to define what was the amount of such accommodation that a ship must have, but the clauses as they stood left the matter in an indefinite position, and if the question was to be decided by Board of Trade surveyors, there would be the most varying decisions, for it was well known that no two surveyors of the Board of Trade agreed in their reports. If the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Department persisted with those clauses, he ought to lay down distinctly in a Schedule what amount of boat accommodation British ships must carry, and then the shipowners would have no objection to the clauses. The proposed new clause which related to the removal of wreck imposed such heavy responsibility upon shipowners that he thought no attempt to legislate in that direction should be made during the present Session. He submitted that it was not right for the legislature to impose a considerable amount of responsibility upon shipowners, and yet leave the requirements of the Act so indefinite as to render it impossible for them to know what was really intended. When shipowners knew what was really required of them, they would readily fulfil any duties the law might impose upon them, and he strongly urged the necessity for the consolidation of the law of merchant shipping to remove the confusion at present existing. He should not, however, offer any obstruction to the progress of the Bill.

MR. CANDLISH concurred in the opinions expressed by his hon. Friend as to the vague and indefinite character of many of the provisions of the Bill, and suggested that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade should place upon the Notice Paper, before going into Committee, such Amendments as would explain the various provisions referred to. The shipping interest would then be disposed to thank him for his measure.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, on behalf of the hon. and learned Member for Frome (Mr. T. Hughes), gave Notice of the intention of the latter to propose certain clauses in Committee on the Bill.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, from the peculiarity of the subject, each of the provisions of the Bill must necessarily be treated upon its own particular merits, and he, therefore, was not surprised that it did not give rise to any extended debate upon the second reading, because its provisions could much more usefully be criticized in Committee. The new clauses of which he had given Notice were partly Amendments of the clauses of the Bill, and partly additions to it. In Committee he should be ready to consider all that could be said for or against them; but he believed that most of them were far from adverse to the shipping interest. With respect to proposed clauses bearing on the removal of wreck, he was advised that the clause was justified by the circumstances of the case, and that it would be of great use to the shipping interest. He agreed with his hon. Friends who had spoken that the 10th clause as it stood was too vague and indefinite; but he must add that he did not pretend in the present Bill to arrive at final settlements of that or any of the other matters. The Bill was not intended to anticipate the Report and advice of the Royal Commission which had been appointed, whose evidence and advice he hoped the House might have the benefit of in reference to this subject. What he should propose, in reference to Clause 10 as it stood, was this—He wished at once to make two changes in the law as it had existed with respect to boats. That law was in many cases absurd and useless, for it required the boat accommodation to be in proportion to the tonnage of the vessel, and not to the number of souls on board. He should propose to alter that, and so far to adhere to the clause as it stood in the Bill; but he should not get rid of the present scale. His object was to enable the Board of Trade to make exemptions in cases where the present scale did not apply, and to take power to substitute rafts in lieu of boats. That was the clause which he should propose to substitute for Clause 10. In the present state of our knowledge he thought that would be a reasonable change in the law, and improve the system under which it was now the duty of the Board of Trade to act.

Motion agreed to; Bill read a second time, and committed; considered in Committee, and reported; to be printed, as amended [Bill 253]; re-committed for Friday, at Two of the clock.

CROWN PRIVATE ESTATES BILL.

(Lords.)—[BILL 222.]

(Mr. Gladstone.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. GLADSTONE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that in the first instance he wished to remove some misapprehension which had gone abroad with respect to the scope of the measure. The Bill did not aim at altering the law, but at removing difficulties which had arisen with regard to its present effect. He would refer to the Notice of his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), which he hoped the hon. Gentleman would either not make, or press on the present occasion. His hon. Friend proposed to move, that it was inexpedient to extend the scope of the Act 25 & 26 Vict., c. 37, until the secrecy at present attaching exclusively to Crown testaments was abolished. What he would represent to his hon. Friend was either that that secrecy, which he imagined grew out of some particular right of the Crown with respect to the law of probate, was right or that it was wrong. If it were right, manifestly it ought not to be used as an obstacle to the Bill; neither ought it to be so used if it were wrong. The Bill was reasonable and just on its own grounds, and the question of secrecy growing out of some particular right of the Crown ought to be tried on its own grounds also. The introduction of the latter question would only tend to confuse any discussion on the second reading of the Bill, and moreover his hon. Friend might, if he so wished it, raise the question at a subsequent stage. There was another impression abroad about the Bill, which he was also desirous to remove; for to his surprise he had seen it stated that the object of the measure was to determine the right of the Crown to have certain moneys paid into the Privy Purse from other branches of the Civil List. The Bill had no connection whatever with any such question, and was merely intended to clear up a doubt as to the existing laws, as to which the Government had no doubt whatever, and to enable the Sovereign freely to bequeath any landed property which she might possess in her personal capacity to her next Heir. If the opinion of Lord Westbury, when he was Lord Chancellor, were correct on the effect of the Act of George III. and the Act of Victoria, the Sovereign might bequeath to the Heir of the Crown landed as well as other property. But there was a contrary opinion abroad; and it was not for him to say which of the two was right, although he thought the question ought to be set at rest. What was the present state of the Crown with regard to the power of gift and the power of bequest. Before the time of Queen Anne the Crown was free by law to alienate the estates of the Crown, and from those alienations very great abuses had arisen. The Act of Anne prevented those alienations, and subsequent Acts went to the same effect; but in the reign of George III.—about 1800—a distinction was introduced. That distinction was one between the estates held by the Crown as the Crown, and estates held by the Sovereign in his or her personal capacity; and it was enacted that two descriptions of estates should not fall within any of the restrictions of the Act of Anne. One of those descriptions related to estates which might be purchased by His Majesty or his successors out of any moneys issued or applied for the use of his Privy Purse, or with any other moneys not appropriated to any public service. All that class of estates so purchased or acquired were set completely free from the whole of those restrictions, and Lord Westbury's opinion was that when estates had been so set free they could not come back into the category of restraint, but remained absolutely free. The other class of estates set free from restraints of the Act of Anne were estates which might come to the Sovereign by gift from his or her ancestors, not being Kings or Queens. He wished to show that the restraint which the Bill proposed to remedy, if it were in existence, was a miserable shred of a system which either ought to exist in its full force or not at all. If it were necessary to restrain the power of the Queen to convey private property into the hands of the Heir Apparent it ought to be effectual; but he could show that, so far from its being effectual, it was limited, inconsistent, irregular; it could be circumvented; and, if observed, it would be mischievous to the public service. It was admitted that the Sovereign could give anything he or she pleased to anybody, provided it was not Crown property, but private property; therefore, if they thought it dangerous that the Sovereign should be able to convey real estate to the Heir Apparent, they would have to defend a state of the law in which there was nothing to prevent him or her converting real estate into money, and then handing it over to the Heir Apparent. Lastly, the Sovereign could bequeath any realty without any doubt at all to any person except to the next heir. Was that a reasonable restraint to maintain? He would take the case of a Sovereign who happened to have only one child, who was the next heir to the Crown, and who had no other near relation whatever, this present wondrous wise law would step in and say to that Sovereign—"You may bequeath your property as you like to any distant person, whom you do not care a rush about; but to your child you cannot and shall not bequeath it." What he affirmed was this—that they ought to have no interference with the play of natural and human affections between members of the Royal Family, except for some great, general, clear, and undeniable public object. It was a great blessing when they had a Royal Family guided in its internal relations by human affection. It was a blessing which they had realized in this country to a great extent, and for his own part he should be loth to do anything to interfere with it. With regard to the intention of the Act, a high legal authority had held that it could not have been meant to compel the Sovereign, if she would prevent the union of her private estates to the general body of the Crown estates, either in the first place to tie them up, or in the second place to give them away from the Heir to the Crown, with a view of their coming back circuitously to some other person; or, thirdly, to give them to the Heir Apparent in his own lifetime, in either of which ways they might consequently become the private estates of the succeeding Sovereign. He thought the House would see that a policy like that would place the Sovereign in a very peculiar position—that of being compelled to leave property away from his or her own child, or to allow it to lapse into the mass of the Crown estate. He knew that this was an attractive thing to some minds; but he did not think that there was any good reason why it should be; at all events, it was not an alternative attractive to the Government. With regard to Balmoral, there could be no doubt that the Queen was free to leave it to whom she chose; but take the case of Osborne. If Osborne were to fall into the mass of Crown estates, it would have to be taken under the charge of the Commissioner of Works, and that House would be asked for a large sum of money for its maintenance as a Royal residence. It appeared to him that these outlying properties were of secondary importance, of no territorial importance whatever, and that it was for the interest of the public, considered in a pounds, shillings, and pence view of the question, that they should not become part of the Crown estates. There was another question about which there was no doubt whatever, and that was, that the Sovereign could bequeath her estates to the son of the Prince of Wales, or to the Heir presumptive; and what, in the name of common sense, could be the meaning of a law such as that which at present existed? However, there were gentlemen—he did not know whether there were any in that House—who urged a so-called constitutional doctrine, which was always entitled to respectful treatment. They said it was not constitutional or safe that great masses of property should be permitted to accumulate in the hands of the Sovereign; that the Sovereign ought to depend on Parliament; and that, if a Sovereign were to become a very great proprietor, that circumstance would have a tendency to disturb the Constitution with respect to the relation of the Sovereign to Parliament. What he should say in answer to that was this—In the first place, there was not the smallest likelihood of that House ever undergoing any serious trouble in consequence of a great accumulation of private wealth in the hands of the Sovereign. A great deal of trouble had been experienced from exactly the opposite process, and it was only during the present reign that they had learnt to look with any feeling of kindness on the economy and good husbandry of the Civil List. Even during the reign of George III., who was a Sovereign of considerable merit, Ministers were continually coming down to the House to ask for large sums of money to pay off the debts of the Civil List. It was for the interest of the country in every sense that there should be thrift and good husbandry in the Civil List, and, so far as economy was to be made out of it, to enable the Sovereign to purchase private property here and there. The Sovereign should be most welcome to the fruits of such economies, and it would be the worst economy in the world on the part of Parliament to have it otherwise. He should entertain no fear as to the accumulation of a large amount of property in the hands of the Sovereign, even if the arrangement between the Crown and Parliament were permanent; in fact, he considered it a spectral delusion on the part of the persons holding the idea. Centuries must elapse without the possibility of any great masses of property coming into the hands of the Sovereign to create either danger or inconvenience. The arrangement, however, between the Crown and Parliament was not permanent. Parliament had the power of considering the position of the Sovereign at the end of every reign, and the average duration of reigns did not extend to more than 20 or 30 years. The present reign was longer than the average, thank God, and long might it yet last; but by the ordinary law of human life, Parliament might three or four times in the course of a century have the opportunity of considering the position of the Sovereign with respect to private estates. When a demand was made on that House for the Civil List, that House had a right to take the whole subject into consideration, and would not scruple to avail itself of that right. If it were shown that the Sovereign was in possession of private wealth to the extent owned by some Dukes, Marquesses, Earls—ay, or even Commoners—if it were thought that the Sovereign had accumulated too much wealth for the safety of the Constitution, there would be no difficulty in making a settlement in the adjustment of the amount of the Civil List. That was the view of the Government—that there was no likelihood whatever of either danger or inconvenience arising in connection with the accumulation of private property in the hands of the Sovereign—a view which was strongly supported by the history of the present reign. The present reign had endured since 1837. It had completed its 36th year, and during those 36 years of the reign of Her Majesty, good management in the detail of expenditure had prevailed to a degree that was unexampled. As to the accumulation of property, everybody knew that the Royal estates were very moderate possessions indeed—of an extent which would not be of the slightest territorial consequence to almost any second-rate gentleman; while as regarded money, Her Majesty's fortune was moderate as compared with the sums possessed by hundreds and even thousands of our manufacturers, mine-owners, and merchants. If such was the result of a long-continued reign of unbroken providence and thrift, let us dismiss from our minds that bugbear as to either the danger or the inconvenience of the accumulation of large masses of property in the hands of the Sovereign. The House, he trusted, would see the desirability of giving effect to the measure, and remove that anomaly in the existing law which tended to check the natural action of family affection, and interfere with those conveniences which dictated arrangements between parent and family. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. ANDERSON, in rising to move—

"That it is inexpedient to extend the scope of the Act 25 and 26 Vic. c. 37, until the secrecy at present attaching exclusively to Crown testaments is abolished," said, that the right hon. Gentleman had told the House that that was a very simple Bill to remove a small injustice remaining from past legislation. He did not tell them that it was the result of the Act of 1862, with regard to which he (Mr. Anderson) did not think it was of so justifiable a character that they ought to extend its provisions. In fact, if legislation was desirable on the subject, he thought it ought to be directed to a repeal or an amendment of that Act. The right hon. Gentleman also said that the Amendment he (Mr. Anderson) had put on the Paper was not an Amendment which ought to be considered as an obstacle to the Bill. Perhaps not. He admitted that it was not a very large affair; but he had only put it down to prevent the Bill passing without opposition at some inordinately late hour in the morning, and he hoped that by doing so he should induce some hon. Member learned in the law to raise the great constitutional question as to the right of the Sovereign to dispose by will of land acquired out of the saving of the Civil List, and notwithstanding that no hon. Member had done so, he was not without hopes that a debate would be raised upon constitutional grounds. He did not pretend to be able to argue those points with the learning and skill of a lawyer, but those who were laymen and not lawyers always understood that the policy of our Constitution was that the Monarch ought not to have private estates at all, and that the House of Commons at the commencement of every reign took over the private estates of the Crown, and provided for the Sovereign in the Civil List. That argument had been used over and over again by the right hon. Gentleman himself when he came down to the House to ask it to vote various sums of money to Princes and Princesses, and generally to make provision for the younger sons of the Sovereign. They were always told on such occasions that they were bound to make such provisions, because, according to the Constitution, the Royal Family was never allowed to accumulate private property. He would leave others to argue that point; but as to the matter of secrecy, he had had occasion to speak to a great many hon. Members, and when he first stated that such secrecy existed, it was generally supposed that he was under a wrong impression, until they found out that it really did exist under the Act of 1862. That was verified by the fact that a gentleman presented himself a few days ago at the proper Department, and after tendering the usual fee, asked to be allowed to look at all the Royal wills since the reign of Henry VIII. The official was dumb-founded, and as soon as he could recover his breath, which was taken away by the idea that a "fellow" could have the audacity to make such a request, finding that the "fellow" persisted, referred him to a higher authority, who told him that he believed the Royal wills were always kept in Lambeth Palace, under the care of the Archbishop of Canterbury. He then referred the matter to the Archbishop, and he was told that they were not there; and that in fact the Archbishop did not know anything about them—so that of the fact of the secrecy there could be no question whatever. Now that that was a very improper secrecy, he thought no one could deny, and when the right hon. Gentleman said that the Amendment ought not to be brought forward as a bar to the second reading, but as an Amendment in Committee, he would at once say that if he would accept it in Committee there was no occasion to move it that evening, and he requested the immediate attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the proposition. There was no reason whatever why the will of any hon. Gentleman should be exhibited at Doctors' Commons to anybody who paid 1s., and that of the Monarch should not be subject to the like scrutiny. Not only was it wrong, but it had a very prejudicial effect in exciting suspicion in the minds of the public. People naturally said—"Why this secrecy?" It was a very suspicious thing to have those Royal wills bottled up, so that no one could see them. There was probably nothing wrong in them, and no earthly reason why they should be concealed. To put them, then, on the same footing as those of other people would remove all suspicion. Some of the right hon. Gentleman's arguments were such as he could attach no weight whatever to; such as that about Osborne House. "Oh," said he, "if Osborne House were thrown upon the nation, there would be so much a-year asked of the House of Commons for the purpose of keeping it up as a royal residence." He (Mr. Anderson) did not see why any difficulty could not at once be put an end to, by selling it. Then the right hon. Gentleman had made a great deal about how economically the Privy Purse had been managed by the Queen. Her present most gracious Majesty was greatly to be honoured and commended for the way in which she had managed the Civil List allowances; but still it was to be remembered that the amount which was given was a very liberal one, and quite sufficient to keep up the dignity of the Crown. Then the question arose—had the dignity of the Crown been kept up properly? He would not himself say anything on the point, but certainly it had been said abroad and frequently out-of-doors at home that it had not been. The House of Commons did not give the Queen an ample Civil List, merely that she might economize the amount for the purpose of buying landed estates as the right hon. Gentleman suggested; and under that lay the whole theory of the Bill. It was impossible to forget that a year and a-half ago, when a Motion was made for the appropriation of the Civil List, Parliament, it was pointed out, had by the Act granting the Civil List put it under five heads, and they would not have done that, had it not intended to exercise some supervision over them. It was exceedingly doubtful whether Parliament would permit the surplus of one branch to be expended in aid of another. If so, the word in the Act would be that it should be applied to "increase" another. Whatever was the intention of Parliament as to how the surplus was appropriated, the House would remember that on that occasion, the information which was required was refused, and he could not help saying that, instead of that having something to do with the opposition to the Bill, it had something to do with the bringing in of the Bill. He thought he ought to take the opinion of the House on the subject, unless the right hon. Gentleman would give him the assurance that an Amendment would be introduced in Committee to the effect he had stated. Failing that, he should move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is inexpedient to extend the scope of the Act 25 and 26 Vic. c. 37, until the secrecy at present attaching exclusively to Crown testaments is abolished,"—(Mr. Anderson.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. GOLDNEY thought the House was bound in common honesty to pass the Bill, the object of which was merely to clear up a doubt which had arisen upon the Act of 1862. All it contemplated was, that property which went by the disposition of the Queen to her Heir should be held by him as private property, and should not be treated as Crown property, in the event of such Heir succeeding to the Throne. He thought that there was no ground to justify the proposal of the Amendment which had been placed upon the Paper, to render it compulsory that the will of the Sovereign should be published as those of ordinary persons were when they were proved. While allowing that the practice was necessary in order to enable people to ascertain and test any rights they might conceive themselves possessed of under a will, he saw no reason why the intentions of the testator should in any case be communicated to the idle and the curious on payment of £.; but such a practice would be especially inconvenient in the case of the Sovereign. The Bill only gave power to the Sovereign to deal with her private property in the same way as an individual, subject, of course, to that property being liable to all the ordinary burdens.

MR. CLAY agreed with the Prime Minister in all he had said except upon one point. He thought there was a very general feeling in the country against secrecy being maintained with regard to Royal wills. He said with the utmost sincerity that he had not the slightest suspicion anything was wrong; but wherever there was concealment, there was always suspicion of something being behind. He could not himself conceive any reasonable ground why these wills should not be made public like other wills. He did not think the question of gratifying an idle curiosity at all entered into the matter.

MR. BOUVERIE said, the object of the Amendment was to have the wills of the Sovereigns treated in the same way as those of ordinary subjects. The reasons why those wills were not public did not arise, he believed, from any desire of secrecy, but from the technical fact that they were not on the register of the Court. No will was placed on the register until it passed the seal of the Court to authenticate it, but the King's will was not sealed, nor could it be attested by his own seal. That would be merely authenticating his own act in his own Court. When George II. ascended the Throne, the then Archbishop of Canterbury came down to the first meeting of the Privy Council with the will of George I. in his pocket. When the Archbishop exhibited it, George II. asked to see it, and the moment he received it, he put it into his pocket, and it had never been heard of since. There was a document, however, which it was desirable the Government should produce. He meant the opinion of the late Lord Westbury.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the opinion was a verbal one. As such, he was not in possession of the words, but had given what he considered was the substance of that opinion.

MR. BOUVERIE said, that if the opinion were correct, there was no need whatsoever for the Bill. What the Bill proposed to do, was to alter the principle of the succession of the private estates of the Sovereign, in order to prevent them from falling into the general property of the Crown when the person to whom they were bequeathed succeeded to the Sovereignty. The 2nd section of the Bill extended the operation of the Act of 1833 respecting the law of inheritances to the Crown. Of course, everybody knew that unless an Act of Parliament specially applied to the Crown, the Crown was not affected by it, and as the Act of 1833 did not specially apply to the inheritances of the Crown, they were excluded from its operation. Before the passing of that statute, if any person devised lands to his heir by will, on the death of the testator, the heir took the lands as heir and not as devisee. But by the statute of William IV. the heir would take as devisee and not by inheritance. The consequence was, that lands left to the Heir of the Crown by the Sovereign were taken still under the old Common Law by the successor not as devisee under the will, but as Heir to the Crown, and the lands thus fell into the hereditary estate of the Crown, and could not be alienated under the statute of Anne. The policy of Parliament for a considerable time had been that the management of the hereditary estates of the Crown should be undertaken by Parliament, who in return gave a certain fixed sum to the Sovereign with which to pay the expenses of the Household and certain other charges. Hon. Members were probably aware that during the reigns of Anne, George

I., and George II., the present arrangement, as regarded the Civil List, did not exist, but a certain revenue was provided for the Crown by appropriating to the Sovereign for life certain hereditary estates and Customs and other dues. But when George III. succeeded, he handed over all the hereditary estates of the Crown to Parliament, and received in return a large fixed revenue, amounting in the whole, including certain revenues derived from the West Indies, Scotland, Ireland, and other sources, to upwards of £1,000,000 per annum, out of which he had to provide for the discharge of certain public duties. But, notwithstanding that, the Crown was in perpetual difficulties, and constantly coming to Parliament for grants in aid of the Civil List. The allegation was constantly made that the revenues of the Crown were largely employed for corrupt purposes, and that they found their way into the pockets of Members of either House of Parliament, and were used in carrying on the Parliamentary system of that day, which was more or less carried on by corruption. Accordingly, when William IV. came to the Throne he not only transferred the hereditary revenues of the Crown to Parliament, but all the other revenues to which he had referred with the exception of the Duchy of Lancaster, which still formed part of the Privy Purse of Her Majesty. When Her Majesty succeeded to the Throne, a Committee composed of the most eminent Members of that House considered the subject, and went into a minute investigation of the cost of maintaining the dignity of the Crown. They allocated certain sums in respect of certain classes of expenditure, as for the Lord Chamberlain, the Lord Steward, the Pension List, and so forth, and proposed to the House of Commons that the Civil List should be fixed at £385,000 a-year, the Crown no longer to pay the expenses of the Civil Service for Judges, &c., which were not immediately connected with the Civil List. The policy of Parliament had been, therefore, since the Revolution, that the Crown at each accession should have a definite fixed sum allocated for the purpose of maintaining the dignity and honour of the Crown, and that all the rest should be under the management and authority of Parliament. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that with regard to money it was impossible to make any provisions; but the lands were visible, and he maintained that they ought to continue the policy hitherto pursued—namely, fix at the accession the proper sum to maintain the honour and dignity of the Crown munificently and generously, and take over the management of the Crown property. But the result of that Bill so far as it had any operation at all, would be that whatever private estate of the Crown might now under the former Acts be at the disposal of Her Majesty during her lifetime, if left to the successor to the Crown, would no longer form part of the hereditary revenues, as they would do under Common Law, but would be the private estate of the Crown of which it had to render no account. That he held to be a retrogressive policy. He did not mean to say that in the lifetime of the present generation the Crown was likely to accumulate great private estates like those to which he had alluded. But the principle contended for by his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government was ill-judged, and if adopted might be the cause of much future trouble. It was all very well for his right hon. Friend to pooh-pooh that line of argument; but what had been done once might be done again, and it might at some future time be found very convenient by those who wielded the Prerogative of the Crown in that House to have at their command large independent means, of which no account had to be rendered to Parliament. The principle which he was advocating had been contended for a century ago by such men as Burke and Chatham, and he was strongly of opinion that the House of Commons would be taking the right course in restricting the Crown as far as possible to the revenues voted by Parliament at every accession. Any other course, such as that proposed by the present measure, must tend to initiate a new and a wrong policy. One of its most prominent results would be to prevent any such periodical revision of the arrangements to be made between Parliament and the Crown, and he was therefore opposed to it. The question was one, he might add, which was of as great importance to the Crown itself as to Parliament. It had hitherto been the practice that the Civil List was settled on the accession of the Sovereign, irrespective of the allowance to the children when they grew up, or were about to be married. When the occasion for such a provision arose, those who objected to it in that House had been always met—and successfully met by the answer that the arrangement with the Crown had been entered into without regard to any such expense. But how would the case stand if they were to proceed on the supposition that there were to be large private estates attached to the Crown which might go on accumulating indefinitely? Would not the House of Commons be then fully justified in saying—"We do not know the amount of these revenues. The Crown has very large estates throughout the country, and we do not, therefore, feel called upon to provide for the children of the Sovereign?" That appeared to him to be a position in which it would be disadvantageous to the Crown itself to be placed, and he must, therefore, despite the ingenuity of his right hon. Friend, characterize the policy for which he contended as one of retrogression. In what he had said, he had considered it right to point out what he believed to be fallacious in the ingenious speech of the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Bouvierie

MR. MUNTZ entirely concurred in the view expressed by the last speaker. The object of the Bill was to do away with the course of policy which had been deemed by our ancestors necessary to the welfare of the State. No doubt, the House would be very loth to interfere in any way with the private effects of the Sovereign; but that was a question dealing with landed property. Under the present arrangements the Crown could not leave landed property by will to the Heir to the Throne as private property; because such bequest might interfere with the settlement of the Civil List when the Heir succeeded to the Throne, and it would be very unwise to interfere with such an arrangement. The Civil List was granted to the Crown in return for the Crown property, and there was an understanding that that House would be prepared to make proper settlements upon the children of the Sovereign when they came of age or were married; but if the Crown was permitted to hold private property, and could in a long series of successions accumulate a large amount of landed property, on what ground could that House be called upon to provide allowances for the children of the Sovereign?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the subject before the House was one of considerable difficulty, and he would endeavour to explain it as well as he could; but he was not at all sure it would be easy to follow his statement. The doubt which the Bill was intended to solve arose from the peculiar wording of the Act of George III. That Act enabled the Sovereign to dispose of two classes of estates. The first class consisted of estates which the Sovereign purchased out of his own money, acquired by means of the savings of his Privy Purse, or which arose from personal estate given or left to him. The second class consisted of real estates which were left to him by will, or which had descended, or should descend to him from any person not being a King or Queen of these realms. The reason of the latter exception was quite obvious. The words were used in the past as well as in the future tense, and if Kings and Queens were not excepted, pretty well the whole of the Crown property would have fallen under the description of private property. The House would see that the reason of the exception had really nothing to do with the Sovereign to whom that property was given, devising to a future Sovereign; but had to do with the nature of the property which had come to him, and which was intended to be alienable as private property. The effect of the statute was this—Some lawyers were of opinion that under the first words of the statute, the property acquired by means of savings of the Privy Purse was for ever taken out of the statute of Anne. Some lawyers opined that that property remained alienable for ever; and if that view was correct, the Bill was not wanted. The other view was, that the second alternative of the section, showed the intention of the Legislature was that the first words should be read distributively and should only apply to the King for the time being; and that was the meaning of the doubt which was referred to in the Preamble of the Bill. There was a great deal to be said on both sides; it was undoubtedly an extremely difficult point, and the object of the Bill was to get rid of the doubt. The old Act was supposed by some of the Members who had spoken to have presented a difficulty as to Her Majesty disposing of her private estate in favour of the Prince of Wales; but what difficulty was there in the way of Her Majesty giving estates to the Prince of Wales? None; the difficulty was, whether the Prince of Wales, if he should become King, could alienate the estates. There was no doubt entertained by any lawyer as to the power of Her Majesty to give these estates to the Prince of Wales; the doubt was, when he had got them, could he alienate them? Any conveyancer would tell the House that that difficulty could be got over with the greatest ease—for instance, by Her Majesty making a will in a peculiar form not to give the property to the Prince of Wales absolutely, but to direct it to be sold, with his consent, the income and proceeds to be given to him for his life, and after his decease to go to his eldest son absolutely. It was quite clear under that disposition, that they would not become Crown estates at all. The object of the Bill was to give the Prince the power of alienation; not to enrich the Crown, but to impoverish the Crown by getting rid of the estates. He wished to say a few words about the supposed secrecy or concealment of Crown wills. There could not be a greater mistake. The word concealment was entirely inappropriate; concealment and non-disclosure were totally distinct things.

[Laughter.] Yes, there was a difference. The charge of concealment implied an obligation to disclose, but there was no obligation on the Sovereign to disclose the contents of the will disposing of his or her real estate. He or she was, in fact, in the same position as regarded this point as any private individual. Wills of real estate—and this Bill only applied to real estate—did not require probate. Every owner of land could, if he thought fit, make a separate will of his real estate, and no one need know what his testamentary dispositions were. He (the Solicitor General) had seen very many such wills, which in former days were much more common than now. It was a mistake to suppose that the Crown was in a different position as regarded the testamentary disposition of landed property from any other individual. The real complaint of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) was that Her Majesty's ancestors had simply done that which hundreds of private gentlemen had done—namely, by putting their wills of real estate upon separate pieces of paper, they had not allowed the world to know what their dispositions of real estate were. The Bill had nothing whatever to do with dispositions of personal estate; and as regarded those dispositions it was by mere accident that the public could ascertain the contents of the wills of private individuals which were in the Court of Probate. There was nothing to hinder the Court of Probate from stopping the practice to-morrow. The present practice of exposing the affairs of a private individual to satisfy the public curiosity almost as soon as the breath was out of his body had been very much abused, and had caused great annoyance and even pecuniary loss. A word now about the Civil List. Hon. Members said that if on a future occasion the House should be about to settle the Civil List, and the Crown should be in possession of large landed estates, it might affect the settlement. Certainly it might; but before the House of Commons settled the Civil List it would ask for a statement of what this property consisted of. Had the House never heard of such inquiry being made into the revenues derived from the Duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster? The result would probably be that the next Sovereign would take care that all his accumulations assumed the shape of personality, as to which no such suggestion could fairly be made; although the House could call for a return even of personality, before granting the sum which they thought necessary to support the dignity and power of the Crown. The right hon. Gentleman reminded him that in the case of the Prince of Wales such an inquiry was made and answered before an allowance was given to him. The Bill was really intended to get rid of a difficult legal question; by no means to increase the property of the Crown, but so far rather to diminish it by enabling the Sovereign for the time being to dispose of private property with any conditions he or she might think proper; in point of fact, to dispose of it as they pleased.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Mr. Speaker—To some people it seems a hardship that we should deal with the Royal Family in a way different from that in which we deal with any other family in the country. There is a certain plausibility at first sight in the view that the King should be allowed to receive legacies or other gifts of money, or to make savings upon his income, and to invest them in any manner that he may please. I will not go into the right or wrong, or the policy or impolicy of the matter. All that I will contend is that we have broken through the old practice of the Constitution in this respect, and are following neither the one principle nor the other. In old times the King was not allowed to hold private property. Land he could not have at all, and such personality as he might accumulate went of necessity, and in right of his Crown, to the succeeding Monarch. On the other hand, when the Kings informed Parliament that their children had grown up and were needing separate maintenance, and that by the law of the land no funds existed for that maintenance, they did so in the following terms:—"Whereas His Majesty is restrained by the Laws now in being from making provision for his younger children"—and Parliament used then to make a moderate provision—but not "to take effect till after His Majesty's demise." If the Royal Family are to be subject to no disabilities, are to be treated in every way like private individuals, then clearly it should follow that it is the duty of the Royal Family to provide for the maintenance of its younger branches. I repeat, that at the present time we are following neither the one course nor the other. We do impose disabilities on the Royal Family, especially those of the Royal Marriage Act, and we are allowing them by this and previous Bills to create a perpetual secret entail of private lands, as to which we have no information. We are allowing a wholly exceptional privacy to the Royal wills, and at the same time we are continuing to provide those dowries and annuities for the younger members of the family, in favour of which the ancient Constitutional argument that I have quoted cannot be used. That, Sir, is my case against this Bill, which continues the policy of the Act of 1862, and which facilitates the creation of the secret entail of which I speak. The Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow covers only one portion of the ground. It strikes at the secrecy which attends the formation of a private estate for the Crown, and it strikes only at that secrecy on one side. It is aimed at the secrecy of the will. As to the fact of that secrecy there can, I apprehend, be no doubt. At the Wills Office inquirers are informed that the Royal wills are not there, but that they may possibly be found in the Archi-Episcopal Registry at Lambeth. At Lambeth, it turns out on application that nothing is known about them, and I repeat that there can be no doubt about the fact. On the other hand, I could almost wish that my hon. Friend, in his desire for a wholesome publicity, had asked that as a condition precedent to the passing of this Bill we should be promised a publication of accounts, and I would suggest to him that in Committee he should move a clause similar to that which in an Act of the present reign commands the publication of the receipts and disbursements of the Duchy of Lancaster. By the publication of accounts we should see whether the provisions of the Acts of Parliament relating to these estates are observed, and our successors at the beginning of the next reign would be in possession of information which would show them how far the Crown might have become independent of the Votes of Parliament. Let me return, Sir, for one moment to the main question—namely, the Constitutional practice on this point of the tenure of private lands by the occupant of the Throne. It is interesting to look at the care exercised in former times to prevent that accumulation of private property by the Crown which by this Bill, and by the Act of 1862, we positively facilitate. The preamble of the Act of 1862 recites an Act of Anne and an Act of George III., which wholly restrain the Sovereign for the time being from dealing permanently with land, and which take the King's revenue from lands for public purposes. It recites other Acts which show that when in later times the Crown began to be allowed to hold small estates privately, an exception was made of land coming to a King from ancestors who were "Kings or Queens of this realm." The principle which I have called the ancient Constitutional principle, and in support of which I can produce an overwhelming weight of authority, was acted upon to a most striking extent in the case of the Duchy of Lancaster. It was the private property of an individual who happened to come to the Crown of England. Yet it is, and long has been, administered through a public Minister changing with the changes of the Government. Its accounts are presented to Parliament; its amount is considered in settling the income of a Sovereign at the beginning of a reign. I said that I could produce an overwhelming weight of authority in favour of the view that it is unwise to allow the Crown to hold private property in land. The hon. Member for Finsbury has pointed out in his book on India, that the reason why Pitt objected to undertake the conquest of Bengal in the name of the Crown, was lest the King should thus obtain a source of income independent of Parliament. Mr. Burke and Mr. Fox I quoted last year in support of the same view, as I did the remarkable words of Field Marshal Conway, who, in his speech in support of Mr. Burke's Bill, said—

"Even the propriety of interfering, not only in the selling of the private property of the Crown, but in the appropriation of the money arising from the sales of that property, is a principle admitted in this House and approved by Lord North."

That great authority of the Whigs, Mr. Allen, in his book on The Royal Prerogative, says that—

"It has become a maxim of English law that all lands and tenements possessed by the King belong to him in right of the Crown, and descend with it to his successors, though he had been seized of them in his private capacity before he was King or had inherited them from ancestors, who were never invested with the attributes of Royalty."

At the beginning of the present reign, in a great speech upon this subject, Mr. Daniel Whittle Harvey said—

"The Crown could have no possession either in money or in land, which was not properly under the control of Parliament, and though the House might now be induced to act a crouching and subservient part, both old and modern times could assert and authorize this doctrine. It was the doctrine of Burke; it was the doctrine of Fox; and in more modern times it was the doctrine of the President of the Council, who, in the other House in 1816, repudiated the notion that the Crown could possess any property of its own."

The hon. Member for Liskeard was one of those who supported Mr. Harvey on that occasion. This was the opinion of Sir George Lewis, who on the 22nd of May, 1857, said—

"It has been deemed a matter of policy in this country wholly to strip and denude the Sovereign of all hereditary property, and to render him during his life entirely dependent upon the bounty of Parliament"—[3 Hansard, cixv. 724.]

These opinions laid down in Coke upon Littleton, by Pitt, by Burke, by Fox, by John Allen, and by Sir George Lewis, were acted upon by Parliament in the case of the Brighton Pavilion, and, I think I may add, have never as yet been denied by any Minister of the Crown. We shall probably be told that there is no danger of the Crown becoming independent of Parliament, and that the private landed estates are still small. They may be small in this country, and large in the colonies; but in any case this is a reason for our wishing to know the amount, and hence for the publication of the accounts. Even supposing that the estates are small now, they may become enormous at any moment without our knowing it, owing to the non-publication of the will and the non-publication of accounts. Persons desirous of notoriety may in the future, as they have in the past, leave enormous legacies to the King. Moreover, are these estates so small? The Privy Purse receives £32,000 a-year more from the Duchy of Lancaster than it did at the beginning of the reign. At the beginning of the reign the payment to the King from the Duchy of Lancaster was £8,000 a-year, and is now £40,000. The savings on the Civil List applied to the Privy Purse—in consequence of the refusal of my Motion of last year, and the suppression of the Returns since Lord Brougham's Motion in the Lords in 1851—are not known, but cannot for a great many years have been less than £20,000 a-year, and may have been double or treble that sum. I think, therefore, that it may be said that the King of England—looking to the fact that the Privy Purse is clear of almost all the charges which fall upon the Privy Purse in other countries—is by far the richest of monarchs. Last year the Prime Minister contended that the savings were not large, because £20,000 a-year in new pensions, chargeable on the Privy Purse, had been created during the present reign, but when Parliament has laid down, in Act after Act, the principles which guide the bestowal of pensions, it is highly unconstitutional that these pensions should be granted at all without our knowledge, and one of the greatest dangers arising from that accumulation of private property by the Crown which is now going on lies in the fact that such pensions may without any restriction as to amount and character be secretly created. I have no doubt that the Conservative front bench will support this Bill, because since our last debate upon these subjects we have had the pleasure of reading the memoirs of Baron Stockmar, the Royal Physician, in which he states that "all questions affecting the Crown are now treated confidentially with the heads of the opposition"—a proceeding the constitutional spirit of which I take leave to doubt.

DR. BALL must tell his hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea that he was entirely mistaken. He objected altogether to lawyers giving their opinions on legal questions, or debating them, simply as agents of political parties. The course which he took on this Bill was his own, and he looked at the Bill as he would look at any other. What was the Resolution now before the House?

"That it is inexpedient to extend the scope of the Act 25 and 26 Vic. c. 37, until the secrecy at present attaching exclusively to Crown testaments is abolished."

He entirely agreed with the hon. and learned Solicitor General; indeed, it was seldom that lawyers disagreed about the law—that if the instrument disposed of nothing but realty, there was no obligation on any person to disclose the contents of the instrument. The tenure of landed property did not lie in the probate, but in the original instrument. He did not, therefore, agree that there was as to realty an exclusive power of secrecy in the Crown. As regarded personalty, there was. But that was an extremely secondary matter. The real question appeared to him to be that raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouvierie). The great learning and sound judgment his right hon. Friend brought to bear on every constitutional question made him most reluctant to differ from him; but he was utterly unable to see the wisdom of making a prohibition on the Sovereign's power of disposing of private property so as to give the Heir to the Crown an ownership in it. Sovereigns were not in that respect different from other people, and if the Sovereign was fettered in the gift—if they jealously interfered with the terms and conditions of the gift—the Sovereign would give in the direction where there was unlimited and absolute power. That was human nature. So far as policy, he thought it was in favour of encouraging to give to the Heir who would be Sovereign. The wealth of the Sovereign was part of the wealth of the country. The Sovereign was not a private individual, but, in a representative character, stood at the head of the nation. He was unable to follow the argument of the right hon. Gentleman with respect to the change introduced in the law of England in 1833-4. Prior to that, the Heir took by descent, not by purchase. The law was altered—why? Because the ablest Commission that ever sat on the law recommended the alteration; and the Heir now took by purchase, not by descent. And why should the Crown by any technicality be excluded from the benefit of that change of the law? The opinion of Lord Westbury had been referred to, and it was in favour of the Crown. He was prepared on that opinion to say that as regarded the Sovereign, it would not be just to withhold their support from the Bill. With respect to the opinion, he could not examine it critically, for such was the eminent legal learning and ability of that great lawyer who had now gone from among us, he would be inclined to exclaim "Malleum cum Platone errare quam cum aliis recte sentire."

MR. JAMES must say, with great deference to his hon. Friends around him, that the objections they had raised to this Bill appeared to him to rest on insufficient grounds, and that they were to a great extent founded on a misapprehension of the probable effects of the measure. It was somewhat amusing to observe the alliance between the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) and what was called the old Constitutional doctrine asserted by his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), to which he had attached himself with something like hereditary feelings. That doctrine—that the Crown could not deal with private property, however, was annihilated when once the Crown obtained the power, and that had created an entirely new state of things. In fact the speech of the right hon. Member against the Bill ought to have been made 74 years ago. When the popular party associated with the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea came to use the same language, that would give rise to a misapprehension out-of-doors that the Bill was an innovation, and that an attempt was being made to increase the power of the Crown: It was almost absurd, particularly when they had in public opinion a greater corrective than in any statute, and more especially while they had such a doughty exponent of public opinion in that House as the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea, to fear that the power of the Crown was going to be increased, because the Crown might leave landed property to one descendant as well as to another, a privilege to which he could see no objection. The public had greater interest in property following the Crown and the State than in its being devised to strangers. Suppose the occupant of the Throne left property to a stranger, how would the public benefit? If it went to the successor to the Crown there would not need to be such a large Civil List as would otherwise be required. This Bill did not impose the secrecy objected to by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), who, if he would remove it, should move to repeal the original Act; but the secrecy was most shadowy, for large properties could not be left and enjoyed without the knowledge of the public. He could not see the least objection to the Bill.

MR. ANDERSON said, as it appeared that hon. Members desired to take a division on the Main Question rather than on that raised by his Amendment, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 167; Noes 35: Majority 132.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

AYES.

Adderley, rt. hon. Sir C.	Brassey, T.
Amphlett, R. P.	Brewer, Dr.
Ayrton, rt. hon. A. S.	Bright, R.
Baines, E.	Brinckman, Captain
Ball, rt. hon. J. T.	Bristowe, S. B.
Barclay, A. C.	Brocklehurst, W. C.
Barclay, J. W.	Brown, A. H.
Barttelot, Colonel	Bruce, rt. hon. H. A.
Bassett, F.	Buller, Sir E. M.
Bates, E.	Burrell, Sir P.
Baxter, rt. hon. W. E.	Campbell-Bannerman, H.
Blennerhassett, Sir R.	Cardwell, rt. hon. E.
Bonham-Carter, J.	Cartwright, W. C.
Bowring, E. A.	Cavendish, Lord F. C.
Brassey, H. A.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

Colebrooke, Sir T. E.
 Coleridge, Sir J. D.
 Collins, T.
 Corrigan, Sir D.
 Cowper-Temple, right hon. W.
 Craufurd, E. H. J.
 Dalrymple, D.
 Davies, R.
 Denison, C. B.
 Dent, J. D.
 Dickinson, S. S.
 Dimsdale, R.
 Dixon, G.
 Dowdeswell, W. E.
 Duff, M. E. G.
 Dyott, Colonial R.
 Edwards, H.
 Enfield, Viscount
 Ewing, A. Orr
 Fielden, J.
 Figgins, J.
 Finch, G. H.
 FitzGerald, right hon. Lord O. A.
 Fitzwilliam, hon. C. W. W.
 Fitzwilliam, hon. H. W.
 Fletcher, I.
 Forster, rt. hon. W. E.
 Foster, W. H.
 Fortescue, rt. hon. C.P.
 Fowler, R. N.
 Fowler, W.
 Garnier, J. C.
 Gilpin, Colonel
 Gladstone, rt. hon. W. E.
 Gladstone, W. H.
 Goldney, G.
 Goldamid, Sir F.
 Goldsmid, J.
 Gordon, E. S.
 Gore, J. R. O.
 Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.
 Graham, W.
 Gray, Colonel
 Greville, hon. Captain
 Grieve, J. J.
 Grosvenor, hon. N.
 Grosvenor, Lord R.
 Hardy, rt. hon. G.
 Hartington, Marq. of Hay, Sir J. C. D.
 Henley, rt. hon. J. W.
 Heygate, Sir F. W.
 Heygate, W. U.
 Hibbert, J. T.
 Holford, J. P. G.
 Holland, S.
 Holt, J. M.
 Hope, A. J. B. B.
 Hoskyns, C. Wren-Hurst, R. H.
 James, H.
 Jardine, R.
 Jessel, Sir G.
 Johnston, A.
 Kavanagh, A. MacM.
 Kensington, Lord Kingscote, Colonel Knatchbull-Hugesson, right hon. E.
 Knight, F. W.

Lacon, Sir E. H. K.
 Lambert, N. G.
 Lancaster, J.
 Lawrence, W.
 Lefevre, G. J. S.
 Leith, J. F.
 Lennox, Lord G. G.
 Lindsay, hon. Col. C.
 Lowe, rt. hon. R.
 Lusk, A.
 Lyttelton, hon. C. G.
 Mackintosh, E. W.
 Mc'Legan, F.
 Matheson, A.
 Miller, W.
 Mitchell, T. A.
 Monsell, rt. hon. W.
 Morgan, G. O.
 Nicholson, W.
 O'Reilly-Dease, M.
 Pakington, rt. hon. Sir J.
 Patten, rt. hon. Col. W.
 Peel, A. W.
 Pemberton, E. L.
 Pim, J.
 Potter, E.
 Power, J. T.
 Raikes, H. C.
 Rathbone, W.
 Reed, C.
 Round, J.
 Sackville, S. G. S.
 Slater-Booth, G.
 Scourfield, J. H.
 Sinclair, Sir J. G. T.
 Smith, S. G.
 Stansfeld, rt. hon. J.
 Stapleton, J.
 Stone, W. H.
 Storks, rt. hon. Sir H. K.
 Straight, D.
 Stuart, hon. H. W. V.
 Talbot, C. R. M.
 Tipping, W.
 Tollemache, hon. F. J.
 Tollemache, Maj. W. F.
 Torr, J.
 Torrens, W. T. M'C.
 Tracy, hon. C. R. D.
 Hanbury-Trevelyan, G. O.
 Trevor, Lord A. E. Hill-Turner, C.
 Turnor, E.
 Verney, Sir H.
 Vivian, A. P.
 Wait, W. K.
 Wallace, Sir R.
 Walpole, rt. hon. S. H.
 Watney, J.
 Wedderburn, Sir D.
 Welby, W. E.
 West, H. W.
 Wheelhouse, W. S. J.
 Whitwell, J.
 Williams, W.
 Wingfield, Sir C.
 Winterbotham, H. S. P.
 Woods, H.
 Young, rt. hon. G.
 TELLERS.
 Adam, W. P.
 Glyn, hon. G. G.

NOES.

Bright, J. (Manchester)
 Buckley, N.
 Butt, I.
 Candlish, J.
 Carter, R. M.
 Chadwick, D.
 Clay, J.
 Dilke, Sir C. W.
 Dillwyn, L. L.
 Downing, M'C.
 Finnie, W.
 Gray, Sir J.
 Ilkingworth, A.
 Lawton, Sir W.
 Locke, J.
 Lubbock, Sir J.
 McLaren, D.
 Melly, G.
 Miall, E.

Miller, J.
 Monk, C. J.
 Morley, S.
 Mundella, A. J.
 Muntz, P. H.
 Norwood, C. M.
 Philips, R. N.
 Price, W. E.
 Rylands, P.
 Samuelson, H. B.
 Shaw, R.
 Sherriff, A. C.
 Stuart, Colonel
 Taylor, P. A.
 White, J.
 Willyams, E. W. B.
 TELLERS.
 Anderson, G.
 Bouvierie, rt. hon. E. P.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACT (1869) AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 207.]

(Mr. William Edward Forster, Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. William Edward Forster.)

MR. DILLWYN, in moving, as an Amendment, That the Bill be read a second time that day three months, said, that for very many years the endowed schools of the country, which were very numerous, had, in consequence of what he contended was a false construction of the law, been to a great extent monopolized by the Church of England. The Courts had decided that vague and general words, such as that trustees or managers of schools should be honest men, or that the children should be taught godly learning, meant that the trustees should be members of the Church of England, and that the children should receive their education in conformity with the doctrines of that Church. No doubt, many of them were expressly founded for the purpose of bringing up and educating the scholars in the doctrines of the Church, in addition to the classical and secular education given. He himself brought in a Bill the object of which was to endeavour to break down the objectionable state of the law relating to those endowed schools, for the reason that the system of management of those schools gave great offence to Dissenters and the country at large; and it was not only the intolerant course of conduct pursued by the Church of England trustees, but the way in which those schools were mismanaged by the party that was objectionable, and those two clauses led to an alteration of the Act, and to the passing of the Act of 1869. That Act had met with such general approval that had the present measure been a mere Continuance Bill it would have received his cordial support; but he objected to several of its provisions, especially the 5th clause. In placing the schools under the Commissioners the House had determined that they should be governed by a body responsible to Parliament and the country. Sectarian teaching and sectarian teachers therefore ought to be excluded, in accordance with the principle thus established; and, in fact, he did not see any reason why any good practical working man should not be on the trusts. He altogether objected to officials of the Church of England being trustees by virtue of their office. They might be altogether unfitted for such a position—indolent, quarrelsome, or litigious—and yet they could not be removed. Worse still, they might in the present exceptional position of the Church be opposed in doctrine and practice to a great body of their parishioners, and yet they must remain ex officio trustees. That provision was the more unjust when it was considered that members of other religious bodies were practically excluded from acting in the trusts; and if ever they did get upon them, might be easily removed, if incompetent. He did not thus speak of the objection reasonably urged by Dissenters where they were in a majority, as they were in Wales, but of that of Churchmen themselves. Very recently the Archbishops of the Church had stated that a very large section of the clergy of the Church of England was making innovations and using practices which they characterized as being highly dangerous to the interests of the Church, but under the Bill those men, by virtue of their position, would be and remain trustees of the schools. He also altogether objected to the exclusion, by the 6th clause, of some of the schools from the operation and, consequently, from the benefits of the Act, and could not see on what principles such a provision had been adopted. The recommendation of the Select Committee did not at all justify such an alteration in the law, and for his part, he would rather see the Bill lost than that such a provision should be sanctioned by the House. It would upset a principle which they had fought hard to establish, and he could not be a party to any retrograde movement on the subject, and for that reason he felt bound to move the rejection of the Bill.

MR. LEATHAM*: Mr. Speaker, in rising, Sir, to second the Motion of my hon. Friend, I think it fortunate that he placed this Notice upon the Paper, because it would have been highly inconvenient if a measure of this importance had passed through the principal stage without debate. My hon. Friend has stated his objections to the Bill, and, at this hour, I do not propose to follow him over the same ground. But the Bill is objectionable not only on account of what it contains, but on account of what it does not contain. I object to it because it makes no provision whatever for the regulation of the constitution of the Governing Bodies. Now, when my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council was moving the second reading of the Endowed Schools Bill, in 1869, he made use of words which it is scarcely an exaggeration to say were calculated to raise the hopes of half the nation. He reminded us that new ideas have power to-day, as in the time when England was waking up to take the foremost place in the march of Christian civilization.

"This new central idea," he said, "bringing with it many others—that no special class is to guide the destinies of England." "That England, for the future, is to be self-governed; all her citizens taking their share, not by class distinction, but by social worth."—[3 Hansard, ccxlv. 1382.]

And, in taking his stand upon those principles, my right hon. Friend was simply enforcing the spirit of that document which he held in his hand—for every word of which he considered himself responsible, and upon which, by the terms of the Preamble, his Bill was based—the unanimous Report of the Schools Inquiry Commission. Let hon. Gentlemen turn to the Report, and see how from one end to the other, it is pervaded by those new and generous ideas to which my right hon. Friend appealed.

"No skill in organization," say the Commissioners, (p. 640) "no careful adaptation of the means in hand to the best ends, can do as much for education as the earnest co-operation of the people. The American schools appear to have no great excellence of method, nor a very well selected system of studies, nor any thorough inspection, nor any skilful gradation of the schools in relation to each other. But the schools are in the hands of the people, and from this fact they derive a force which seems to make up for all their deficiencies. The Scotch schools owe their success, in a great measure, to the same cause. And in Zurich the schools are absolutely in the hands of the people, and the complete success of the system must be largely ascribed to this cause. It is impossible to doubt that, in England also, superior management, if it were backed up by very hearty sympathy from the mass of the people, would often succeed better than much greater skill without such support." And, as though they thought that they had not laid sufficient stress upon this principle in the course of their recommendations, they return to it, evidently with the view of giving to it the utmost emphasis at the close.

"But the real force," say they, "by which the work is to be done must come from the people, and every arrangement which fosters the interest of the people in the schools, which teaches the people to look on the schools as their own, which encourages them to take a share in the management, will do at least as much service as the wisest advice and the most skilful administration."

It was from a profound conviction of the truth of these principles that the Commission desired to liberalize to the utmost the constitution of the provincial Boards, to which they proposed to entrust the duty of preparing schemes for the management of all the schools in their districts; and it was in the same spirit of fairness to all, and with the same determination of securing the co-operation of all, that they proceeded to lay down the rules by which, in their opinion, the constitution of Boards of Governors should be determined.

"It seems to us," they say, "that in a good school trust three elements should, if possible, be combined—the representation of the interests of the parents, of the interests of education, and of the past management of the school. The parents are most concerned in the welfare of the school, and in the success of all the arrangements; and, besides this, their lively interest is of great value, and ought to be encouraged in every way. But whilst they are the most deeply interested, and it is best that they should be encouraged to feel that interest, they are not always the best informed, and there should be some trustees appointed on the ground of their larger knowledge to represent education generally. Lastly, it is not good that the management of a school should be liable to sudden and great changes. There should be a continuity in its life, and this should be secured by admitting the method of co-optation, but only to a limited extent." And in the next paragraph they add, "No trustees should be appointed for a longer period than five years."

I am aware that when the Government came to deal with the whole question by legislation they abandoned the provincial Boards altogether, and conferred upon others the powers which the Schools Inquiry Commission recommended should have been vested in them, thus sacrificing the first great guarantee for liberality in the schemes themselves; but, surely, they did not mean to sacrifice the free principles upon which that proposal was founded, surely they did not mean to abandon the idea that the real force by which the work of education was to be done must come from the people. On the contrary, it was with the view of giving free scope to those principles, and teaching the people, in the words of the Commission, to look upon the schools as their own, that this Act was framed. For what was its great leading reforming clause? Was it not this—

"(Clause 17) that in every scheme relating to any educational endowment, the Commissioners shall provide that the religious opinions of any person, or his attendance or non-attendance at any particular form of religious worship, shall not in any way affect his qualification for being one of the governing body of such endowment."

This clause is the keystone of the whole arch. It enunciates a principle which, until this Act was passed, the Law Courts refused to recognize. The decisions of the Court of Chancery were all the other way. They absolutely excluded the whole population which did not belong to one particular creed from the management of public schools. This Act reversed that policy. It declared that henceforth there should be absolutely fair play for all, and favour for none. And if it can be shown that Governing Bodies, under this Act, are so constructed that they must bear a distinctly party complexion, or if they are so constructed as to give to one denomination an overwhelming preponderance of representation; still more, if they are so constructed as to render that party complexion and that denominational preponderance perpetual, one great object of the Act is defeated—one great principle of the Act violated, and that new central idea of my right hon. Friend ignored, upon which, unless he meant his peroration to be a masterpiece of rhetorical flummery, his whole system of secondary education was to be based. No one knows better than my right hon. Friend the circumstances under which it was proposed to win back for these schools the confidence and co-operation of the entire community. Owing to a long train of events which the Founders could never have contemplated, a large portion of the population had become as completely estranged from these schools as if they spoke another language or belonged to another race. That was no fault of theirs. No one who believes in the principle of religious freedom, and who recalls the history of legislation in relation to Dissent, will dare to say so. "It is the pride and glory of these schools," says my right hon. Friend, "that they are public;" but the word is a misnomer, if it does not mean that the public, whatever may be their religious persuasion, are equally welcome and equally to be considered, and unless you can get over the jealousy and distrust with which Nonconformists have been too surely taught by the past to regard them as places of education for Nonconformist children. Let us see, then, how far the constitution of the new Governing Bodies is such as to remove this jealousy and distrust, how far it is such as to inspire a public belief in the absolute impartiality of the management in matters relating to religion. Sir, one of the witnesses examined by the Committee (Mr. Schnadhorst) had taken infinite pains to procure an exact analysis of the co-optative element in every published scheme. Eliminating all schemes in which the Governing Body was not dealt with, or under Section 19, or in which the Governing Body was elected directly the old trustees, he was able to obtain particulars of 85. He laid the results of his investigation before the Committee in a tabular form, and with a minuteness of detail which challenged, in every case, the most complete verification upon the spot. He found that out of 433 co-optative Governors 137 belonged to the party which sits on this side of the House, and 296 to that which sits upon the other, and that of these 433 co-optatives, 392 were Churchmen and 41 Dissenters. He found, further, that 81 clergymen had been appointed against 5 Dissenting ministers, that in 50 out of the 85 schemes, not a single Nonconformist was appointed a co-optative Governor, and that those 50 schemes embraced Wolverhampton, Halifax, Wigan, Walsall, Stafford, and Stourbridge, towns in which it is notorious to every one that Nonconformists of influence abound. Again, as regards the proportion which the co-optative element bears to the ex officio or representative elements in these schemes, this witness found that according to the published official Return made by the Commissioners to the Committee (marked No. 1 in the Appendix), in 28 schemes the co-optatives are permanently a majority of the whole, and in 85 they permanently exceed one-third. But if we analyze the schemes as they stand at present, and will for several years to come, this proportion will be largely exceeded, and this, notwithstanding the warning recommendation of the Schools Inquiry Commission, that the co-optative principle should be adopted only to a limited extent. But, Sir, this is not all. The other two elements, the ex officio and the representative, have been so handled by the Commissioners as to reflect the complexion of the co-optative element. Take, for example, the attempt of the Commissioners to make ecclesiastics ex officio members of these Governing Bodies, in the very teeth of the statute under which they sat, and of the indignant remonstrances of Dissenters. Sir, we had hoped that that question had been authoritatively set at rest, but, to our dismay, we find that my right hon. Friend has abandoned the position which he had taken up, and proposes, under this Bill, to make that lawful which the Act of 1869 disallowed. But even the representative element would seem to be insecure, for it was stated by one of the witnesses that—

"In very many instances every possible existing organized body has been used in order to vest the appointment of representative Governors in it rather than let them be appointed strictly by the people. Many Governors are elected by Members of Parliament for the county, by Bishops, by the vicar and churchwardens, by deans and chapters, by Boards of Guardians, by local Boards, and even by burial Boards."

Now, Sir, do not let it be said that in making these remarks I am taking sectarian ground. I am doing nothing of the kind; I am taking public ground. For, Sir, I contend that it is a preposterous thing, when we are dealing with schools which are not denominational, but public in the widest sense of the term, that every denomination but one should be heavily handicapped in the legitimate competition for representation by the nomination of nine-tenths of the co-optative element from the Church, by the extension of the co-optative element so constituted to the utmost possible limit, by the introduction of clerical ex officio Governors, and by the substitution, wherever possible, of some more or less exclusive body for the popular constituency, even when you are pretending to represent the popular choice. Sir, I maintain that all that is at variance with the recommendations of the Schools Inquiry Commission, with the speech of my right hon. Friend, and with the spirit of the Act itself. What, then, is the defence of the Commissioners? In the Report presented to Parliament, they say—

"We have been told that in some of our schemes a preponderance has been given to one party, both in civil politics and in ecclesiastical politics. We do not know, and we do not propose to inquire."

"We do not know." Is this quite candid? Who are these co-optatives? With few exceptions, the old trustees. And who are the old trustees? With still fewer exceptions, members of the Church of England. Therefore, so far as the co-optative element went, the Commissioners did know, and there was no occasion for them to enquire—

"Our answer is," they proceed, "that each group of trustees has been chosen for the good of its own endowment, and with reference solely to the legal and educational considerations affecting that endowment, because they were in possession, because they previously had some patronage, because they were versed in scholastic affairs, because they are men of business, because their neighbours confide in them and wish to have their services."

But, Sir, in dealing with questions like public education, with reference to which every Churchman and every Dissenter is on the alert, you cannot afford to proceed upon the assumption that men are neither religionists nor politicians—you cannot afford to shut your eyes to the fact that English society, of every class, is penetrated through and through by antagonistic ideas in politics and religion, that the bias of that antagonism insensibly warps the judgment and impairs the impartiality of every one, that the belief in that bias and partiality is universal, and that your only safety, I might say, if we are to have justice—it is enough for my purpose to say if we are to have a public belief in justice—is in absolute fair play, and I have shown that there is no fair play here. But the Commissioners themselves betray an immediate misgiving that their position in ignoring the religious and political sides of this question is unsound. The words are hardly out of their mouths when, with the strangest inconsistency they add—

"We do not pretend that political considerations can be excluded any more than any other parts of men's characters can be wholly excluded."

Then, why, in the name of justice, have they excluded them? "What we do contend is, that such considerations are minor and secondary ones." Sir, we do not live in a time when it is possible to treat these considerations as minor and secondary. I wish we did. The time may come when we shall, but not so long as in every parish in the kingdom we see, side by side, two distinct religious castes, one only of which has been so fortunate as to secure the smiles of the State. And do not let my right hon. Friend take refuge in the idea that, because these schools are undenominational, therefore you can have no regard to a man's religious belief when you appoint him either as a Commissioner, as an Assistant Commissioner, or as a co-optative Governor. People take their religious beliefs with them wherever they go, and with the best and purest intentions these beliefs determine their course of action, and the questions which come before the Governing Bodies of these schools are precisely those which excite to the utmost the irritability of people's beliefs—the whole religious teaching of the school, the appointment of masters, the election of scholars, the distribution of everything which the schools have to bestow. My right hon. Friend has brought into one focus everything which can excite religious jealousy to the utmost, and then, with a solemn face, he says—"I should be sorry to ask the religious belief of any man to whom I entrust the solution of questions like these." I cannot conceive a better illustration of the mischief which arises from this know-nothing policy than what has actually occurred. Here are three gentlemen of the highest possible character, but all Churchmen, some of them distinguished members, vice-presidents of the Church

Defence Association. This is accident No. 1. They are assisted by eight gentlemen, all of whom are members of the Church of England. This is accident No. 2. These Assistant Commissioners, the eyes and ears of the Commission, are instructed to place themselves in direct and intimate communication with the old trustees—that is, to derive their first impressions through the medium of their prejudices—and this at a moment when prejudice is most on the alert, when its privileges are threatened. The old trustees are almost all members of the Church of England. This is accident No. 3. And the natural and necessary consequence of this three-fold combination of Churchmen upon the back of Churchmen is accident No. 4—namely, that so far as the re-construction of our secondary schools has proceeded, that whole system has received a permanent Church twist, and almost every undenominational school a Church launch. But do not let me be misunderstood. I do not state that the Commissioners, the Assistant Commissioners, and the old trustees have wilfully conspired to defeat the intentions of the Legislature, and to bolster up a monopoly which this measure was intended to break through. What I do say is that, with the view of conciliating the old trustees, the Commissioners have made them virtually masters of the situation, and have left the party—in ecclesiastical and civil politics—to which they belong, as absolutely supreme over the teaching and control of these schools as ever it was, and this in districts which positively teem with Dissenters, where a Churchman is the exception, and where the children using the schools would naturally, in overwhelming majorities, be the children of Nonconformists. Have hon. Gentlemen taken the pains to run their eyes over the evidence from Wales, or the West Riding? Mr. Jones, Principal of the Independent College at Bala, a district in which he said that it would be a moderate statement to assert that Nonconformists were to Churchmen in the proportion of five to one, stated that in the Bala scheme there were to be 11 co-optatives at first, all holding office for life, nine of whom were Churchmen, against six representative Governors. Mr. Craven of Thornton, near Bradford, gave evidence that he was the only Nonconformist nominated by the Commisssion, in a district in which Nonconformists numbered three-fourths of the population. Mr. Waddington, of Mirfield, also in the West Riding, said that the Mirfield Grammar School was a Nonconformist foundation, and that out of eight co-optatives only two are Nonconformists; but to show the feeling of the district, when a contest took place for the six representative seats, only one Churchman was returned as against five Nonconformists. And the evidence of this witness is peculiarly instructive, because he stated that if this injustice had not been done to the Nonconformists in placing so few of them upon the Governing Body by co-optation, this contest—which was of extreme severity—would probably not have arisen at all. The fact is, that by excluding a fair proportion of Nonconformists from the co-optative portion of the Governing Body in districts in which Nonconformists of influence abound, the Commissioners are raising, in the most objectionable form, and with every circumstance of acerbity, the very question which they profess to deprecate. And so at the very outset this blind, know-nothing policy of the Commissioners defeats itself, and the schools begin their new career in the midst of passion and discord, and with every element of failure implanted in their constitution. I call this policy a blind policy, for so it is; and it has been so blindly pursued that the Commissioners themselves are staggered when they are confronted with its results—for example, when Lord Lyttelton had stated that the co-optative element was always in a minority, and when, by a multitude of instances, I showed him that this was not so, he replied—"All I can say is, that I think any such case in my present view is a miscarriage (1466); I do not think that it is right." Yes, but the table of schemes is full of such miscarriages. And when I plied his Lordship with the Yorkshire schemes—districts which I need not remind the House are full of Dissenters—his reply always was—"Those are all Mr. Robinson's districts;" or, "That is in Yorkshire;" as though the fact of its being in Yorkshire, or under the eye of Canon Robinson, was enough to account for any enormity. But, Sir, perhaps I may be told that Nonconformists are themselves in some measure to blame for this state of things. Why did they meekly acquiesce? Why did they not memorialize the Commissioners? Why did they not memorialize the Committee of Council? Why did they not move this House to reject these schemes, one by one? What chance had we, at the fag end of the Session, with the Paper crowded with Business, of getting that calm and dispassionate consideration of details without which such a discussion would have been a farce? How can the House determine whether or not justice has been done, with nothing but ex parte evidence before it, with no power of cross-examination, and no local knowledge whatever? But why not memorialize the Committee of Council? Let the House consider what we must have asked the Committee of Council to have done. Under the Endowed Schools Act the Department has no power to modify schemes. It must accept the scheme in a lump, or reject it in a lump. We must, therefore, have asked it to pull up the wheat with the tares; to postpone all reform, perhaps for years and years, in schools, many of which were a reproach and a scandal to everyone who had anything to do with them. But why not appeal to the Commissioners? I reply that we did. [Mr. FORSTER said, that they did not.] My right hon. Friend says that we did not. Then, if we did not, it was because we knew that we had to deal with a body of men who, in all that relates to religion were in a hostile camp, and we declined to sue for common justice in the abject attitude of petitioning remonstrants. Sir, I will say no more. I thank the House for the patience with which, at this hour, they have listened to me. I had hoped that the deliberations of the Committee upstairs might have resulted in some attempt, if not to redress, at least to abate, a great and manifest injustice. With this view I prepared a paragraph, studiously so worded as to avoid anything which could be considered offensive, either to the Church or the Commissioners. The object of that paragraph, if it had been embodied in the Report of the Committee, was to caution the Commissioners against an excessive use of the co-optative principle. It was so fortunate as to obtain the assent of my right hon. Friend, and of every Liberal member of the Committee, except one, and that hon. Gentleman enjoys the distinction of being an Eccle-siaistical Commissioner. By his casting vote, I may say, my paragraph was rejected. But, surely, when it received the almost unanimous support of his party, my right hon. Friend might have taken some notice of it in his Bill. He does nothing of the kind. On the contrary, all the changes which the Bill makes are in a direction which is the opposite of that in which we look; and yet, upon the recognition of the principles for which I contend, the success of your whole system of secondary education depends. For without it, that system can never take deep root in the confidence and support of the entire community. I have all along proceeded upon the assumption that these principles were intended to underlie the whole plan of the Government. If I am wrong, it is time that I should be undeceived. If, from the first, it was the intention of the Government to hand over the whole secondary education of the people in perpetuity to Church of England management, let them say so. Say at once that it was no part of your plan to give Nonconformists their fair place in the Governing Bodies of these schools. Say at once that you were never converts to the maxims and the central ideas of my right hon. Friend; but that, with the words of freedom and equality upon your lips, you were secretly resolved in this new and final re-construction to stereotype class distinction in its worst and most odious shape—the supremacy of a religious caste. But, if this was not the intention of my right hon. Friend, let him make such changes in this Bill as shall secure the practical adoption, not the virtual renunciation of the principles upon which the Act itself was based, so that if we vote with him to-night, we may have some assurance that we are indeed “making our past minister to our future”—our future strength, not our future strife.

Mr. Leathem

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day three months.”—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question.”

MR. HEYGATE was sorry that the measure had come forward so late in the Session that it was impossible to do justice to it. Looking at the history of these endowments, he held that injustice would have been done by ousting the Church of England from a principal share in their control and management, for he must remind the hon. Member for Swansea that nine-tenths of the endowed schools had been founded by its members, and the Act of 1869 was never intended to convey schools so founded away from the Church. The present Bill—small as was the modicum of justice which it gave to the Church—did, at all events, propose to remove some injustice, and therefore he could not support the Amendment which had been moved by the hon. Member. At the same time, unless some Amendments were introduced to make it more just to the Church, he should oppose it on the third reading.

MR. F. S. POWELL regretted that the discussion of that measure had taken a sectarian turn, in face of the fact that their simple object ought to be a reform in the educational system of this country. As a Member of the Select Committee which sat upon this subject, he believed that the intention of the Act passed some years ago was not to transfer the endowments of certain schools which had belonged to the Church of England, to other denominations, but rather to throw them open to all—a fact which would, he hoped, be kept well in view when discussing the question. He could not imagine a harder case than that of excluding the trustees who were members of the Church of England, who had done so much for the cause of education, and had in many cases framed schemes of a most liberal character. In Wigan they prepared a scheme which was universally approved of; but while the scheme itself was sanctioned, would it have been a just act if the trustees who framed it had been turned out of the Governing Body? It would be an evil day for these schools if trustees were chosen, not because they knew anything about education, but because they entertained particular political or religious views. He considered that it was necessary for the welfare of these schools that the Governing Bodies should not be obtained entirely by popular election; but that there should continue upon these Bodies a certain number of gentlemen elected by representation and by co-optation. The cases which the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Leatham) had cited from America did not apply to the schools now under review, because they were not of the same class. The American schools which had been spoken of were elementary schools. In America the higher schools were in the hands of the people, and by no means in a good condition. There was an unfortunate downward tendency in America, which he hoped would never be found in England. He had trusted that in England the best men would have been chosen, irrespective of religious opinions or political creeds. He doubted whether in any country, schools of a high class were under the control of a popular vote. The Commissioners had, no doubt, committed many mistakes; but he represented a district wherein, more than in any other, they had framed schemes which were in operation. In that district they had brought many schools from a state of decay and utter uselessness to entire prosperity. He hoped, however, the Commissioners would have a greater regard for the old traditions and past history of schools, and concur more with the Governing Bodies. He admitted that some reform of the grammar schools was necessary, and believed the wisest course for the House to adopt was to continue the Commission, though under more restricted conditions.

MR. LOCKE said, he was glad to hear what had fallen from the last speaker, for great dissatisfaction had been caused by the manner in which the Commissioners had removed Governing Bodies and replaced them by others selected at haphazard. There were schools that had been endowed by persons, who were anxious that they should operate to the public benefit, and those schools had been carried out according to the rules which had been laid down by the Founders; and he thought that while the Commissioners endeavoured to improve them, where the Governing Body had acted properly with regard to schools which had existed for centuries, there ought not to be a hard-and-fast line laid down under which they must be removed, but if alteration were made by the Commissioners, that was no reason why the scheme adopted by them should not be carried out by the Governors who had hitherto done their duty, and therefore should continue to be appointed and the schools continued under the existing management. He would like to know whether his right hon. Friend had introduced a clause into the Bill to remedy such conduct on the part of the Commissioners and to prevent the repetition of it in future. He should prefer that the Commissioners should never be heard of again; but, at all events, if the House was not prepared to do that, he hoped that a clause would be introduced into the Bill which would tie the hands of the Commissioners, so as to prevent them from doing any further mischief.

Mr. GOLDNEY said, that a provision which would, to a certain extent, meet the objection of the last speaker was already contained in the Bill. The scheme of the Bill was not obtaining the attention it deserved in the present discussion, the object of which, on each side, was apparently to grasp at the controlling powers of the schools. The most opposite views had been expressed as to the merits or the demerits of the Commissioners. What he wanted chiefly to point out was, that the larger endowments had suffered greatly from delay, and he thought that the Governing Bodies ought to be able to propound schemes before the Commissioners could bring their plans into operation. At the same time, the intention of the Founders, particularly in recent cases, ought to be properly respected. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to be doing all in his power for carrying out the objects proposed by the Act of 1869, but still something was needed to put an end to the delay and uncertainty which now existed, and which in the case of Christ's Hospital, whose endowments were open to the whole kingdom, represented about a third of the whole educational endowments of the country. He now desired to intimate that, unless the scheme prepared by the Committee of the Governors, four years ago, could be brought into speed, he should endeavour to have a clause inserted to enable the Government to go for a private Bill.

Mr. II. LINGWORTH complained of the vagueness of the present Act. The framers of the Act stated that it was intended for the purpose of extending the benefit of the endowed schools to all classes of the community, and he thought it would only have been ordinary precaution on the part of the Vice President of the Council to have seen that the Commissioners were not all identified with one religious body. At least, one or other of them should have been a Dissenter. There had been a corresponding partiality in the nomination of the co-optative Governors, and the Act had been administered most unequally and unjustly. The scheme applied to the Bradford Grammar School was one of the most successful, because it was one of the most just—one of the few just schemes which the Commissioners had created. The Bill did nothing to mitigate the injustice complained of on the part of the Dissenters, and he preferred that the Commission should be suspended for a time, rather than it should be continued in its present mutilated form.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he should like to know from the hon. Member for Knaresborough what Dissenter he contemplated when he said that one of the three Commissioners should be a Dissenter. Did he contemplate a Roman Catholic?

MR. W. E. FORSTER admitted that Christ's Hospital was by far one of the largest and most important endowments with which that Bill dealt, and he was in hopes that by means of negotiations between the Commissioners and the Governors of Christ's Hospital, they would arrive within a year at a scheme which might be presented to Parliament with the assent of both parties. As regarded the Amendment, the Endowed Schools Commissioners had been appointed by the Government because they believed that they were the best men that could be selected, and that they were well acquainted with the work upon which they were going to enter. As to the Governing Bodies, the Commissioners had appointed the co-optative Governors simply and solely from a belief that they would be the most likely men to carry on the government of the trust with satisfaction to those around them. He thought that had been proved from the fact that no objection had been offered to them in the districts where they were appointed to act. He expressed his regret that the hon. Member for Knaresborough should have accused the Commissioners of gross partiality, and maintained that though they might have committed a few mistakes, they had discharged their duties with strict impartiality. With regard to the Motion before the House, he confidently hoped, having regard to the past labours in the cause of educational progress of his hon. Friend who brought it forward, that he would not now seek to check that progress by endeavouring to carry it. The measure which the Government desired to enact involved the slightest changes possible, and altered in a very small degree the powers of the Commissioners. He also believed that if the reform of these endowments were to continue, the proposed concession of ex officio Governors must be granted, as the House of Lords had taken a strong stand upon the point. Nor did he believe that the body of Nonconformists, and especially those who had had anything to do with the schemes brought into operation, would rejoice at the stoppage of the reform of these endowments on account of the concessions which the Government had found it necessary to make, and without which they should not have the slightest hope of continuing the reform.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he had to complain that a Bill of such importance should have been brought on for discussion at so late an hour. He should vote in favour of the Amendment, and would give Notice that he would oppose the Bill at its next stage.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 84; Noes 70: Majority 14.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

House adjourned at a quarter after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 22nd July, 1873.

MINUTES.] — Sat First in Parliament — The Earl of Chesterfield, after the death of his cousin.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Medical Act Amendment (University of London)* (214); Military Manoeuvres* (216).

Committee—Petitions of Right (Ireland)* (180-233).

Report—Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (No. 1) (167).

Third Reading—Highland Schools (Scotland)* (205), and passed.

Mr. W. E. Forster

ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSIONERS
—DENBIGH FREE GRAMMAR SCHOOL.
HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

The Queen's Answer to the Address of Friday last reported, as follows—

“MY LORDS,

“I have received your Address, praying that I would refuse my assent to the Schemes of the Endowed Schools Commissioners for the management of the Free Grammar School and of the Blue Coat School Charity at Denbigh:

“I will withhold my assent from the Schemes in conformity with your desire.”

THE LATE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER AND THE LATE LORD WESTBURY.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I wish to ask your Lordships to excuse me in saying a few words before we proceed to the Orders of the Day. I find that there is a general and not unnatural feeling of surprise at more not having been expressed in this House yesterday on the subject of the great losses which the House had sustained since their meeting on the previous Friday. The noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond), indeed, took advantage of the only opportunity which he had of expressing with judgment and good feeling what were his impressions on that occasion; and not only what were his feelings, but what were the feelings of every one of your Lordships. If there was any omission it was entirely mine. My excuse is one which your Lordships can easily understand—at all events, it was not compatible with any indifference on my part to the losses which we have sustained; but still it was difficult for an independent Member of the House to speak without my having, in the official position I hold, given him the lead in the matter. I do it now without the slightest idea of making anything like a funeral oration over these remarkable men. Their works, their lives, and their great abilities are known to your Lordships. We all know, with regard to Lord Westbury, that, though it was hardly appreciated as it deserved, his kindness of heart was remarkable; while with regard to the Bishop of Winchester, his genial disposition and urbane character made every person his devoted friend—even those who most differed from him.

I will only add this:—We are sometimes in this House, and sometimes out of it, apt to deprecate ourselves; but I think it remarkable that two such remarkable men should have been lost to this Assembly within 24 hours, and yet have left this House not entirely bare of those attributes for which they were distinguished.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, perhaps I may be permitted to add a few words to those which have been so well spoken by my noble Friend. I am not at all sure that any mode of expressing the feelings which we all entertain upon the occasion of these great losses could have been more significant than the silence yesterday of those who were not compelled to speak, and the deviation from the natural course of the business of the evening which it was impossible for the noble Duke to avoid. I am one of those who have had very many opportunities of knowing both the great men whom we have lost. Of the right rev. Prelate I will not trust myself to speak after what has been said, because I feel that I am in the presence of some, besides my noble Friend, who did not perhaps value or love him more, but who are better entitled to speak of his public character than I am. But with respect to Lord Westbury, I should be sorry to lose the opportunity of saying a very few words. I think he was a man of as brilliant natural powers as any man he has left behind him. He was also a man who, from his activity and industry in the application of those powers, had acquired a very great breadth of view with regard to the science of jurisprudence, to which his life was devoted. He had all the qualities of an eminent Judge. Personally, I have to say that from the earliest part of my professional career I was indebted to him for notice and kindness, when I was young and obscure, and when notice and kindness from such a person were most valuable. I was also indebted to him when he became Lord Chancellor for my first introduction to the public service; and I was indebted to him for uniform confidence and consideration during the whole time of our official connection. I was no unconcerned—I will not call myself spectator, as I was in some sense an actor—in the Parliamentary struggles connected with his retirement from office, and never had I the smallest doubt, for a single moment, as to his personal purity or as to his freedom from anything inconsistent with high public and private honour, in regard to those transactions as to which he was thought by some to have failed in vigilance. No doubt or misgiving of the kind ever crossed my mind; and I could not but feel pained —more than I have ever yet up to this moment been able to express—that it was considered necessary to visit him with censure, which, so far as any public ground for it was then brought forward, was due, in my judgment, not to him but to others. Since that time he has performed in a dignified and most useful manner, his part in the judicial and other proceedings of your Lordships' House; nor did he ever show any feeling of resentment against those who had thought it their duty to oppose him. During the whole of this Session I have deeply lamented the absence of that assistance which he could have given to your Lordships' deliberations with regard to the great measure relating to our judicature, which has passed through your Lordships' House. I regretted his absence the more, because I had reason to believe that there were some points of importance on which his opinion was not entirely the same as my own. He was frank and kind in his communications with me; and his views, I need not say, were carefully considered; but his absence from your Lordships' House, especially with regard to the discussions on that Bill, was a great public loss; and the fact that we shall never again have that assistance will, I am sure, be most deeply regretted by all of your Lordships as well as by myself.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: I am anxious, my Lords, to express my thanks and those of the right rev. Bench to my noble Friend on the Treasury bench for having recurred to this subject. As regards the noble and learned Lord (Lord Westbury) it is a circumstance which I cannot forget, that I believe I was the last of your Lordships who saw him and had a conversation with him between the last two meetings of your Lordships' House, and I can bear witness that his intellect was then quite as clear in the prospect of approaching death as when he last addressed your Lordships. With regard to the right rev. Prelate, I can well understand that my noble Friend should have found it impossible yesterday to address your Lordships, fresh as he then was from the scene of a great calamity—if we may call it a calamity for a man to be summoned away in the midst of his vigour in obedience to a voice which he had long expected, not unprepared, but ready for the summons. My Lords, I have known the right rev. Prelate for upwards of 30 years. I received from him long before I was a Bishop many marks of kindness, and for 17 years I have seen him almost daily in the discharge of our respective duties. It has been my misfortune to differ from him often, but I never knew an occasion on which his kindness of heart did not overcome any difference which might have arisen from a divergence of opinion. I ask myself, what is the mark the right rev. Prelate will leave upon the Church and the people of England? —for I cannot doubt that one who filled so conspicuous a place in the public estimation, and who was seen and heard everywhere with pleasure and advantage, must leave a lasting mark behind him. He was not, indeed, the writer of a great work, nor, as far as I believe, was he the founder of any great school of thought; but he did set before the Church, of which he was an ornament, and the people of England the example of a life devoted to duty in its lowest and its highest phases. He was as ready to befriend the curate, whom no one knew but himself, as he was to place his services at the disposal of your Lordships, or of his Sovereign. No man could discharge such duties as he fulfilled in this spirit without leaving a lasting mark behind him. I believe I am only speaking the sentiments of my most rev. Brethren when I say that there is not one of us who does not feel that we owe to him a debt that we can never estimate fully in the example he has set us by his untiring energy. Many Bishops before him strove earnestly to perform their duty; but I believe that they, if living, would be as ready as myself to say that no one ever laboured so emphatically, or left behind him such an example of untiring industry in every department of work he undertook. It was this, my Lords, that gave him his surpassing influence. It was not merely an aptitude for business, and a devotion to the details of business, such as no man, perhaps, but himself in this generation ever showed, but it was that kindly sympathy with which he entered into the feelings of others—that readiness never to spare himself if he could do an act of kindness—which made him ever welcome wherever he showed himself. I am sure that, publicly and privately, all the people of this country will, for many a day to come, lament the misfortune which has deprived us of his presence and his services—though we cannot regret his departure for his own sake.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, who was very imperfectly heard, was understood to say that he trusted many years of friendship with the late Bishop would be his justification for saying a few words. If there was one striking quality which more than another distinguished the character of the late Bishop, it was his power of gaining the hearts of all with whom he came in contact, of keeping away from extremes, and holding an even balance between contending parties. He had never known a man more capable of inspiring affection. He was, no doubt, one of the olden school which was passing away in this country—a scholar, a gentleman, a statesman, and a Churchman; but, above all, he was a steady and consistent friend, full and overflowing with kindness and affection. He was ever ready to uphold his opinions, but he was incapable of the slightest particle of jealousy. There were men on both sides who might have thought that he went too far on some occasions; but there were none who doubted the sincerity of his convictions, and his justice of conduct in his high office, in which he acted with as much even-handedness as imperfect human nature would allow. And, certainly, in private life, those who knew the history of himself and his family knew how at different periods of that life a severe strain was put upon him, and how manfully and steadily that pressure was borne. He believed that there was not a man who worked harder or more zealously, or who more laid on every power and effort of his mind for his work, than he did. In society the right rev. Prelate shone and sparkled beyond anyone he had ever known. And although his connection with the diocese of Winchester was brief, he had left in hundreds of places within that diocese marks of his justice and discretion; and of the vigour of his administration.

LORD CAIRNS: My Lords, if all among your Lordships who have been impressed by the lustre of the eloquence, the splendour of the talents, the unrivalled exertions, the energy in the discharge of public functions, displayed by the late right rev. Prelate were to rise in succession to bear their testimony to what he was, everyone of those whom I have now the honour of addressing would, in his turn, become a speaker. I rise, my Lords, to add a word to what has been said with regard to my late lamented Friend (Lord Westbury.) Those who, like myself, have had the opportunity of seeing him from day to day during the last few months, and witnessing the gravity of his illness and the extent of the suffering under which he laboured, could not but be apprehensive of the sad event which we all now deplore. My acquaintance with Lord Westbury is of something like 30 years' standing. I recollect when I, yet a young man, entered the profession of the law, Lord Westbury was in the full blaze of his career at the Bar, and I remember — as my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack does — the kindness I received from him then, when kindness was most valuable. I remember with gratitude and gladness the unvarying manner in which that kindness was ever after extended to me. I say this because in the contemplation of the great talents of Lord Westbury, remembering the splendour of his judicial career, recollecting the power which he brought to bear in the performance of his duties as a Judge, and remarking, also, on those proofs of intellect which all of your Lordships must have noticed, we are apt to depreciate what I, at least, dwell upon with greater pleasure — namely, the goodness of heart which lay below those more splendid and attractive qualities — a goodness of heart which I am glad my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack has alluded to in terms which I gladly endorse. I could not, on this melancholy occasion, say less in reference to the loss of one with whom I have been for so many years in the closest contact and intimacy.

LORD HATHERLEY: My Lords, as one who was often subjected to considerable criticism in this House, on the part of Lord Westbury, I am sincerely glad to bear my testimony in addition to that of my noble and learned Friends to his kindness of heart. He evinced extreme kindness towards myself during my occupancy of the Woolsack, and I think it only due to his memory to say that in the course of those inquiries which led to his retirement from office I never understood that there was any stain upon his personal honour. Whatever want of diligence there might have been on his part in reference to transactions in which other persons were concerned, that was not, in my judgment, nor in that of others, any reason for imputing a want of personal honour to Lord Westbury himself.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM was understood to suggest a public funeral for the late Bishop of Winchester in Westminster Abbey.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION PROVISIONAL ORDER CONFIRMATION (No. 1)

BILL—(No. 167.)

(The Lord President).

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to Order.)

Clause 1 (Confirmation of Order).

EARL BEAUCHAMP rose to move an Amendment the effect of which would be to postpone the operation of the Act until the 1st January 1874. The noble Earl said that the Provisional Order which the Bill sought to confirm conferred upon the London School Board authority to put in force the powers of the Land Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845, for the purpose of compulsory acquisition of land which they had been unable to purchase by agreement — his object in proposing the postponement being that there would be an election of the School Board in the meanwhile. The outlay which would be involved by the Bill was very considerable, was not necessary, and could not be justified under the circumstances of the case, and was altogether out of proportion to the funds derived from the rates of the metropolitan school district. He regretted that the rates did not possess so stern a guardian as the Consolidated Fund had in the person of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He was in favour of the extension of education, and had brought forward his Motion in the belief that the undertaking of an extravagant and unnecessary expenditure would produce a reaction in the minds of the ratepayers which could only result in injury to the cause of education. They had to consider the nature of the education to be given to the children and the amount of accommodation that already existed. As to the former, the London School Board, instead of putting in force the powers conferred upon them by the Elementary Education Act, and making use of the vacant accommodation in the existing schools as far as their compulsory powers were concerned, had adopted another and altogether different course, and divided themselves into committees for the purpose of dealing with the various branches of education to be taught in the elementary schools. It had been gravely proposed by the London School Board that Latin and French should be subjects of instruction in the elementary schools. Parliament surely did not pass the Elementary Education Act with any such purpose, and if such a proposal had then been made it would not have found favour. Then as to the existing accommodation, he believed the statements that had been put forth as to the deficiency in this respect were entirely without foundation. The Statistical Committee of the London School Board, in estimating the existing educational destitution within the metropolitan area, stated that school accommodation would be required in round numbers for 100,000 children. This report was prepared by a Statistical Committee of 16 members, and took a year in preparation. It did not appear how many members of the committee attended the meetings, or assisted in the preparation of these statistics; but the report itself was presented to the Board on one day and passed, he believed, without discussion. Now, it could not be satisfactory to the ratepayers that they should be called upon to pay large sums upon the strength of a report which had been so little discussed, and he thought they had a right to complain of their representatives for adopting a mass of figures without testing the accuracy of the principles upon which they were based. According to the very able and clear explanations of the secretary, Mr. Croad, the metropolis had been divided into enumerated districts, the total number of children between the ages of 3 and 13 had been ascertained, and various deductions had then been made from this total. Now, everything depended upon the propriety of these deductions. The conclusion of the committee was that the total number of children for whom elementary school accommodation should be provided was 454,783, and the existing efficient school accommodation was 330,000. There was, therefore, an apparent deficiency of accommodation for between 150,000 and 200,000 children. But he regarded the estimate as an exaggerated one. The Bishop of London had instituted an inquiry into the subject, and the result reduced the deficiency to 130,000. Thus the School Board assumed that a majority of the children who were being educated at a cost of between 6d. and 9d. a-week were children for whom elementary education should be provided at the expense of the ratepayers. But surely close inquiry was necessary into the character of the schools and all the circumstances of the case before such an assumption could fairly be made. Another question arose out of the deduction made in respect of children between three and five years old, to whom the compulsory powers of the Board did not apply. The parents were asked to state, in printed papers left with them, whether their children were too young to attend the schools or not; and where the paper was not filled up it was assumed that the children were capable of going to school, and that the full accommodation ought to be provided for them. This was a very gratuitous assumption, and he maintained that a considerable further reduction should be made under this head. The London School Board, he thought, had committed a gross error with reference to the school accommodation which should be provided in the metropolis under the Education Act. According to the admission of Mr. Croad, the able and intelligent representative of the views of the London School Board, they proposed to provide accommodation for nearly 50,000 children in excess of what the requirements really were. But it was said that compulsion would bring a very much larger number of children to school than had hitherto attended. He did not think it could be shown that any great increase of attendance could be obtained in the metropolis by means of compulsion. The better class of children were now receiving, speaking broadly, an efficient education. It was in respect of the children of the lowest classes of the metropolis that education was in an inefficient state; but those classes were migratory. They were in the habit of changing their residence every six months, if not oftener. If there were these obstacles in the way of applying compulsion, it was obvious that compulsion could not be expected to increase largely the attendance at school. He very much regretted that on this occasion their Lordships would not have the great benefit of the advice of the Bishop of Winchester, whose death they all deplored. That Prelate was a Member of the Committee to whom this Bill was referred, and he took the greatest interest in it, as he did in all questions affecting his diocese. He applied his mind very seriously to the discussion, and he (Earl Beauchamp) thought he brought out very clearly the effect of compulsion as bearing on a migratory population. He (Earl Beauchamp) denied that the Education Act of 1870 was intended to introduce a new system. It was intended to adopt a system already existing, and to supplement the deficiencies of that system. He maintained that the London School Board were pursuing a policy which must have the effect of seriously crippling voluntary schools. The voluntary assistance of persons of a higher station of life in supervising the schools had been of enormous advantage, and if the London School Board, hurried on by those who were in favour of efficiency regardless of cost, were to supplant voluntary supervision by paid supervision, they would entail an enormous expense upon the ratepayers. Moreover, the employment of paid functionaries must be very expensive. In his opinion, the cost of compulsion was out of all proportion to the value of the work done, and the course which the London School Board were pursuing would in the end deal a fatal blow at the cause of education by making the ratepayers cry out against it. Holding these views, he begged to move, in Clause 1, the omission of the words "after the passing of this Act," in order to insert, "the 1st of January, 1874."

Amendment moved, in Clause 1, to omit ("after the passing of this Act") and insert ("the first of January, 1874.")
—(The Earl Beauchamp.)

LORD LAWRENCE said, he believed the practical effect of the Amendment would be to put an end altogether to the good already done. [The noble Lord proceeded to defend the course which had been taken by the London School Board, and quoted statistics showing the proportion of children not attending schools, in justification of the efforts of the Board to increase the amount of school accommodation.] Were the Amendment adopted and the action of the present Board suspended, the next Board would have to incur a much larger expenditure; for experience had shown that the moment it was known that any site was likely to be required for a school, the price considerably increased. In more than half the cases the Board had already purchased the interest in the sites, and Parliament was simply asked to remove difficulties as to title. No doubt, there would always be a large amount of absenteeism; but as the compulsory by-laws were enforced, the difference between the number on the rolls and the average attendance would become smaller and smaller. Mr. Croad's candid admission that something like 5 per cent would not represent the probable absenteeism was quite correct at the time the answer was given, when the schools were only beginning to get into work, but the state of things was very different now. Till the other day the Board had not a single new school, but only the schools taken over, and the many rooms hired; and, while bound to supply the deficiency in school accommodation, they had only asked the sanction of the Department for four-fifths of the amount which after careful consideration had appeared necessary. Every precaution was taken by the Board to avoid providing more school accommodation than was absolutely required in any particular district, and that full allowance should be made in every instance for the accommodation afforded by existing schools. He moreover denied that the action of the Board had done any injury to the Church of England schools. As to the question of voluntarism, on which the noble Earl had laid so much stress, he was prepared to show that while the Board schools had been increasing in numbers the voluntary schools had increased in a still greater ratio. With regard to compulsory attendance, no doubt it was difficult to carry out their by-law on that subject, but without some such system they could not get the children into the schools. Their Lordships must bear in mind that the children with whom they had to deal were the roughest and most unmanageable it was possible to conceive, and it required the greatest tact to carry out the compulsory powers; but he believed that the increased attendance which could fairly be put down as due to the operation of the compulsory by-law was no less than 55,000 children. He denied that the Board could be justly charged with extravagance in over-building; they had to provide a certain amount of accommodation, and that accommodation they had sought to provide at the lowest possible cost. Among the members of the Board were many men of business, who devoted much of their valuable time to the performance of their duties, with much advantage to the public. He trusted that their Lordships would not agree to the Amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that the controversy as to the Lambeth statistics was attributable to Canon Gregory having taken the Privy Council estimate that one in six of the population required education, and that 33 out of every 1,000 children were of a class not likely to attend National or Board schools; while the London School Board relied on the judgment of their enumerators as to the children of the excepted class. Even if the enumerators were right, one in six—if the average for the kingdom—would eventually be the average for Lambeth, and it would be extravagant for the Board to build on the basis of an exceptional state of things. The Board, moreover, appeared to set aside ecclesiastical divisions; and Mr. Gregory's best school being in a projecting portion of his parish, they had reckoned it in another district, and could thus say that he had not furnished sufficient accommodation. It was easy by this "jerry-mandering," or manipulation of boundaries, to get statistics to any desired effect—though he did not suggest that the noble Lord (Lord Lawrence) had had any such idea, for nothing could be more honourable than his intentions, and those doubtless of the great mass of the parties concerned. The committee's report was hastily drawn up and adopted, and in a case where an earnest theological feeling existed, so that men would be biased by approval or disapproval of religious education, the return could not be implicitly accepted. It seemed to him that the Board had been building for an exceptional state of things—and that was extravagance—their real course should have been to take a state of things that was likely to endure, rather than to calculate on exceptionally high numbers that could not be maintained. He imputed no mala fides to the Board; but, as a matter of fact, they had a passion for building, and would adopt any excuse for indulging it—such as the necessities of adjoining districts; the supposed inability of London children to cross public thoroughfares; and, lastly, their hopes for the future. According to the Education Department, the absenteeism was 20 or 25 per cent, and though possibly the expectation of the Board, as to a considerable diminution, might be realized, it would be wise to wait and see. The noble Lord seemed to treat 2d. in the pound with contempt; but he doubted whether, if the Board inscribed that figure on their banners, they would be sure of re-election. If the Board went on invading districts, and impressed on the clergy that the educational efforts to which they had devoted a life-time were of no avail, the co-operation of the latter would be lost, without which co-operation the Board could not cheaply accomplish its work. If the Board allowed the secularists among them, if there were any such—or, as he rather believed, their surveyors, architects, and engineers—to stimulate them to an unnecessary outlay, the expense in each case might be small and the impression on the rates slight, but the discouragement inflicted on those who had given their lives to education would gradually drive them from the field, leaving the Board to occupy it alone, and impose an enormous burden on the ratepayers in the end. The Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education had calculated that the burden of supporting schools in London would be 3d. in the pound; but experience had shown this to be too low an estimate, and he had no doubt that the cost to the ratepayers would fall little, if anything, short of 6d. in the pound, if the policy of discouraging individual effort, despising ecclesiastical boundaries, and hurting the feelings of those who had devoted their lives to the cause of education was persisted in. Under existing circumstances, however, he did not think it would be advisable to press the Motion before the House to a division, or to impose their views upon the London School Board. The gentlemen composing that Board would soon be before their constituents, and he hoped they would be able to show sufficient grounds for the course they had pursued. When he postponed the debate on this Bill last Thursday, he little thought by so doing he was taking a step which would deprive him of the assistance of the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Winchester) whose loss they all deplored—a Prelate who was one of the best advocates the Church of England had ever known. In conclusion, he warned the School Board against a policy of disregarding the feelings of those who cultivated the education field before there were school boards to till it, and who had, in fact, borne the heat and burden of the day.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, the Committee which inquired into this subject obtained the best evidence they could, and came to the conclusion that it would be impossible to construct a good system of school-board districts in London unless, in fixing the boundaries, they acted independently of the existing parochial districts. It was true that in taking this some children would be taken from the schools within their parishes and sent to the schools of the neighbouring district; and in this respect an injustice had been done to Canon Gregory. His school happened to be placed near the extremity of his parish, and the result was that a portion only of the children of the parish attended that school, and he had to take others from adjoining parishes. But, upon the whole, he believed the plan worked satisfactorily. The great object of the Education Act seemed to him to be the bringing of all children to the schools, and he had no doubt that with the inevitable increase of the population the schools now proposed to be erected would be filled. He thought it was impossible to accuse the London School Board of being too precipitate. They were supposed, on the contrary, to be too slow. At all events, seeing how little had been done, nothing like undue haste could be imputed to them. In the course of the investigation of the Committee, he was astonished at the amount of education which had been furnished by voluntary means, and he should be sorry to see these efforts paralyzed or in any way thwarted. But there was no evidence to show that such a result was contemplated by the School Board. Many clergymen of the Established Church were on the Board, and they were not likely to lend themselves to any attempt to destroy schools founded by voluntary exertion. It must be remembered, however, that the Act was imperative upon them. They were called upon to provide, within the metropolitan area, for all children who were capable of receiving elementary education, and for whom no accommodation now existed. The question was whether, in carrying out the Act, there had been any violation of its principle, or any steps taken which were not justified by the circumstances of the case. In his opinion, there was no evidence to justify such a charge, and he thought that the case of his noble Friend had entirely broken down. In conclusion, he must express the deep feeling of sorrow with which he had learnt the death of the right rev. Prelate, with whom he had so recently served upon the Committee, sitting with him there day by day. It so happened that his acquaintance with the right rev. Prelate dated from a more distant date, probably, than any of their Lordships. He had been in constant intercourse with him, and, without dwelling on those public qualities which were patent to the world, he must be permitted to bear testimony to his sterling worth in private life.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY thought the evidence brought before the Committee proved that the charge against the London School Board that they had rashly endeavoured to cover London with schools where schools were not wanting, was not well founded. They seemed to him to have taken great pains to ascertain what was really required with reference to school accommodation. He did not mean to say that an error here and there might not have been committed; but no evidence whatever was brought before the Committee to show that they had acted on a principle which disregarded the existence of voluntary schools.

VISCOUNT EVERSLAY, as far as he could judge, thought the conduct of the School Board was free from all blame, and that they deserved the thanks of the public.

On Question? Resolved in the Negative; and Bill to be read 3<sup>d</sup> on Thursday next.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) ACT, 1870.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM moved, that there be laid before this House—

1. Copy of the decree and reversal granted by Mr. Justice Lawson at Dublin on the 3d day of March 1873 in respect to the claims made by Michael Friel of Ballymichael in the county of Donegal, claimant, v. The Earl of Leitrim, respondent, under the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870; showing the amount awarded, the costs of the decree, and the costs of the reversal:

Also copy of the costs as taxed by the clerk of the peace under the direction of the judge according to the order of the judges of the Court of Land Cases Reserved, and dated the 1st day of June 1872:

2. Copy of the dismiss of the chairman of quarter sessions in the county of Monaghan to the claims of James Creaghan v. The Earl of Dartrey, under the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870; and the affirmation, with costs, granted by Mr. Justice Lawson to the above decree at the late assizes for the county of Monaghan, and the judgment of the judge on the granting of that affirmation:

Also copy of all entries in the book of the clerk of the peace for the county of Monaghan as to the case of the claims of the said James Creaghan v. The Earl of Dartrey:

And copy of the taxation of costs under the rules of the judges of the Court of Land Cases Reserved.

The noble Earl explained at great length the nature of the causes to which these Papers referred, complaining that not only was the Irish Land Act of 1870 a most dangerous measure in a political sense, but that it had been interpreted and enforced by the Judges in a way greatly to increase its injustice.

LORD O'HAGAN, on behalf of the Government, said, there was no objection to the production of the Papers moved for.

Motion agreed to.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM then moved for—Return of the Land Cases decided in each county from the 27th day of February 1872 to the 12th day of July 1873; showing the amount of rent in each case and the tenement valuation of the premises, the sums awarded as compensation and as costs in each case by the chairman of quarter sessions, the cases in which appeals have been carried up to the judge or judges of assize, the judgment in each case and the costs, the cases which have been remitted by the judge or judges of assize to the Court of Land Cases Reserved, the judgment of that court and the costs: [Tabular Form].

Viscount Eversley

Motion agreed to.

IRISH CHURCH TEMPORALITIES COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM asked Her Majesty's Government, What is the cause of the delay which takes place in the office of the "Irish Church Temporalities Commission," at Dublin, in granting the "Merging Orders" to relieve the estates of those persons who have paid their money for the purpose of purchasing the tithes in certain parishes in Ireland to relieve their estates therefrom, under the provisions of the Act for the Disestablishment of the United Church of England and Ireland in Ireland; and to know why the "Merging Orders" have been withheld for several months; and, if measures will be taken to remove the inconvenience caused by the delay complained of?

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, he had been in communication with the Irish Government, and had received a telegram from them, stating that no delay occurred in granting those Merging Orders beyond what resulted from the pressure of business in the Solicitor's office, and that the noble Earl's own Merging Order was issued on the 21st of the present month.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM said, he had never received it.

CONSTABULARY (IRELAND)—SUB-CONSTABLE JOHN HOWE.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM moved, that there be laid before this House—

Copy of the report made by sub-constable John Howe, dated Ballycumber, the 26th of March 1873, or thereabouts, relative to the alleged cruelty to a horse near Ballycumber in the King's County, Ireland: [and other Papers].

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, the Reports in question were of a confidential nature, and he could not consent to their production.

On Question, Resolved in the Negative.

House adjourned at Eleven o'clock to Thursday next: Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 22nd July, 1873.

MINUTES.] — PUBLIC BILLS — Resolution reported — Ordered — First Reading — Constabulary Force (Ireland) * [257].

Ordered — First Reading — Defence Acts Amendment * [255]; Local Rates and Taxes (Scotland) * [256].

Second Reading — Slave Trade (East African Courts) * [236]; Slave Trade (Consolidation) * [249]; Langbaugh Coroners * [242]; Statute Law Revision * [240].

Committee — Report — Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment, &c. (re-comm.) [245]; Penalties (Ireland) * [239].

Considered as amended — Ecclesiastical Commissioners * [235]; Extradition Act (1870) Amendment * [220].

Third Reading — Supreme Court of Judicature [237], and passed.

Withdrawn — Municipal Corporation (Borough Funds) * [186].

The House met at Two of the clock.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (1870)

AMENDMENT &c. (re-committed) BILL.

(Mr. William Edward Forster, Mr. Secretary Bras.)

[BILL 245.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair." — (Mr. W. E. Forster.)

MR. DIXON rose to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice —

"That, in the opinion of this House, no Amendment of the Education Act will be satisfactory which does not make the attendance of children at school and the formation of School Boards compulsory throughout England and Wales, and which fails to remove the objections entertained to the principles embodied in the twenty-fifth Section of the Act."

His desire was not to raise a prolonged debate, for which he thought the present time was not favourable, but to give the House the opportunity of dividing on the question. He had twice during the Session attempted to introduce Resolutions on the subject, but he had failed to do so in consequence of the Government standing in the way; and on Thursday last, when his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Privy Council moved the second reading of this Bill, he was precluded from moving this Amendment. It might be said it was inconvenient to bring forward a Resolution containing a series of three propositions, as some hon. Members might be disposed to support one or two, but not the whole three; but he would take care to afford an opportunity for voting upon each one separately in Committee. He was told it was another objection to his Resolution that it would be fatal to a Bill which had been accepted by a large majority of the House. But that need not be the case, although, even if it were considered fatal to the Bill, he could not say that he should, under the circumstances, feel at all dissatisfied; because the meaning of such a vote would be that the House had pledged itself to give effect to the principles contained in his Resolution. On Thursday night the indulgence of the House had enabled him to make some remarks on the great importance of immediately passing a compulsory law, and also to advocate the opinion that school boards were the best machinery for carrying out such compulsion. It was quite true, as stated by the Vice President of the Council, that when there was no national system of education, and no immediate expectation of one being adopted, he had held the opinion that the money of the ratepayers might be advantageously used for the purpose of educating pauper children. But since that time the position of the question had been entirely altered. The country was much more prepared than he had then anticipated for the adoption of a national system of education; and under that system schools were provided which approached much more nearly, if not entirely, to what he considered was the proper type of National Schools. He very naturally, therefore, preferred what he had always advocated — namely, an extension of the national system of education. What he wished to see was all the new forces which had come into existence under the Act of 1870 and the Amendments to that Act brought to bear on the new and improved system of elementary education. There were a large number of persons who attributed to pique the part which he and those who agreed with him took in this matter, and to strictures of that kind they were prepared to submit. But he hoped his right hon. Friend understood that there was no inconsistency in their position. He said on Thursday night that as he could not have his own way, and nevertheless desired to see education extended, the only alternative before him was to cease to oppose this measure of his right hon. Friend for the extension of education. He was therefore prepared to see the plans of his right hon. Friend carried out, without taking upon himself the responsibility of sanctioning them. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, no Amendment of the Education Act will be satisfactory which does not make the attendance of children at school and the formation of School Boards compulsory throughout England and Wales, and which fails to remove the objections entertained to the principles embodied in the twenty-fifth section of the Act,"—(Mr. Dixon,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. STAPLETON supported the Amendment, remarking that the Bill violated the essential principles of the Poor Law. He would have been very much astonished that it should receive the support of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), only he was prepared to make allowance for the aberrations of a philosopher. It was said that  $2\frac{1}{4}$ d. a-week was a very small sum to pay for children; but he knew many districts in which children paid only 1d. a-week. As the Bill stood, there was no provision made for the children of the poor who were not paupers. He could not but think it most demoralizing that we should say to the poor struggling ratepayer—"You must pay for the education of your own child, and the children of your neighbour, the pauper, who is vicious and idle, will also go to school at your expense."

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he wished to state on what points he differed from the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon), and where he agreed with him. He (Mr. Harcourt) had never been a violent compulsionist. The doctrine of compulsion had not found favour with the people of this country. Even for the greatest public objects, such as that of national defence, the English people had never been willing to accept the doctrine of compulsory service. He would not, therefore, attempt to force compulsion upon the country, seeing it was not ripe for it. He, for one, would be very glad when all the children would be found attending school; but if he might use an Hibernian expression, he would say that compulsion would never succeed in this country until it was voluntarily adopted; or, in other words, you could never enforce compulsion by statute until public opinion was ripe for its enforcement. He wished that the hon. Member for Birmingham had confined his Amendment to the simple repeal of the 25th clause. His desire was that the repeal of that clause should not, as far as argument was concerned, be allowed to sink into the quagmire of sectarian controversy, but should be argued solely upon economical grounds. He was at first very much inclined to the doctrine of absolutely free education; but upon further reflection he had seen the danger of it. However, as between free education and the education to be given to paupers alone, he held that there ought to be no middle term. Provision had been made for the payment of the fees of pauper children, to be attended by the consequences of Poor Law relief. This applied to paupers alone, and so far he agreed with the Bill. There was, however, a provision in the Bill originally that the Guardians should be allowed to pay the fees for persons who were to be semi-paupers and to receive this relief from the poor rate without the consequences of Poor Law relief; but there was so general an expression of opinion against that clause that the right hon. Gentleman was compelled to withdraw it. In his judgment, the proper course for the House now to adopt would be to repeal the 25th and also the 17th section of the Act. The principle upon which these clauses were founded would, if they were brought into considerable use, break down the whole system of our Poor Law. The provision made for the pauper population in the 3rd clause was, he conceived, the only provision that ought to be made in that respect out of the poor rate; and, that being so, both the 17th and the 25th sections of the Act ought to be repealed. Under the Scotch Education Act of last Session the payment of school fees was followed by the consequences of Poor Law relief. It was just as important and as humane to give aid to the sick, to clothe the naked, and to feed the hungry as it was to educate the children of the poor; but, nevertheless, we did not give to hospitals and clothing clubs powers analogous to those conferred by the 17th and 25th clauses of the Education Act. Indeed, if we introduced principles of that character there would be no end to the consequences, and the country would be flooded by an irresistible flood of pauperism. He was aware the Birmingham League were anxious to abolish the 25th section; but he had heard of no proposal on their part to repeal the 17th. Though he should be extremely glad himself to see all the children go to the Board schools, he knew that to legislate in such a direction would be idle and nugatory. To repeal the 25th clause of the Act and leave the 17th unrepealed would be to place a high differential duty on the denominational schools as against the Board schools, and would have the effect of driving all the children into the latter at once. To ask the House to accept such a proposal would be useless, for hon. Members must treat these matters like men of the world and persons who understood politics. By repealing both clauses this vexed sectarian question, he believed, might be settled upon grounds on which all parties would be able to agree. He had heard rumours that such a proposal was likely to have proceeded from a quarter which would probably have rendered it more acceptable to the House than it would be if it emanated from the hon. Member for Birmingham; but he had heard an ingenious and Machiavellian suggestion made that the idea was abandoned, for fear it might have the serious effect of establishing a reconciliation in the Liberal party. Such an objection, to his mind, would not be fatal to the proposition if it were otherwise sound. There was, however, something even more important than a reconciliation of the conflicting sections of the Liberal party, and that was the cause of education in this country. It must be admitted on all hands that the unfortunate disagreement with respect to this 25th clause of the Act was a most serious stumbling-block in the way of the progress of education in this country. If, therefore, some common ground could be found on which all parties could agree, and which had nothing to do with sectarian differences at all, it was surely a matter worthy of the House of Commons to see whether they could not so agree to remove the stumbling-block and advance education. Was it worth keeping up either the 17th or the 25th clause, about which there had been so much fighting? He would appeal to the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) whether the results were not infinitesimal in London?—and if that was the case in a place like London, surely that was a strong argument why these vexed clauses should be withdrawn with a view to an amicable settlement of the difficulty. If the Vice President of the Council would consent to this mode of settling the controversy he would remove a great bone of political contention and do much to advance the cause of national education.

Mr. Dixon

MR. W. E. FORSTER: My sole object in rising so early is that it seems to me we are debating upon the original Motion rather than upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon), and it appears to me that we are all of one opinion that we do not wish to have repeated discussions on the same point. The hon. Member for Birmingham has proposed a Resolution combining three objects, and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) has argued in a powerful manner—not in favour of the Motion, but of the Amendment of which he has given Notice, and which the House in Committee will have to consider, and it seems to me that it will be better not to enter now upon any debate upon the subject of this Amendment. The hon. Member for Birmingham said he invited division, but did not invite debate, and as I shall be very glad on the part of the Government to meet the arguments for Amendments when they are brought forward, I cannot but believe that we had better get as soon as possible into Committee to hear them. My hon. Friend gave as his reason that he never interposed with a Resolution. I remember in his very calm and moderate speech last Thursday evening he said he would not vote against the Bill now under consideration, and therefore went out of the House. He felt now that by his Motion he would be as much voting against the Bill as by supporting the Previous Question; but he gets out of it by saying that he knows his Motion will not be carried. I do not wish to treat his Motion with anything like indifference, much less with anything like contempt. Nevertheless, the matter has been debated over and over in the House, and I feel we cannot now enter into the question of universal compulsion or universal school rates. I will only just say this—I repeat that I am still as earnest for universal compulsion as ever I have been; but that I do believe that if my hon. Friend insists upon coupling with universal compulsion, the necessity for school boards, and also the repeal of the 25th clause without anything in its place, he will put off for an indefinite time this very system of compulsion. I think we should not meet with the assistance of the country, if in order to get compulsion extended throughout England and Wales, ratepayers are called upon to build schools which would not otherwise have been necessary, or if anything like differential duty were imposed upon them for Board schools as against other schools, compulsion will be impossible. However necessary it may be, it is a difficult and delicate matter, and if we compel more than we can help, we shall certainly fail. My hon. Friend threw out a hint that voluntary schools, so far as secular education is concerned, might be transferred to the school boards. I doubt the willingness of the managers of the voluntary schools, at all events for a long time to come, to agree to such a transfer. It may be said that they would thereby relieve themselves from the cost of secular teaching. Undoubtedly they would; but upon whom would fall the cost of secular teaching?—upon the ratepayers. Does my hon. Friend think the ratepayers would be willing to undertake the task? The burden is already by no means small, and year by year it will continue to increase. My hon. Friend is mistaken in supposing that it is a mere pounds, shillings, and pence question. We must it is true remember we have to pass measures through this House. This House is composed of Representatives of the ratepayers, and I cannot conceive anything more difficult to be obtained than a system of compulsion with the money to be attached to it. I should, however, be hardly honest if I were to sit down without saying that I think there are higher subjects involved. I have often been charged with making a compromise, and with deviating from principle in order to get the House to agree to the Education Act. I can only state that was not the feeling with which I brought the measure forward. There has never to my mind been any compromise. I am aware that in the minds of many Members they thought they were giving up one thing to secure another; but my object in this matter was to make use of all the moral forces of the country, and, having the interests of education at heart, I did not feel at liberty to disregard what has been accomplished by the voluntary system. Quite independently of pounds, shillings, and pence there are many parts of the country where the Squire and the Parson, who have been so often referred to, would be more likely to secure an efficient school than a body of reluctant farmers, upon whom the conduct of a school board might sometimes fall. I hope we may be allowed to divide upon this Amendment, if my hon. Friend thinks it necessary to do so, and then to proceed in Committee, where all the points will be brought forward for positive discussion.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 129; Noes 45: Majority 84.

AYES.

Adderley, rt. hon. Sir C.	Cavendish, Lord F. C.
Amphlett, R. P.	Charley, W. T.
Anstruther, Sir R.	Childers, rt. hon. H.
Ayrton, rt. hon. A. S.	Clay, J.
Baines, E.	Cobbett, J. M.
Barclay, A. C.	Colebrooke, Sir T. E.
Barclay, J. W.	Coleridge, Sir J. D.
Barttcot, Colonel	Collins, T.
Bates, E.	Corrane, F. S.
Baxter, rt. hon. W. E.	Corrigan, Sir D.
Beach, W. W. B.	Cowper-Temple, right hon. W.
Benyon, R.	Cross, R. A.
Birley, H.	Cubitt, G.
Blennerhassett, Sir R.	Delahunt, J.
Bolckow, H. W. F.	Dent, J. D.
Bonham-Carter, J.	Dickinson, S. S.
Bourke, hon. R.	Dodson, rt. hon. J. G.
Bowring, E. A.	Dowdeswell, W. E.
Buller, Sir E. M.	Duff, M. E. G.
Campbell-Bannerman, H.	Dundas, J. C.
Cardwell, rt. hon. E.	Egerton, hon. A. F.

Mr. W. E. Forster

Enfield, Viscount	Miller, J.
Kwing, A. Orr-	Monk, C. J.
Fawcett, H.	Monsell, rt. hon. W.
Figgins, J.	Mowbray, rt. hon. J. R.
Forster, rt. hon. W. E.	Newdegate, C. N.
Fowler, R. N.	North Coloneil
Garnier, J. C.	Pakington, rt. hon. Sir J.
Gladstone, rt. hon. W. E.	Peel, A. W.
Gordon, E. S.	Pemberton, E. L.
Gore, J. R. O.	Phipps, C. P.
Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.	Pim, J.
Gower, hon. B. F. L.	Playfair, L.
Grant, Col. hon. J.	Powell, F. S.
Gray, Colonel	Raikes, H. C.
Greville, hon. Captain	Rathbone, W.
Grey de Wilton, Visc.	Ridley, M. W.
Grieve, J. J.	Round, J.
Hamilton, Lord G.	Salt, T.
Hardy, rt. hon. G.	Samuelson, B.
Hay, Sir J. C. D.	Samuelson, H. B.
Henley, rt. hon. J. W.	Sandon, Viscount
Henley, Lord	Scourfield, J. H.
Hermon, E.	Seely, C. (Nottingham)
Heygate, W. U.	Sherlock, D.
Hibbert, J. T.	Smith, W. H.
Holt, J. M.	Stanley, hon. F.
Hope, A. J. B. B.	Stansfeld, rt. hon. J.
Hughes, T.	Stork, rt. hon. Sir H. K.
Jessel, Sir G.	Stuart, hon. H. W. V.
Johnston, A.	Talbot, J. G.
Kavanagh, A. MacM.	Tipping, W.
Knatchbull-Hugessen,	Tollemache, Maj. W. F.
right hon. E.	Torr, J.
Lacon, Sir E. H. K.	Turner, C.
Lancaster, J.	Verney, Sir H.
Leathem, E. A.	Wait, W. K.
Leeman, G.	Waterhouse, S.
Lowe, rt. hon. R.	Welby, W. E.
Lubbock, Sir J.	West, H. W.
Lyttelton, hon. C. G.	Wheelhouse, W. S. J.
Maeffie, R. A.	Winn, R.
Mackintosh, E. W.	Young, rt. hon. G.
M'Lagan, P.
M'Laren, D.	TELLERS.
Manners, rt. hon. Lord J.	Adam, W. P.
Melly, G.	Glyn, hon. G. G.

NOES.

Anderson, G.	Muntz, P. H.
Baker, R. B. W.	Onslow, G.
Brewer, Dr.	Palmer, J. H.
Bright, J. (Manchester)	Potter, E.
Brown, A. H.	Potter, T. B.
Cowen, Sir J.	Price, W. E.
Cunliffe, Sir R. A.	Richard, H.
Dilke, Sir C. W.	Roden, W. S.
Edwards, H.	Sartoris, E. J.
Eykyn, R.	Simon, Mr. Serjeant
Fitzmaurice, Lord E.	Stapleton, J.
Goldsmid, Sir F.	Tollemache, hon. F. J.
Gourley, E. T.	Tracy, hon. C. R. D.
Herbert, hon. A. E. W.	Hanbury-
Hodgson, K. D.	Villiers, rt. hon. C. P.
Holland, S.	Wedderburn, Sir D.
Illingworth, A.	White, J.
Kensington, Lord	Whitwell, J.
Lawson, Sir W.	Willyams, E. W. B.
Lewis, J. D.	Wingfield, Sir C.
M'Arthur, W.	Young, A. W.
Miall, E.
Mitchell, T. A.	TELLERS.
Morley, S.	Candlish, J.
Mundella, A. J.	Dixon, G.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Preliminary.

Clause 1 (Short title 33 & 34 Vict. c. 75) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Construction of Act) agreed to.

Expenses of Education.

Clause 3 (Repeal of and substitution of other provisions for 18 & 19 Vict. c. 34 (Denison's Act).

Mr. CANDLISH, in rising to move an Amendment, the object of which was to repeal the 25th section of the Elementary Education Act of 1870, and so getting rid of the provision which enabled school boards to pay the fees of children in cases where the parents were unable to pay the fees themselves, said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council was wrong in supposing that all those who supported the second reading of the Bill were favourable to the measure in its entirety. The fact was that they approved pretty well everything, except the particular clause now before the Committee, and that their objections were not without foundation was shown by the action of the right hon. Gentleman himself with regard to the question of compulsion. He (Mr. Candlish) maintained that the 25th clause had given rise to so many animosities and differences throughout the country that it would take a long time to put an end to them. He gathered from the silence of the Opposition on Friday evening that they were now favourable to the repeal of the clause. ["No!"] It was true that contributions to taxation were formerly made out of Imperial taxation; but now they were asked to pay for secular and sectarian education out of local taxation. He hoped that by adopting his Amendment, and virtually abolishing the 25th clause, they would satisfy the strong growing feeling of the country on this point. The hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) had with great effect twitted the Nonconformists with paying taxes for the support of denominational schools, while they objected to pay rates. The Nonconformists were opposed to the payment of taxes as well as of rates for such a purpose; but the distinction in the case of the rate was that it was imposed for the first time in the Education Act. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 17, to leave out the word "is," in order to insert the words "and section twenty-five of the principal Act are."—(Mr. Candlish.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'is' stand part of the Clause."

MR. VERNON HARCOURT moved to amend the hon. Member's (Mr. Candlish's) proposal by inserting words with the view of repealing the 17th as well as the 25th clause, for the reasons which he had stated when the Amendment of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) was under consideration.

MR. F. S. POWELL denied that the feeling of the country was in favour of the abolition of the 25th clause. On the contrary, parents throughout the country desired to have the free choice of the school to which their children should be sent. He believed it was a just and wise concession on the part of the Government to remove the elementary education of the working class from all contact with the pauper class. If they were to have compulsion, they should couple it with permission to school boards to pay the fees of poor children. He denied that the action of the 25th clause inflicted any wrong either upon the parents; or upon the conscience of the ratepayer, and as regarded the question of the pocket, he did not think that the ratepayers would grudge the £4,000 or £5,000 a-year that was spent under the clause in order to bring education to a class which it was difficult to reach.

DR. LYON PLAYFAIR said: In order not to interrupt the chances of this Bill, I gave way to my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council, although I was anxious to have spoken on the subject of the resolution of the League. I fear, however, that I may embarrass his position to some extent; because I, an old ally fighting under his flag, am now about to pass over to the enemy. As regards Clause 25, the House will permit me to explain my reasons for this change, because it has arisen by the Government having adopted for England what we have already done for Scotland. The State will, no doubt, be a great gainer by this compulsory education of paupers, which the House, to its great honour, passed with such an overwhelming majority. After all, we are only applying that compulsory education to pauper children which the Act 27 Henry VIII., cap. 25, did to vagrant children; and the object of our doing so cannot be better described than in the words of that old Act—namely—"That they may not be driven by want or incapacity into dishonest courses." The significance of what you have done will soon be apparent; for it has already convinced many Members that the 25th clause is not only unnecessary, but will in future be injurious to the interests of education. I was a strong advocate for that clause; but if you pass this Bill, I join heartily in the desire for its repeal. Let us see how this has arisen. My hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) spoke with great force and truth when he pointed out how the 3rd clause of this Bill as it was introduced, had been weakened, because the Vice President of the Council had thrust aside logic and fact in its construction, and had hugged sentiment. You might remove a political disability by an Act of Parliament; but you could not alter a fact, when you inconsistently declared that aid from the rates in payment of school fees is not parochial relief. In the Scotch Education Act we call a spade a spade, and do not tell the parent when he begs school fees from the ratepayers' pocket that he is not acting as a pauper. He is acting as a pauper, and should be told so. The only justification for compulsory education is that a parent has no more right to starve the mind of his child than he has to starve its body. If he fail by design or by misfortune to fulfil his parental duty, and asks the ratepayer to do it for him, he is essentially a pauper. I have very strong doubts whether any parent, not actually a pauper, was ever deterred from sending children to school by the mere inability to pay the school-pence. I do not believe in twopenny non-paupers. All schools are most liberal in their dealing with cases of real distress, for school managers reduce the payment in such cases to a nominal amount. It is not the 1d. or 2d. per week that prevents the child from being sent to school, but it is the loss of the 18d. per week which the child is winning for the parent by its labour or by begging in the streets. This major difficulty is clearly a subject for the Poor Law Guardians. The minor difficulty of providing school-pence to really necessitous parents who are not paupers is so insignificant in its proportions that it may well be left to private philanthropy. Even with the 25th clause in operation, it is only a question of some £5,000 annually for the whole country, or about 10s. for each inspected school. But even this small sum has chiefly been applied to pauper children, who will now be paid for by Guardians. Thus in Rochdale out of 58 children paid for under the 25th clause, 49, or 84 per cent were of the pauper class. Surely Rochdale could not have found it difficult to pay 2d. per week for these nine children, without invoking an Act of Parliament. If we take an example of a town, which already applies Denison's Act for pauper children, the operation of the 25th clause for non-paupers will be clearly shown. Leeds offers a good illustration. The fees now paid by the school board of that town amount to about £8 per quarter. In this huge metropolis, the amount paid last quarter was under £20. Surely those figures reduce the whole case for the clause to an absurdity. A more rigid administration still would lessen those figures to vanishing proportions. The Committee will recollect that there was a Select Committee of the House in 1861, called the "Destitution Education Committee." It was presided over by my right hon. Friend the Member for Devonshire (Sir Stafford Northcote) and contained among its Members Sir James Graham and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. That Committee found in ragged schools only two classes of children—real paupers who could not pay, and non-paupers who could pay at ordinary schools but went to ragged schools to shirk the fees. That Committee would support my statement that the twopenny non-pauper is a creation of the 25th clause, and does not exist in fact. These twopenny non-paupers, however, swarm in towns where the clause is loosely administered. I could name four towns, which, with uncalculating philanthropy, have thrown 10,000 children on public charity—for that it is, however you may cloak it under words of an Act of Parliament. This caprice in working the 25th clause has been its deathblow, for it has given to it a strong pauperising character. And when you find large towns and by far the largest number of school boards working without the 25th clause, and when by this Bill we provide for pauper children, I no longer can defend that clause, and shall vote for its abolition. For both sides of the House this would be a benefit. I know that many of my hon. Friends opposite desire to abolish the clause; but they will not help us to do so at the present moment, because they think it a nice bone of contention for the Liberal party. Yet it is a bone which in the hands of a Samson may be used to smite the Philistines. The clause is likely to prove infinitely more injurious to the National Church while it lasts than it is likely to prove beneficial to the Conservative party, by continuous dissension among their opponents.

Mr. Candlish

Mr. W. E. FORSTER felt it rather difficult to see as a matter of Order how this discussion should be taken. The question which the Committee had to decide was, whether the word "is" was to remain or be struck out of the clause. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish) would strike out that word and repeal the 25th clause; and if the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt) were adopted it would repeal the 17th clause. Then came the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Boston (Mr. Collins) to repeal the 26th clause. Now, he thought it would have been more convenient to raise those questions by omissions in the Schedule. The first question was as to the omission of part of Clause 17. He believed compulsion would be impossible if they said to an indigent as distinguished from a pauper parent—"You shall either be punished if you do not send your child to school, or you shall be made a pauper." If indigent parents were to be treated in that way the result would be that we should excite a very strong feeling throughout the country, and school boards would refuse to carry out compulsion. He did not dispute the logic of the hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh (Dr. Lyon Playfair) or of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett); but he must remind those Gentlemen that Parliament did not undertake to conduct its legislation on strict principles of logic. His hon. Friend (Dr. Lyon Playfair) would rely upon private generosity. Well, private generosity might come to the rescue; but in passing an Act of Parliament they could not put on the face of the Act that they had this reliance. His hon. Friend said that if the parent obtained this education relief he ought to be considered a pauper. But that argument might be pushed too far. It should not be forgotten that the whole system of State education was based upon assistance given to classes whose children were sent to school, and what right had they to draw a very strict line between the parent who got 4*d.* out of the 6*d.* spent on education and another parent who got the entire 6*d.* That was his reason for objecting to the repeal of the 25th section and of the chief part of the 17th. But he had a further one, relative to the position of the school board managers. If they gave the school boards that hard job, they must leave them some power and some discretion. His hon. Friend said he would leave them the discretion, but take from them the power of paying fees. He could not coincide in the expediency of that view, and upon those grounds he should vote against the proposition; but the chief consideration in his opinion was, what could they place in lieu of Section 17, even if the 25th clause were not in question?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish) had taunted Gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side with having changed their opinions on this subject. But the fact was they always maintained the absolute right of the parent to choose the school to which he should send his child. It was true that many of them were not in favour of direct compulsion; but his right hon. Friend (Mr. Forster) had shown such a thorough acquaintance with the subject, and such an earnest desire to pay attention to the claims of all, that they gave way, and most cordially desired that the right hon. Gentleman's experiment should have a full, fair, and complete trial. With respect to the 25th and 17th clauses, there were many practical difficulties connected with the question involved. There was one standard of poverty in Leeds, another in Manchester, another in Liverpool, and so on. Looking at education as a necessary of life, he was inclined to maintain that the assumption by the State of the duty of providing education for all the children was one which lessened the value of education in the eyes of the parent. It was primarily the duty of a parent to find education for his child, and if he could not do so, but had assistance from the State, he ought to be placed in the same position as if he came to the State for food for a starving child, for medicine for a sick child, or for relief for his wife when she was in want of it. From Leeds it was reported that the people on whose behalf school fees had been remitted were substantially of the pauper class. In Manchester an alarming condition of things had been brought about, and the board had to re-issue orders without troubling the parents to apply for them. It was believed that the board was cheated by parents who were able to pay school fees; but it was held that this was better than having the children neglected. This was a question of serious importance, because it involved the degradation of large numbers who were able to pay school fees, and who would pay them if assistance were not so readily afforded them. It was on those grounds he supported in principle the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt); but, if the 17th clause of the Act were abandoned, the 25th clause must be abandoned too, and all the clauses which gave power to boards to establish free schools. Now, that we had provided for the education of pauper children by making it the duty of Boards of Guardians to see that they were educated, he believed, if education was to be sufficiently valued, that there must be no free education except for those who were in receipt of pauper relief. The time had not come to deal properly and usefully with this part of the question, and if it had it was too late in the Session now; but the truth was the country was not aware of the importance of the question, and it would have to be considered by the country before it could be settled by the House. The time would come when it would be admitted that, except for paupers, free schooling was not beneficial to the cause of education.

MR. B. SAMUELSON said, he had hitherto resisted the repeal of the 25th clause, but he should now vote for that repeal for three reasons. First, the extension of Denison's Act very much diminished the necessity for it; second, the heartburnings that would attend its continued operation would exceed any advantages to be derived from it; third, it was possible to provide a substitute by requiring elementary schools to take, say, 5 per cent of free children; and he did not say 10 per cent, because he believed 1 per cent would meet the necessities of the case. It was not right when we were imposing new duties upon parents, that we should attach to their performance the risk of incurring the stigma of pauperism. We were inaugurating a new state of things; we were in a transition state, and it was our duty to have regard, not only to the consciences, but also to the prejudices of parents. He should support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candler).

MR. GATHORNE HARDY desired to direct attention to the singular turn of the debate and the position in which the House was placed. The representatives of the Birmingham League complained that the consciences of Nonconformists were violated by having to pay fees out of rates for children attending denominational schools, and yet there was no Amendment on the Paper to that part of the original Act which enabled Guardians to require the attendance of children at schools selected by the parents. The right of selection remained for paupers; but it was to be taken away from the indigent. The Amendment was supported by some on conscientious grounds, and by others, who did not care for conscience, on economical grounds. The conscientious ground seemed a strange one, when for years we had been making payment out of State funds to assist education, and when for a part of the time we had insisted that religious instruction must be given in the school receiving assistance. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Dixon) stated the other evening that this was only the beginning of the agitation, and that those who acted with him would oppose any grant whatever, whether out of taxes or rates, in support of denominational schools; but then, why should the Committee take a step which implied that the parent was not to select his child's school? School boards had power to lay down a scheme of religious teaching, and in many cases had done so. There were people who thought that a great deal too much, while others had thought it a great deal too little; and just as much respect ought to be paid to the consciences of both those classes of objectors as to the conscience of the ratepayer. For his own part, he believed that the ratepayer did not really entertain the objection attributed to him, but that the idea was put into his head by other persons. On the question of conscience he was unable to see any valid argument which did not equally apply to all grants made for educational purposes, whether they were raised by rates or taxes. His own conscience would not be wounded by being compelled to contribute to the support of schools in Scotland; even though Presbyterianism were taught in them, for he should pay in his capacity as a subject of the State. The hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Samuelson) could not at all appreciate the economic question. As for free admission, it tended to cause irregular attendance of the children because the parents thought that what cost them nothing must be of no great importance. [Mr. B. SAMUELSON said, he assumed compulsion.] The hon. Member really proposed to inflict compulsion not on the parents of the children, but on the managers of the voluntary schools. He would compel them to educate gratuitously certain children, with regard to whom they were under not moral, State, or parental obligation. It should be borne in mind that the school fees did not pay for the whole of the education which the children received. Where, he would ask, did the moral obligation of a parent to educate his children end, and where did the immoral obligation of the Guardians begin? Was he under a moral obligation to pay half or a quarter of the fee? [Mr. VERNON HARCOURT: To pay something.] But supposing he could not, was it not plain that he was in precisely the same position with respect to the Guardians as if he could not provide sufficient food or clothing? Could it be contended that he had fulfilled his moral obligation by paying a penny? and, he asked, how could they make attendance compulsory, if they compelled the parent to pay? It was impossible to reason the matter out logically. In country districts he did not believe the section now under consideration would come materially into operation at all; but the case would be different in crowded towns with shifting populations. There a large number of the children were like eels—they either could not be got hold of, or else they soon slipped away. It was a difficulty with respect to a portion of the population that especially required to be paid for. Was it the object of that House to educate the children, or to establish so strict a rule that the parents should never be able to evade the payment? No doubt, if these parents could be made to pay it would be a very good thing; but the experiment had been tried in the reformatories, and how many parents had been got to pay in those cases? It was necessary to give religious instruction, as the only means of reforming those who had fallen into confirmed crime; and those reformatories were almost in every case carried on by religious denominations, while the public had to pay the money for almost all the children. He did hope and trust that hon. Members who had a sincere desire for religious education would put aside sectarian prejudices in regard to this and the 25th clause, and that they would unite in seeing that these children received some religious instruction, which was the only true basis of education.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish to say a few words in regard to the Division, in consequence of the form of the Question now about to be put. I wish the Committee clearly to understand the construction which we shall put upon that Motion, and the course that we shall take if that Motion should be carried. There is one observation I may make with satisfaction, and that is—that we have not three courses, but four. There are the opponents of the 25th clause; there are the opponents of the 17th clause; there are those who are opponents of both clauses; and there are those who are the opponents of neither of the clauses. The Question to be put will not allow us directly to distinguish ourselves under our various banners, nor to make any progress towards it, so far as that Question is concerned. The Question to be put is, that "The word 'is' stand part of the Clause." The course we shall adopt in regard to that apparently colourless Motion has been well stated by my right hon. Friend. We shall vote that "is" stand part of the Motion. In that manner we intend to show that it is our wish that both clauses should be maintained. It is our desire to retain both these clauses; but it is possible that the opponents of both—whom I believe to be few—might be largely re-inforced by the opponents of one, so that in one division it might turn out that the opponents of both clauses might have a majority, although the opponents of both clauses might not object to that. After the division the three sections would find themselves in a state of hopeless confusion in the event of our being defeated. In that division we shall vote against both these Amendments. We do not think that one ought to be adopted without the other. I have said all that I have to say on this point, and I hope the attitude of the Government is perfectly intelligible. I shall now venture to make a few remarks on the case itself. With respect to the able speech of my hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Dr. Lyon Playfair), he stated that he believed it doubtful whether a person in Scotland—speaking of the tenor of the Scotch Act, which as it was the latest precedent, he took it—he considers it doubtful whether a person receiving the education for his child, and not receiving assistance in any other direction from any person whatever, was thereby constituted a pauper. It appears to me, if any one will take the trouble to read the 69th clause of the Scotch Education Act, he will see that there is no ground for doubt whatever. It is a provision for this description of grant, and entirely apart from the question of pauper relief, and there is no word in the section which can be held to bear upon the question of pauper or no pauper. The other observation I wish to make is this—if we repeal the 25th clause, we shall place the child of the indigent man—whose case was so fully stated by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down—in a worse position than the child of the pauper. Because the child of the indigent man will be subject to compulsion which is absolute; whereas the child of the pauper will be subjected to compulsion limited by the declaration which is contained in that 3rd clause. In that clause there is a distinct reservation in favour of the pauper parent, and in the case of the indigent parent there is no reservation. If, in the division which is about to take place, this state of affairs is brought up, a result will be gained that the House does not contemplate, and with which, I believe, it would be extremely ill-satisfied.

MR. BIRLEY said, that complaints having been made of the lax scale on which the Manchester and Salford School Board had given school relief, he wished to remind the House that this relief was not given merely to the indigent poor, but to paupers. It was given, moreover, with the general approval of the members of the school board, whatever might be their party politics. Lastly, he wished to remind the House that the board had been very successful in carrying out the work intrusted to it, and in a manner satisfactory to the ratepayers. With respect to the amount of school relief given by the board, it did not exceed 10 per cent of the fees paid by the other children attending the elementary schools, and the amount was not increasing.

MR. B. SAMUELSON, with reference to the statement of the Prime Minister that the repeal of the 25th clause would place the indigent parent in a worse position than the pauper, wished to remark that such would not be the case if his Amendment were adopted.

SIR DOMINIC CORRIGAN : Mr. Speaker—Sir, I rise to enter my protest very strongly against the doctrine laid down by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh University (Dr. Lyon Playfair), and also by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), that all society is to be considered as divisible solely into two classes—namely, “paupers” and “non-paupers,” and I am sorry to hear from the hon. Member for Edinburgh University that this is the Scotch law. If it be so, all I will say is, that the sooner it is amended the better. I cannot assent to such a proposition. I think there are three classes in society—namely, the “paupers,” the “poor,” or distressed industrious, and the “rich,” or the ratepayers; and that of the two first classes, the second, or “distressed industrious,” is the most deserving of relief, as far as it can be granted without abuse. Some hon. Members of this House, Sir, who have spoken before me, contend that the State should not give any educational aid, except to “paupers”—that all who receive educational aid must accept it as any other “pauper,” and having received it must lose their social status, and be subject to all the degradations and disqualifications that attach to paupers in the legal sense. I cannot subscribe to such a doctrine, and I can adduce some facts to prove, I hope, to this House that a class of persons who are not “paupers,” who are not wealthy, may nevertheless most justly be recognized as fitting to receive aid from public rates, and should not therefore be degraded as paupers. The phrase “poor persons,” as distinguished from “paupers,” occurs in the Irish Medical Poor Law Act of 1851. In the words of that Act, all “poor persons” are entitled to obtain hospital relief in workhouse hospitals, and in their own homes from dispensaries, when suffering under injury or sickness, and to be vaccinated at the public expense, but are not declared paupers in legal phraseology. They are not subject to any of the disqualifications attached to pauperism, such as being declared ineligible to sit on juries, incompetent to vote at Parliamentary and municipal elections, &c. This system has worked well in Ireland for 21 years to the entire satisfaction of all classes in Ireland. I think it applies in precedent form to the question now before us. It has worked well as to medical relief, and I do not see why it should not work well as to educational relief—namely, that the “poor persons”—that is, the industrious class—should get aid in education as in sickness, and in neither case be degraded into pauperism. If this hard-and-fast line, this rigid principle were to be laid down, that anyone availing himself in any instance or under any circumstances whatever, of parochial or public rates, were, by such act, to be forthwith declared a pauper, with all its disqualifications, I fear that even some hon. Members of this House would not escape “scot free,” for in the late epidemic visitation of the small-pox plague some hon. Members of this House, under the very natural terror of it, had themselves vaccinated at the nearest public vaccine station. Will any one here venture to say that by such act they legally constituted themselves paupers? and yet to this it must come if the principle attempted to be laid down here were to be carried out—namely, that any assistance from a public or poor rate in any and every instance forthwith, constituted the recipient a pauper. It may be said the instance I have adduced is far fetched; but the proper and only way to test a principle is by testing it by an extreme case, and the instance I have adduced I think incontestably shows that the theory attempted to be defended here is untenable. I now come to another objection to the line taken by the hon. Member for Sunderland and the hon. Member for Birmingham, who would repeal the 25th clause of the Education Act, and would not permit the poor parent to send his children to a denominational school if he received any aid from the State. If those hon. Members were consistent they should bring in a Bill to declare that no rich parents should be permitted to send their children to denominational schools; but they have never attempted and never will attempt that. They allow, for they cannot prevent it, the rich man to educate his child in a denominational school, where the child is taught religion and learning together, but if, through reverse of fortune, he becomes poor, they say to him—"We have you down now; as long as you were rich we could not interfere with you; but you are now poor, and we will bring the pressure of poverty to bear on you, and force you to send your children to our secular schools, where they shall get no religious training." This, and such as this, is the principle and action of the Nonconformists, and would be class legislation of the worst kind.

MR. CORRANCE said, they were about to divide on the Question of whether the word "is" was to be included in the Bill; and he wished to know whether, if the word "is" was held to be part of the Bill, it would preclude the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Candlish), or the hon. and learned Member for the city of Oxford (Mr. Harcourt), from proceeding with their Amendments?

THE CHAIRMAN said, it was proposed to omit the word "is" in order to insert the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sunderland. Therefore the question of the maintenance of the word "is" would first be put, and if the Committee should decide to omit it, then the hon. and learned Member for Oxford would move an Amendment upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sunderland, and in case that was carried the Question for the omission of Clause 17 would be put before the Question for the omission of Clause 25.

VISCOUNT MAHON said, he could not give his support to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sunderland.

MR. W. FOWLER said, it had been stated on behalf of the Government that if they were defeated on the word "is," both clauses would be struck out of the Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that if one clause was expunged the other would be expunged also.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 200; Noes 98: Majority 102.

AYES.

Adderley, rt. hon. Sir C.	Dowdeswell, W. E.
Akroyd, E.	Duff, M. E. G.
Amcotts, Col. W. C.	Dundas, J. C.
Amphlett, R. P.	Du Pre, C. G.
Anstruther, Sir R.	Dyke, W. H.
Arbuthnot, Major G.	Dyott, Col. R.
Arkwright, R.	Edwards, H.
Ayrton, rt. hon. A. S.	Egerton, hon. A. F.
Barclay, A. C.	Elliot, G.
Barttelot, Colonel	Enfield, Viscount
Bass, M. T.	Erskine, Admiral J. E.
Bates, E.	Ewing, A. Orr-
Baxter, rt. hon. W. E.	Feilden, H. M.
Beach, W. W. B.	Fellowes, E.
Bentinck, G. C.	Figgins, J.
Benyon, R.	Finch, G. H.
Biddulph, M.	Fitzwilliam, hon. C.
Birley, H.	W. W.
Blennerhassett, Sir R.	Fletcher, I.
Bolckow, H. W. F.	Forester, rt. hon. Gen.
Bowring, E. A.	Forster, rt. hon. W. E.
Brassey, T.	Foster, W. H.
Bright, R.	Fortescue, rt. hon. C. P.
Bruce, Lord C.	Fortescue, hon. D. F.
Bruce, rt. hon. H. A.	Fowler, R. N.
Buxton, Sir R. J.	Garnier, J. C.
Cameron, D.	Gilpin, Colonel
Campbell-Bannerman, H.	Gladstone, rt. hon. W. E.
Cardwell, rt. hon. E.	Goldney, G.
Cartwright, W. C.	Gordon, E. S.
Cavendish, Lord F. C.	Gore, J. R. O.
Cavendish, Lord G.	Gore, W. R. O.
Charley, W. T.	Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.
Clive, Col. hon. G. W.	Grant, Colonel hon. J.
Cobbett, J. M.	Gray, Colonel
Cogan, rt. hon. W. H. F.	Gray, Sir J.
Colebrooke, Sir T. E.	Gregory, G. B.
Coleridge, Sir J. D.	Greville, hon. Captain
Collins, T.	Greville-Nugent, hon. G. F.
Corrigan, Sir D.	Grey, rt. hon. Sir G.
Cowper-Temple, right hon. W.	Grey de Wilton, Vis.
Crawford, R. W.	Grieve, J. J.
Cross, R. A.	Grosvenor, Lord R.
Cubitt, G.	Guest, A. E.
Damer, Capt. Dawson.	Guest, M. J.
Davie, Sir H. R. F.	Hamilton, Lord G.
Delahunt, J.	Hardy, rt. hon. G.
Denison, C. B.	Hartington, Marq. of
Dimsdale, R.	Hay, Sir J. C. D.
Disraeli, rt. hon. B.	Henley, rt. hon. J. W.
	Henley, Lord

Sir Dominic Corrigan

Hermon, E.	O'Conor, D. M.	Henderson, J.	Norwood, C. M.
Heygate, Sir F. W.	Ogilvy, Sir J.	Herbert, hon. A. E. W.	Onslow, G.
Heygate, W. U.	Patten, rt. hon. Col. W.	Hodgson, K. D.	Otway, A. J.
Hick, J.	Peek, H. W.	Holland, S.	Palmer, J. H.
Hildyard, T. B. T.	Peel, A. W.	Holms, J.	Philips, R. N.
Hogg, J. M.	Phipps, C. P.	Illingworth, A.	Playfair, L.
Holmeade, Viscount	Pim, J.	James, H.	Potter, E.
Holt, J. M.	Plunket, hon. D. R.	Johnston, A.	Price, W. E.
Hope, A. J. B. B.	Portman, hon. W. H. B.	Kensington, Lord	Reed, C.
Hoskyns, C. Wren-	Powell, F. S.	Kinnaird, hon. A. F.	Roden, W. S.
Hughes, W. B.	Rathbone, W.	Lawrence, Sir J. C.	St. Aubyn, Sir J.
Hurst, R. H.	Ridley, M. W.	Lawrence, W.	Samuelson, B.
Hutton, J.	Round, J.	Lawson, Sir W.	Samuelson, H. B.
Jenkinson, Sir G. S.	Russell, Lord A.	Lea, T.	Sartoris, E. J.
Jessel, Sir G.	Sackville, S. G. S.	Leatham, E. A.	Sheridan, H. B.
Johnstone, Sir H.	Salt, T.	Leeman, G.	Sherriff, A. C.
Kavanagh, A. MacM.	Sandon, Viscount	Leith, J. F.	Simon, Mr. Scraight
Kennaway, Sir J. H.	Scott, Lord H. J. M. D.	Lewis, J. D.	Stapleton, J.
Kingscote, Colonel	Scourfield, J. H.	Locke, J.	Stuart, Colonel
Knatchbull-Hugessen,	Seely, C. (Nottingham)	Lubbock, Sir J.	Trevelyan, G. O.
right hon. E.	Sherlock, D.	Luak, A.	Villiers, rt. hon. C. P.
Knightley, Sir R.	Simonds, W. B.	M'Arthur, W.	Wedderburn, Sir D.
Lacon, Sir E. H. K.	Sinclair, Sir J. G. T.	M'Clure, T.	Weguelin, T. M.
Laird, J.	Smith, S. G.	M'Laren, D.	West, H. W.
Lancaster, J.	Stacpoole, W.	Martin, P. W.	White, J.
Langton, W. G.	Stanley, hon. F.	Melly, G.	Whitwell, J.
Learmonth, A.	Stansfeld, rt. hon. J.	Miall, E.	Williams, W.
Lefeuvre, G. J. S.	Stone, W. H.	Milbank, F. A.	Willyams, E. W. B.
Lennox, Lord G. G.	Storks, rt. hon. Sir H. K.	Miller, J.	Wingfield, Sir C.
Lennox, Lord H. G.	Strutt, hon. H.	Mitchell, T. A.	Young, A. W.
Liddell, hon. H. G.	Stuart, hon. H. W. V.	Morgan, G. O.	TELLERS.
Lindsay, hon. Col. C.	Sykes, C.	Morley, S.	Candlish, J.
Lowe, rt. hon. R.	Talbot, C. R. M.	Morrison, W.	Richard, H.
Lowther, J.	Talbot, J. G.	Mundella, A. J.
Lowther, hon. W.	Taylor, rt. hon. Col.
Lyttelton, hon. C. G.	Tipping, W.
Macfie, R. A.	Tolemache, Maj. W. F.
Mackintosh, E. W.	Torr, J.
M'Legan, P.	Turner, C.
Mahon, Viscount	Verney, Sir H.
Matheson, A.	Wait, W. K.
Miller, W.	Waterhouse, S.
Miles, hon. G. W.	Welby, W. E.
Mills, Sir C. H.	Wells, E.
Monckton, hon. G.	Wheelhouse, W. S. J.
Monk, C. J.	Whitbread, S.
Monsell, rt. hon. W.	Winn, R.
Morgan, hon. Major	Young, rt. hon. G.
Mowbray, rt. hon. J. R.
Munster, W. F.
Nicholson, W.
North, Colonel
O'Brien, Sir P.
	TELLERS.
	Adam, W. P.
	Glyn, hon. G. G.

NOES.

Anderson, G.	Davies, R.
Aytoun, R. S.	Dent, J. D.
Baines, E.	Dickinson, S. S.
Baker, R. B. W.	Dillwyn, L. L.
Beaumont, H. F.	Dixon, G.
Beaumont, Major F.	Eykyn, R.
Bentall, E. H.	Fawcett, H.
Brewer, Dr.	Finnie, W.
Brinckman, Captain	Fitzmaurice, Lord E.
Brogden, A.	Fothergill, R.
Brown, A. H.	Fowler, W.
Carter, R. M.	Gilpin, C.
Chadwick, D.	Goldsmid, Sir F.
Cowen, Sir J.	Goldsmid, J.
Cowper, hon. H. F.	Gourley, E. T.
Cunliffe, Sir R. A.	Graham, W.
Dalrymple, D.	Harcourt, W.G.G.V.V.

MR. J. LOWTHER gave Notice that at the proper time he should propose an Amendment to repeal the compulsory education section of the Act of 1870.

MR. WELBY moved in page 1, line 20, after "given," to insert, "by the Guardians by way of weekly or other continuing allowance." As the Bill stood, the giving of out-door relief was coupled with the condition that the child or children of the recipient should be sent to school. There were, however, cases of a temporary character—such as casual medical relief, allowances for funeral expenses, or relief where the head of the family had met with an accident, or was obliged to give up work owing to illness—in which it would work injustice if the parent was obliged for a week or fortnight to take his son from employment in which he might be earning 10s. or 12s. a-week, with the chance at the end of that short time of permanently losing his situation. The Amendment would exempt such cases only from the operation of the Act, and would render it more workable and acceptable throughout the country.

MR. CORRANCE supported the Amendment. The Amendment would remove the absurdity of making the relief of a casual pauper dependent upon the education of his child. A certificate from the school ought to be required, and he had given Notice of an Amendment to that effect; but, rather than impede the progress of the Bill, he would accept this Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was glad the hon. Member would not press his own Amendment, which would go further than he intended. He (Mr. Forster) had consulted the Poor Law authorities with regard to the proposed words, and they were of opinion that they might be safely introduced into the clause. He agreed that where the parish simply paid funeral expenses, or gave similar relief of that temporary character, that should not necessitate the attendance of the children at school; but where week after week relief was given to the parents, then the children ought to be sent to school. He suggested that it would be well to introduce after "guardians" the words "on their order."

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, Guardians would be placed in a difficulty in discriminating as to when children were to be sent to school and when they were not.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not see the opening for difficulty, seeing that the clause gave power to Guardians only while parents were in receipt of out-door relief.

MR. B. SAMUELSON said, he thought this was a complete illustration of the evils of sporadic compulsion; the moment relief ceased, the whole thing dropped to the ground.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the clause applied to out-door paupers, and inasmuch as it applied to them, it could not apply to others.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. REED observed that a very powerful argument had been offered to the Committee that day in favour of infant education. He quite concurred with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. G. Hardy) as to the value of early training in schools, and the object of the Amendment of which he had given Notice was to secure the attendance of children under five years of age. There was no power to enforce the attendance of children at that early age; but there was this important fact—that at the present time in the metropolis there were 70,440 children between three and five years of age at school. No stronger proof could be offered of the willingness of the parents on the one hand, and the readiness of the children on the other, to attend school even at that early age. The amount of instruction given might not be very great; but the amount of interest shown by the children in the infant-school training was very considerable. There were 139,000 children between the ages he had mentioned in the metropolis, 70,000 of whom attended school, leaving 69,000 who did not. He saw no reason why, when they were removing the obstacles to the education of the children of out-door paupers, they should omit all provision with reference to children between three and five years of age. He would remind the Committee that directly the school board required the attendance of the elder girl of a family she immediately brought the small child, and it was desirable, therefore, that school boards should have power to bring those children into their schools. In London particularly, where the schools were at present practically closed against them, it was most important that they should get these younger children in. He moved, in line 21, to leave out "five" and insert "three."

MR. COLLINS opposed the Amendment, on the ground that five years was the age stated in the original Act.

MR. W. E. FORSTER admitted that a great deal might be said in support of the proposal of his hon. Friend. It was at first sight very tempting; but he confessed he was afraid that, taking the country throughout, they should be overworking the thing if they attempted to put the Amendment in force. His hon. Friend said that the children liked these schools, and he (Mr. Forster) did not doubt that if the elder children attended school, a great number of the younger children would go with them without making this special provision. It would be much better to leave this matter to voluntary exertions, and not attempt to make it compulsory.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he did not think that the Government approached this important question in a proper spirit. The object of the Amendment seemed to him to be to provide nursery accommodation throughout the country.

MR. REED said, that after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman he would not press his Amendment; but when he said the elder children would bring the little ones, he (Mr. Reed) wanted to know who was to pay for them.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. B. SAMUELSON proposed to add to the clause—

"If it shall appear to a School Board that the parent of any child, such parent not being in receipt of parochial relief, is unable to pay the school fees of such child, the School Board shall have power to direct that such child shall be received free of charge, or at a reduced charge, in any Public Elementary School within the school district chosen by the parent, and the managers of such school shall be obliged to receive the same under penalty of forfeiture of its Parliamentary Grant: Provided, That no Public Elementary School, not being a School Board School, shall be called upon to receive free of charge, or at a reduced charge, any number of such children exceeding one-twentieth of the number in average attendance during the preceding school year."

Notwithstanding the retention of the 25th section, he believed this would be a useful provision.

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. MELLY objected to the Amendment, because it would impose an additional burden upon the school managers, who would have to collect a larger sum of money than was now required. Besides, the tax would fall for the most part upon one denomination—namely, the Roman Catholics, who educated so many poor children.

MR. W. E. FORSTER also thought voluntary school managers would have a right to complain of the obligation, and feared it would bring them into collision with school boards. They might be reluctant to admit waifs and strays, whose presence might involve the loss of many children of respectable artizans, through the dislike of such artizans to have their children associate with the class in question. Were it left, however, to their free action, managers might probably arrange for the admission of these children. The proposal, moreover, in country districts, with a poor labouring population, would sap the principle of payment. It would be more straightforward to refuse assistance to voluntary schools than to require their assistance in this way.

MR. SCOURFIELD objected to so intricate an Amendment being proposed without having been printed.

MR. DIXON said, he thought the opponents of the Amendment violated the principle so much insisted upon, that parents should have the right of selecting schools. A school might be a good school, of a parent's denomination, and near his home, and yet the managers were to refuse pauper and indigent children, because they did not like them. Surely we had a right to insist on public elementary schools receiving their grant on conditions which would not allow them to refuse children if there was room for them.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it was a condition that public elementary schools should not refuse children except on reasonable grounds; but it was another thing to enable boards to force schools to accept children; it would be an interference which would make management impossible.

MR. REED said, that there were 53,000 vacant places in the London schools, and he thought they ought to be utilized by adopting this Amendment. He had brought forward the subject last year; but was answered that the managers of schools did not like to receive these poor children. He only wished that his hon. Friend had got his Amendment printed, as he was sure it would have had great weight with the House. In the city of Sydney each public elementary school was compelled to receive 25 poor children, and no one knew which was the poor child and which the paying pupil. In this country many managers were already taking in poor children and teaching them with other scholars. He trusted that in some form or another means would be found for utilizing the 53,000 vacant places in the metropolis.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, he did not think the presence of the children of the indigent poor would tend to drive out paying children. His experience as a manager showed that where the master was competent, well-to-do farmers would gladly send their children at five times the ordinary fee to the same school at which the poorest class were taught. He believed that if the Amendment were carried out it would result in great benefit to the nation.

MR. BAINES supported the Amendment. He said, that as the case of Leeds had been frequently referred to, he wished to place at the disposal of the Committee some facts which illustrated the working of the existing Act for the education of the children of out-door paupers. The Guardians of Leeds had always worked Denison's Act with great effect, and there were at the present time in Leeds no less than 685 children who had been sent by them to the public elementary schools of that town. By some it was asserted that the managers of these schools would not be very willing to receive children of this class; but he could state that eight or ten of the very best schools in the town of Leeds had been for years receiving children of this class without one word of objection. In support of the plan proposed by his hon. Friend (Mr. Samuelson) he would say that it would be advantageous to all parties. It was not only a public benefit that these children should be received in these schools; but it was also a positive pecuniary advantage to the schools themselves, for they received for every child that came into the schools the Parliamentary grant. The value of that he believed to be 15*s.* a-year for each child, although some said that it was not more than 12*s.*; but, taking the lowest amount, it was infinitely better for the schools to take these children, if they had places vacant, on account of the public payment made for them. It was quite obvious that no one could put these children into schools where there were no vacant places. Now, what was the number of the children who, in a town like Leeds, were likely to apply for assistance as indigent children? The number of pauper children in the schools was 685; but the number of indigent children for whom the school board had paid the fees during the course of the past year was only 44, which at 10*s.* per annum each (the actual payment), made an aggregate of only £22 in the year. The proposal of the hon. Member (Mr. Samuelson) would solve one of the greatest difficulties that they had at present to contend with, for it was quite notorious that this was one of the questions that had kept the country in hot water and strife for years past, and it was most desirable that it should now be satisfactorily settled. He was quite sure that those gentlemen who managed the schools of the Church of England would, if they could get the children and had room for them, be willing to forego the fees. He had often himself in that House expressed his gratitude to the clergy and school managers of the Church of England, and would not willingly do anything in the nature of injustice towards them; but he would call upon them as a matter of justice, of public spirit, and of patriotism, to receive with satisfaction a proposal of this kind, which would save the public money, allay public strife, and cause a great number of children to be provided for at the least possible expense to anyone.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the proposition really was, that they should get rid of the difficulty of the education of those indigent school children by forcing voluntary school managers to take them without payment. True, they would receive the capitation grant; but the education of these children would cost at least 26*s.*, and the sum paid by the Government averaged only 12*s.* It would not be fair to try and shift this duty, which really belonged to the rate-payers, upon individuals; and an additional difficulty would arise when the school boards had to decide what children had to be admitted free, and which schools should take them. There would be this anomaly—that while schools would receive 2*½d.* per week for a pauper child they would get nothing for indigent children. His objection to the Amendment was, that it would give to the school boards that kind of control over managers which could never work well.

MR. DIXON moved the addition of the following Proviso to the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Banbury:—"And provided that there be room in such Public Elementary School."

Amendment amended, by adding, at the end thereof, the words "and provided that there be room in such Public Elementary School."—(Mr. Dixon.)

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY said, he thought the Amendment just proposed would make the confusion worse confounded. If they went to a division very few Members would know what they were voting about.

MR. B. SAMUELSON said, he was willing to accept the additional Amendment of the hon. Member for Birmingham.

MR. COLLINS remarked that more money would be paid for teaching religion in Board schools than in non-Board schools. He thought that denominational schools were already very hardly used, and the adoption of this Amendment would create an additional injustice.

MR. M'ARTHUR said, he hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Banbury would press his Amendment to a division. It was recommended by two individuals of eminence, the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), and the Bishop of Manchester.

Question put, "That the words, as amended, be added at the end of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 165: Majority 110.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.

It being now Seven of the clock, the House suspended its sitting.

The House resumed its sitting at Nine of the clock.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

BILL—(Lords.)—[BILL 237.]

(Mr. Attorney General.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN, in rising to move "That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable to extend the jurisdiction of the new Supreme Court of Appeal to the whole of the United Kingdom," said: I wish to say a few words as to the effect which has been produced by this Bill in Scotland; and I am desirous of doing so, because this has been in no way an exceptional but rather a typical example of the method in which Scotch business is conducted in this House. A very limited experience of the House would satisfy anyone that a country like Scotland, having distinct laws and institutions of her own and only a small number of Representatives, must labour under considerable disadvantages when any great measure of reform is brought before the Legislature. So great do these disadvantages appear, and so hopeless is any attempt to remove them, that I and others have come to regard with great satisfaction any agreement which may tend to assimilate the laws of Scotland to those of England. Now, one of the most important influences for bringing about a gradual assimilation of the two systems has been the existence of an Imperial Court of Appeal—a Court of Law for the whole Empire. So long as the House of Lords continued to be an Imperial Court of Appeal, the tendency of its decisions was to bring about an assimilation of this kind. But if this Bill becomes law, as far as Scotland and Ireland are concerned, I think they have good reason to complain of the manner in which they have been treated throughout the whole discussion of this Bill. When the Government first introduced the Bill in "another place," no pains appear to have been taken to ascertain what might be the views of the people of Scotland in regard to the retention of the House of Lords as a tribunal for Scotch and Irish appeals only. The opinions enunciated by distinguished gentlemen a few years ago, that the House of Lords should exist as an Imperial Court of Appeal seem to be held to settle the question entirely. A few weeks ago, some steps were taken to ascertain what might be the opinion of the Scotch people on this question. The Representatives of Scotland expressed their opinions with wonderful unanimity, and the result was that the Government resolved to accept the Amendment to the Bill which was proposed by the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie). Then came the claim of Privilege put forward by a distinguished lawyer in "another place," and although Government and all its supporters stigmatized this claim of Privilege as untenable and preposterous, still they resolved to concede the point for which the claim was set up; and once more, in accordance with the advice of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock, the course of the Government was changed, the Bill was not re-committed, and Scotland and Ireland were excluded from its scope. Now, Sir, I think that this is rather a typical than an exceptional example of the method of conducting Scotch business. In order to find an other example, we need go no further than the Rating (Liability and Value) Bill. In that case also, Scotland is left out in the cold till a more convenient season. I may be told that we are to have a measure of our own to deal with the subject; but we know by experience what that means. It will not be a great Ministerial measure, taking precedence of all others; but it will be in the hands of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate. It could not possibly be in abler hands; but unfortunately the Lord Advocate is not a Cabinet Minister; and he seems to be very little consulted when the Government Orders of the Day are arranged. No doubt, the Bill will appear on the Notice Paper; but possibly it may be discussed in the small hours of the morning, or, if it is particularly fortunate, it may get a Morning Sitting in the month of July. There is, however, one course which, if the Government would undertake to pursue, would reconcile me to the present state of affairs. If we could receive a promise from the Prime Minister that next Session a measure will be introduced affecting Scotland, and not dealing only with the case of the ultimate appeals, or even the intermediate appeals, but embracing the whole question of judicial procedure in Scotland, I think we should be satisfied for the present. And it must be borne in mind that this is a matter which has been thoroughly inquired into and reported upon recently by a Royal Commission, and that the subject has long been ripe for legislation. Should we receive an assurance of this kind, I think we might very well rest satisfied with the determination to which the Government has come, to pass this Bill, leaving out of its scope entirely both Scotland and Ireland. Failing such an assurance, it seems to me that, so far as the Scotch people are concerned, we shall be placed at a disadvantage by the Bill, and therefore I shall feel it my duty, by way of protest, to ask the opinion of the House upon the question. On the other hand, if I were to ask the House to vote upon this question, I need hardly point out that the Amendment of which I have given Notice is in no sense a hostile Amendment to the Bill, but rather a supplement to it, taking it for granted that the Bill will pass into law. If it were to be accepted by the House it need not delay the Bill at all. It would merely ensure that next Session, before the Bill should have come into legal operation, Scotland also might reap the advantage of this new tribunal of appeal which Parliament in its wisdom has thought proper to provide. I beg to move the Motion that stands in my name.

MR. ANDERSON, in seconding the Amendment, begged to say that he cordially concurred in what had been so well stated. He hoped it would not be forgotten that Scotland and Ireland had consented to forego their just claims in order to allow the Bill to become law. The House of Lords had always been considered the last Court of Appeal by the people of Scotland, and they did not wish to see any change effected; but the moment the prestige of that House was taken away in the case of English appeals, it became plain that its jurisdiction over Scotch and Irish cases must be given up. He hoped, therefore, the Government would pass a law making one Court of Appeal for the three countries, so that they might be all together, as they were before. It would never do for Scotland and Ireland to go to the House of Lords, and England to go to the Court of Appeal. Another grievance they had to complain of was that Scotch measures were never taken till 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning. He knew that there was a general opinion that Scotland by some final arrangement got whatever she wanted. He could assure the House that was far from being the opinion in Scotland. There was hardly a day in which there was not a leader in the Scotch journals stating that Scotch Members were "a set of incapables" and that they did not unite in the way in which Irish Members did. Well, it gave great annoyance to Gentlemen to make themselves troublesome; but they were urged to take a different course from what they had taken, and he hoped the Government would not forget to reward them for their past forbearance.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is desirable to extend the jurisdiction of the new Supreme Court of Appeal to the whole of the United Kingdom,"—(Sir David Wedderburn,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Sir David Wedderburn

MR. DIMSDALE, as one of those who thought that Scotch and Irish, as well as English, appeals ought to be dealt with in the same measure, would vote for the Amendment if the hon. Baronet went to a division.

MR. DELAHUNTY said, all parties ought to unite in urging upon the Government the propriety of taking up next Session the question of equality of laws with regard to trade and commerce between the three countries.

MR. GLADSTONE was sorry with regard to the complaints in reference to the treatment of Scotch business that the only consolation he could give that country was, that it was not singular in its misfortune, others being in a position just as bad. The real question was, whether Scotland was equitably treated as compared with other portions of the United Kingdom. The hon. Member thought that Scotland suffered from the Lord Advocate not being a Cabinet Minister; but the Chief Secretary for Ireland was a Cabinet Minister, and were the Irish Members better contented than the Scotch as to the manner in which their interests were upheld? The Lord Advocate, though not a Cabinet Minister, endeavoured to secure for Scotland a full share of the consideration of Parliament and the Government. As for giving a pledge that the question of Scotch Appeals should be dealt with next Session, it was a rule of his never to give an unconditional pledge six months in advance, and there was nothing as to which Parliament should be more on its guard than in allowing a Government to escape from present difficulties by drawing Bills on a future Session. But with this reservation, he would state frankly that he thought the case was one in which his hon. Friend would hardly require an assurance from him in order to satisfy the hon. Member that the Government were most anxious to follow up, extend, complete, and consummate the present measure by the extension of similar principles to Scotland and Ireland. He trusted that the hon. Member would be satisfied with that declaration and desire on the part of the Government that they would complete the entire work. It was plain that the Government regarded their work as incomplete till the present scheme was extended to the other two countries, so that one and the same system of judicature might prevail over every portion of the United Kingdom.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (1870)
AMENDMENT, &c. (re-committed) BILL.
(Mr. William Edward Forster, Mr. Secretary Bruce.)

[BILL 245.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 4 (Power of Local Government Board as to relief and guardians) agreed to.

Clause 5 (Confirmation of orders as to elections, &c.) agreed to.

Clause 6 (Election of school board).

MR. DIXON moved, in page 2, line 31, before "the principal Act," to insert "a school board shall be formed in every school district or united school district, and."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not accept the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 (Overseers to allow inspection of rate books and otherwise assist returning officers) agreed to.

Clause 8 (Amendment of 33 & 34 Vict. c. 75, s. 91, as to corrupt practices at elections).

MR. F. S. POWELL moved, in page 3, line 24, to leave out the words disqualifying "from holding any municipal office" a person convicted of bribery under this Act. He thought such a provision went beyond the scope of the Bill.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the provision was the same as that contained in the Municipal Corporation Act and other statutes, and it was considered desirable that it should be extended to elections under the Elementary Education Act.

MR. F. S. POWELL considered the explanation satisfactory.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 9 agreed to.

*Miscellaneous Amendments of 33 & 34
Vict. c. 75.*

Clause 10 (Amendment of 33 & 34
Vict. c. 75. s. 57, as to loans).

MR. COLLINS (for Mr. SALT) moved an Amendment, to the effect that the Education Department should not consent to an increase of school accommodation unless it was proved to their satisfaction that the proposed buildings were necessary to supply sufficient school accommodation for the district. He understood there had been instances in which, notwithstanding the existing schools were sufficient for the neighbourhood, the boards erected schools in opposition to them. He considered the time for the repayment of loans should be reduced from 50 to 30 years.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 7, after the word "fund," to insert the words "Provided always, That no such consent of the Education Department shall be granted unless proof be given to their satisfaction that the additional school accommodation which it is proposed to provide, and the works which it is proposed to execute, are necessary in order to supply a sufficient amount of public school accommodation for the district."—(Mr. Collins.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. MUNDELLA opposed the Amendment. He objected to any such limitation being put upon the power and discretion of the school boards. There might be ample accommodation in a large place, and yet the bulk of it might be on one side of the town, where it was least required, and not on the side requiring it most; so that if additional accommodation were not provided in the poor quarter children might be compelled to walk two or three miles to school, or to go without education. He thought, too, the limitation of eight cubic feet too small for each pupil.

MR. SCOURFIELD believed that any body of men required to be limited in expending other people's money. Hitherto they had been discussing matters of sentiment; but now they had come to the administrative part of the Bill, and its success depended on the caution, the care, and the forbearance with which it was carried out. The remark made in one of the daily papers respecting an eminent Prelate, whose untimely death they all deplored, that though he might have many opponents he had no enemies, was applicable to the right hon. Gentleman. But whatever might be the kindness and courtesy of the right hon. Gentleman, the subordinate members of the Education Department were not necessarily equally conspicuous for those qualities. He wished to check extravagant expenditure, whether promoted by boards, or by the Education Department. They were building accommodation for more children than they had really to get educated. In one place a demand was made for accommodation for 450 children, and when the inhabitants remonstrated, on the ground that there were not so many children in the district, they were told in reply that it was likely large numbers of the labouring classes would settle there and beget families, so that the Department, not content with administration had recourse to prophecy. This was, however, only one of a series of demands, and it should be remembered that the people who found the money for the education of children expected to be treated with forbearance by the Department. Hon. Gentlemen would, perhaps, remember the story about St. Cecilia, who on one occasion while playing the organ was surrounded by a troop of little cherubs. When the saint thought they were fatigued she politely asked them to sit down—"Asseyez vous, mes enfants;" but their reply was—"Nous vous remercions, Mademoiselle, mais nous n'avons pas de quoi." This was very much the case with the children for whom school accommodation was provided. They were all floating in the air as it were, and when the schools were built they, like St. Cecilia's visitors, had not de quoi to sit down. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) caused some amusement a year or two ago by remarking that there was generally in every family a "superior person" who gave advice to everybody and whom everybody disliked. It appeared to him that the officers of the Education Department belonged to this class of "superior persons." In many cases good intentions had been utterly shipwrecked on the rocks of mal-administration.

MR. W. E. FORSTER defended the conduct of the officers of the Department. They had had a most difficult task to carry out in seeing that proper educational facilities were provided throughout the country, and he believed they had executed their work in a very creditable manner. He felt confident that if the good-humoured remarks of his hon. Friend could be quite justified, there would be much greater dissatisfaction than actually existed in the country. The Amendment proposed to add to, rather than diminish, the duties of the Department; because they had hitherto thought that when application was made for their consent to a loan it should not be refused, unless very serious reasons existed against that course. He must entirely demur to the further duty proposed by the Amendment being forced on the Department. The real power to limit the action of school boards should be the feeling of their own constituents. Upon the whole, school boards had shown anxiety for the interests of their districts and the interests of education. They might occasionally have spent too much, but the parties to guard against that were their own constituents. If the Department were to attempt to control them the local bodies would refuse to be so fettered, and this would produce a result exactly the reverse of that which was desired by the Mover of the Amendment.

Mr. WHEELHOUSE quite agreed with what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. There had been remonstrances made in some districts by local bodies against planting school boards in places in which there was already sufficient school accommodation, and they did not want to put their hands into the pockets of the ratepayers unnecessarily. There was not always an accurate knowledge in London with respect to local requirements.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, that in the particular case alluded to—namely, that of Leeds, the Government took care to obtain local knowledge not only from the memorialists, but from the Inspector.

Mr. GATHORNE HARDY said, that it was an important question whether a Board elected for a short period should be allowed a practically unlimited power in laying enormous burdens upon the ratepayers which could not be shaken off for 50 years. There ought to be some check, and the Vice President ought not only in the first instance to inquire into the sufficiency of the school accommodation, but should keep up that supervision, so that the parishes should not be overloaded with pecuniary liabilities.

MR. CARTER explained that in the case of Bramley, near Leeds, there was a very rich incumbent who had erected schools, but the Dissenters refused to send their children there; and that was the reason that the school board of Leeds, which was quite impartial, established a school; and no sooner was it opened, than it had an attendance of 300 children.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, that by the Act, if a district required an inquiry, they would have to pay the expenses.

MR. HEYGATE considered that the action of the Education Department had not been in accordance with the pledges given by the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council, to the effect that "the greatest care should be taken in carrying out the new system not to destroy in building up—not to injure the existing system in establishing a new one." He had only, in proof of this, to point to the case which he had alluded to on a former occasion, in which—there being ample school accommodation—the school board had proposed to provide a new school at the expense of the ratepayers, the effect being that if the additional school proposed by the school board at Keyham were to be sanctioned and built, there would be school accommodation for 374 children out of a population of 749; nor had the ratepayers any security against wasteful expenditure after they had once elected a school board. In the case in point, three of the five members of the school board who had voted for the new school had not even a £10 qualification, and yet they were attempting to saddle the parish for 50 years with the interest of a loan—to be repaid out of the rates to which they contributed next to nothing—for a purpose declared by the Government Inspectors to be unnecessary! This state of things was calculated to create discontent among the ratepayers. The proposition of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt) hit a serious blot in the Act of 1870, and unless it were removed by some such Amendment as was now proposed, it would cause justifiable indignation throughout the country, and seriously retard the cause of education which his right hon. Friend had so much at heart.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the case in question was a much disputed one, and was the subject of a voluminous correspondence and much consideration. Inquiry had been made into the sufficiency of the school accommodation, and it was maintained by the board that a school for 180 or 140 children was required, and they provided one for 150. If the Amendment were passed to a division he hoped the Committee would reject it.

MR. SALT replied to the objections made to the proposal, and contended that the Amendment was absolutely necessary in the interest of the rate-payers, in order to deprive the school board of the power of taxing the people without any appeal, for the establishment of additional school accommodation in places where it was not required. These country school boards had in reality power to inflict taxes not only of 3d. in the pound, but of 6d. or 9d., or even 2s. or 3s. in the pound. Unless some modification was made in the present system the cause of education would become unpopular in the country, and matters would be placed in a worse position than they were before.

Question put.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 71; Noses 116: Majority 45.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 11 to 19, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 20 (Notices for purposes of Elementary Education Acts).

MR. J. G. TALBOT objected to the penalty of 40s. which the clause imposed for tearing down or defacing any new notice affixed in pursuance of the Act.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the reason why the penalty was put in was, that the notices had in some cases been torn down, and it seemed desirable to prevent it.

MR. REED remarked that in the metropolis it required constant supervision to see that they were not torn down, in order that the conditions of the Act might be complied with.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 21 and 22 agreed to.

Clause 23 (Regulations as to legal proceedings).

MR. DIXON moved, in page 8, to leave out sub-section 3, which said that—

"In any proceeding for an offence under a by-law the Court may, instead of inflicting a penalty, make any order directing that the child shall attend school, and that if he fail so to do, the person on whom such order is made shall pay a penalty not exceeding the penalty to which he is liable for failing to comply with the by-law."

He moved the Amendment at the request of the clerk to the school board at Birmingham, who had been a school-master for a great number of years, and who was of opinion that the law would be made so lenient by the sub-section that it would not be sufficiently effective on the parents of the children. An offence against it was to be proved at the expense of the school board, and when that was done it was a mockery, which only encouraged further neglect of the law if the parent was again to be only warned.

MR. CANDLISH said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would retain the sub-section, as it was desirable that cases under the Act coming before a magistrate should be dealt with leniently, since otherwise the Act itself would be defeated.

MR. W. E. FORSTER observed, that the sub-section had been introduced in the hope and belief that the mere warning by the magistrate, without the actual punishment, would be sufficient to enforce attention for the future to the requirements of the Act.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he was satisfied that to attempt to enforce compulsion with severity would not operate satisfactorily. There were domestic afflictions and difficulties, and if they were to enforce the attendance of children of the poor five days of the week, the result would be a breaking down of the Act. What they wanted to do was to secure, as far as possible, the co-operation of all the schools, and to induce the largest possible number of children to attend the schools. He wished that a power was given under the Act to say to the children—"You must attend school three days in the week;" and in thus giving them an opportunity to work half time they would secure better attendances, and turn the children out in a manner better able to get their bread than they would be if forced to attend five days in the week.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he had been for some time considering whether it would not be possible to have some such arrangement as that now proposed—a mode which was in accordance with the views of a distinguished lady who felt very great interest in the education of the children of the poor—he meant Lady Burdett Coutts. If his hon. Friend would draw out a scheme, or if the London School Board would take the matter in hand, he would promise to give it his most serious consideration previous to preparing the next Code. With regard to the Amendment, he hoped after what had taken place his hon. Friend would not press it.

Mr. J. G. TALBOT said, by-law 4 of the London School Board provided that children over ten receiving permission from the School Board need only attend half time, or during ten hours a-week instead of 20, or five school times a-week instead of ten. The Vicar of Sydenham (Mr. Legge) said in reference to this, that of children, both boys and girls, above ten years of age, beneficially and necessarily employed, there was no lack in a place like Sydenham; but either the schools must lose considerably by admitting them—because they could not ordinarily make up the requisite attendance—or they must close their doors upon them. The latter course would be a hardship to the children, and would inevitably bring the school into collision with the School Board, whose visitor would be constantly bringing the parents before the Board to answer for their neglect. He was, therefore, glad to have heard the promise of the right hon. Gentleman.

. Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, there was a sub-section in the clause—sub-section 4—which proposed to give power to the magistrate to impose a penalty of 20s. on a poor man who failed to send his child to school. It was, in fact, a proviso to enforce compulsory education, and he would move an Amendment to strike that proviso out of the Bill. This was an Act to impose penalties on parties who did not comply with a by-law to send their children to school. He ventured to say that such a proviso as that would never be acted upon; and he did not think it would be to the credit of the House to allow such a proviso to pass. Let them look at the penalty of 20s. enforced upon a poor man. Every hon. Gentleman must know that to enforce such a penalty must result in sending the poor man to the treadmill.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, to leave out from the word "by-law," in line 22, to the words "A certificate," in line 30.—(Mr. James Lowther.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought the sense of the House and the country was greatly in favour of these compulsory clauses. Where a parent would not produce his child it was very reasonable that a fine of 20s. should be enforced on the parent. His hon. Friend said that implied the power of sending the parent to the treadmill; but there was nothing about treadmill in the clause. He did not think the clause ought to be altered.

Mr. HERMON asked, whether it was intended to leave the option to the magistrates of summoning either the employer or the parent; because it would be extremely unfair in many cases that the employer should be summoned in the first instance?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not think the clause ought to be altered. It merely provided that the child must be got at if he did not attend school, and the matter might fairly be left to the discretion of the magistrates.

Mr. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, the parent was to be fined if he failed to produce the child before the magistrate.

Mr. SCOURFIELD said, if this compulsory clause were really intended to be enforced, many parents must be sent to gaol. But if it was not intended to be enforced, the House ought not to pass it.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON said, a fine of 20s. could not be enforced on poor parents without inflicting great hardship. After what they had heard of the want of discretion in clerical magistrates, it was only right that the point should be defined.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, the magistrates would have the power of inflicting a fine of not exceeding 20s., therefore they could impose a fine of only 6d.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON observed that even so, the cost might be 10*s.* or 13*s.*, and as many a poor parent of a large family could not pay that amount, he would be sent to gaol in default of payment.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, it would be better to make the fine 5*s.* instead of 20*s.*

MR. COLLINS said, the fine was not an arbitrary one, but was only to be imposed when a parent wilfully defied the law.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 138 ; Noes 36 : Majority 102.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS moved to leave out sub-section 7, as it threw the burden of proof upon the parent that the school to which he sent his children was a public elementary school under the Act. He quite agreed in the object of the sub-section, that parents should not be allowed to evade the penalties under the Act by sending their children to a sham school. The proof, however, should rest on the prosecutor.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, to leave out from the word "age," in line 40, to the word "Where," in page 9, line 7.—(Mr. Cross.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. VERNON HARCOURT said, he would support the Amendment if the hon. Gentleman divided on it, as it was now the rule to try and get rid of all such ridiculous doctrines as that a man should be considered innocent until he was proved guilty. They had improved upon all that, and last week passed a Bill (the Salmon Fisheries Bill) which required a man in whose possession pickled salmon was found to account for how he came by it, and to show when and where it was caught, and where it had been pickled.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked how the prosecutor could prove the charge against parents? He could only show that the school was inefficient by obtaining a right of entry to it at all times, which would be a greater invasion of liberty than could result from the provision objected to. He hoped the Amendment would not be persevered with considering the lateness of the hour, and the desire to advance the Bill at that period of the Session.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY observed that the Amendment did not at all strike at the principle of the clause. It would only throw the burden of proof that the school was efficient upon the prosecutor, not upon the defendant, and that was the principle of the criminal law.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 90 ; Noes 69 : Majority 21.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

MR. DICKINSON moved after Clause 4 to insert the following clause:—(Constitution of committees of boards of management).

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the clause was one of enormous scope, which would, if carried out completely alter the constitution of the voluntary schools. He would appeal to the hon. Member whether such a clause could fairly be entertained at this period of the Session, and whether it would not be better to endeavour to attain the end proposed by means of a separate Bill?

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HEYGATE moved the following clause :—

(Three years to be substituted for twelve months.)

"And whereas by Schedule 2, Part 2, of 'The Elementary Education Act, 1870,' it is provided as follows:—' If a resolution for application for a School Board is rejected, the resolution shall not be again proposed until the lapse of twelve months from the date of such rejection,' and it is expedient to extend the said period of twelve months to three years: Be it enacted, 'That three years shall be substituted for twelve months in the above mentioned part of the said Schedule.'

Clause—(Mr. Heygate,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. W. E. FORSTER opposed the clause, on the ground that it would only apply to one or two places, and no case had been made out for it. There were few places in which people would like to keep up excitement in a village by making repeated application for a school board after they had been once or twice rejected.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 39; Noes 96: Majority 57.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE moved the following clause:—(Conditions of Parliamentary grant to schools other than board schools).

Clause—(Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be read a second time.”

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought the clause could not be entertained in this Bill, inasmuch as it reopened all the difficult questions which had been settled by the Act, and if they were re-opened additional Amendments would have to be made. No doubt, there were arguments for and against the clause; but it was not desirable to reopen the question to which it referred.

MR. GLADSTONE expressed a hope that the clause would not be pressed, as no discussion which could now be raised on the matter of public educational grants would be satisfactory.

MR. DIXON said, he would support the clause.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he must put the House to the trouble of a division, in order that there might be some record of its opinion on the subject.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 85: Majority 61.

MR. REED moved the following clause:—(Returns by Schools to School Boards).

MR. F. S. POWELL opposed the clause on the ground that it would entail additional trouble on the masters, who were already under-paid.

MR. W. E. FORSTER supported the clause on the ground that its object was to increase attendance at the schools.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. M'ARTHUR moved the following clause:—(Conditions on which School Board may accept transfer of school).

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not accept the clause, and hoped it would not be pressed to a division.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

VOL. CCXVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. MUNDELLA said, he would not now move the insertion of a clause which he had intended to move in reference to compulsory attendance at school; but he gave Notice that early next Session he should move for leave to bring in a Bill to enforce compulsion generally.

House resumed.

Bill reported: as amended, to be considered upon Thursday.

CONSTABULARY FORCE (IRELAND) BILL.

Resolution [July 21] reported;

“That it is expedient to authorise an increased rate of Pay, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, to the Members of the Royal Irish Constabulary, not exceeding such sums as may be fixed by any Act of the present Session.”

Resolution agreed to:—Bill ordered to be brought in by The Marquess of HARTINGTON and Mr. Secretary BRUCE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 257.]

DEFENCE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Bill for the amendment of the Defence Acts 1842 and 1860, ordered to be brought in by MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Mr. Secretary CARDWELL, and Sir HENRY STOKES.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 255.]

LOCAL RATES AND TAXES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, Bill to amend in certain respects the Law relating to Local Rates and Taxes in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by The LORD ADVOCATE and Mr. Secretary BRUCE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 256.]

House adjourned at Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 23rd July, 1873.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEES—Report—Wild Birds Protection [No. 338]; Cape of Good Hope and Zanzibar Mail Contract [No. 334].

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolution reported—Ordered—Post Office Telegraph Services [Loan]*.

Ordered—First Reading—East India (Great Southern of India and Carnatic Railway Companies)* [259].

First Reading—Representative Councils in Counties (Ireland)* [268].

Second Reading—Household Franchise (Counties)* [3], debate adjourned; Colonial Church* [248].

Third Reading—Extradition Act (1870) Amendment* [220], and passed.

Withdrawn—Burials* [9]; Settled Estates* [71]; General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Acts Amendment* [200]; Railways Amalgamation* [227].

ORDER—ALTERATION OF QUESTIONS
BY THE CLERKS AT THE TABLE.
THE PERSIAN CONCESSIONS TO BARON
REUTER.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE, in rising to ask the Question of which he had given Notice, said, that as it concerned a concession of a most important character granted by the Shah of Persia to Baron Reuter, he had inquired of the Speaker whether, under the pressing and extraordinary circumstances of the case, and considering that they had arrived at nearly the end of the Session, he (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) might be allowed to take an exceptional course in moving the Adjournment of the House, in order to be enabled to enter into a statement upon the subject. The right hon. Gentleman, with his usual courtesy, assented to his doing so. Having, however, subsequently spoken to the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in relation to the matter, the noble Lord expressed the opinion that, inasmuch as the question was of an extremely important character, it ought not to be brought forward in the absence of the Prime Minister. Under those circumstances, he (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) must decline going fully into the subject until Friday next, when he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would be present and be able to give the House a satisfactory explanation upon it. In the meantime the Speaker struck out of his Question as he had framed it two words—namely, “extraordinary” and “dangerous.” He should be sorry to insert any words in his Question that would be deemed objectionable by the Speaker of that House; but as to the word “extraordinary,” he had the high authority of Lord Carnarvon for its use, that noble Lord having used the word in “another place” in connection with the subject; and although he believed there was no man of higher honour or intelligence, or more thoroughly English in his principles than Baron Reuter, nevertheless he considered the word “dangerous” applicable to the powers which the concession would confer upon that gentleman. [Cries of “Order!”]

MR. SPEAKER said, that the words referred to by the hon. Member were struck out of his Question by his authority, as inconsistent with the Rules of the House applicable to Questions; consequently, the hon. Member could not then comment upon them.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE then asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government had any knowledge of the negotiations entered into between the Shah of Persia and Baron Reuter before these concessions were granted to the latter; and, whether any Correspondence has taken place between the Foreign Office and Her Majesty's Minister at Teheran respecting these concessions; and, if so, whether it will be laid upon the Table in time to enable the House to consider it before the Prorogation?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: Sir, Baron Reuter says in his letter of 12th September, 1872, just laid before Parliament, that about a month before that date he had privately communicated to Lord Granville the fact of a concession having been granted him. The concession in question bears date July 25th, 1872. The first intimation received by the Foreign Office of this concession being in agitation was contained in a despatch from Teheran, dated July 9th, and received in the Foreign Office, August 30th, 1872. A Copy of this concession was received at the Foreign Office on the 28th October, in a Despatch bearing date September 12th.

BELGIUM—ARMY RE-ORGANIZATION.
QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have interchanged any communications with the Belgian Government, or any of the other powers who have guaranteed with this Country the neutrality of Belgium, on the subject of the proposed re-organization of the Military Forces of Belgium; and, if so, whether there is any objection to such Communication and any other Correspondence on the subject being laid upon the Table of the House?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD: I believe, Sir, that no communications or correspondence have passed between Her Majesty's Government and the Belgian Government, or any of the other Powers who have guaranteed with this country the neutrality of Belgium, on the subject of the proposed re-organization of the military Forces of Belgium.

AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS MEETING—ALLEGED DISTURBANCES AT LEIGHTON BUZZARD.—QUESTION.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he has power to take any notice of the riotous proceedings which have been lately described in the daily papers as having recently occurred at Leighton Buzzard in Bedfordshire, on the occasion of a meeting of agricultural labourers, where it is alleged that the speakers were assaulted by a number of intoxicated persons, and a riot took place in consequence ; and if his attention has been called to the conduct of the local police, who it is stated not only did not protect the speakers from violence, but previous to the meeting had announced their intention of not doing so, while one of the constables by offering to fight one of the speakers materially increased the disturbance ; and, if it is not in his power to take any notice of the above facts, to ask if he will next Session introduce some measure giving the Home Office the necessary powers to protect the right of public meeting, and thereby remove the belief which is being extensively disseminated by various persons in some of the country districts that an attempt is being made to put down the movement at present going on among the agricultural labourers by physical force, with the connivance of the local authorities ?

MR. BRUCE : Sir, as I only saw this Question a few moments before entering the House, I cannot give a very specific answer to it. I do not know upon what authority the noble Lord has made this statement ; but I presume that no hon. Member of the House would put such a Question without having taken some pains to ascertain the accuracy of the statements contained in it. I may remind the House that these statements in newspapers are often only the embodiment of flying rumours, and on examination are frequently found to be very inaccurate. I have received no information on the subject, nor do I know whether the statements on which the noble Lord relies are well founded ; but assuming for the moment the accuracy of the statements just made,

I may say that the Secretary of State has power to notice riotous proceedings of this kind, and that if such proceedings occur it is his duty to call the attention of the magistrates to them. Further, if the police behave in the manner here imputed to them, the persons who have so misconducted themselves are subject to punishment, and those who are responsible for not preventing a riot which they might have prevented would be subject to the observation of the magistrates, which would be severe or otherwise, according to the circumstances of the case. The noble Lord also asks whether I am prepared to bring in a Bill next Session to afford further protection to the right of public meeting, and to enlarge the powers of the Home Office for that purpose. My answer is that I cannot undertake to bring in any such Bill, nor do I believe there is any necessity for it. The local authorities are armed with sufficient powers to prevent or suppress a riot. Wherever a riot is apprehended, the magistrates are enabled to call in aid all the force of the county ; and if that is not sufficient, they may communicate with the Home Office to obtain assistance from the central authority. If the magistrates neglect their duty, or if they connive at the riot or refuse to take the necessary means to suppress it, it is in my power, and in the power of any resident in the district, to make representations on the subject to the Lord Chancellor, and no doubt the Lord Chancellor would do his duty in the matter.

HOUSEHOLD FRANCHISE (COUNTIES) BILL—[Bill 3.]

(Mr. Trevelyan, Sir John Trelawny, Sir Robert Anstruther, Mr. Osborne Morgan, Mr. Andrew Johnston.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. TREVELYAN, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said : Sir, when a private Member rises to introduce a Bill which proposes to enact changes that will seriously modify the character of our electoral bodies, and through them may ultimately affect the composition of the House itself, he must, indeed, be presumptuous if the magnitude of the task which he has undertaken, as contrasted with his own abilities and his own personal standing and reputation, does not weigh upon his mind far more painfully than can be expressed in words of conventional apology. It is fortunate, therefore, that every great constitutional measure which has in the end been carried into law by the action of a responsible Ministry has been preceded by Bills and Resolutions, and, in most cases, by a long succession of Bills and Resolutions, brought forward by unofficial Members of Parliament. But it is, as far as I am concerned, a piece of still greater good fortune that the most important of all such measures—the Reform Bill of 1867—was, as far as the reduction of the franchise was in question, prefaced by Bills introduced by two hon. Gentlemen who are still amongst us, and whose character for disinterested and unpretending devotion to public ends is so well established and so fully recognized on both sides of this House, that it may serve at once as an example and a protection to all their imitators and successors. Henceforward anyone who directs the attention of Parliament to a question of first-class importance must earn his excuse by doing his best to copy the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Locke King) and the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) in subordinating himself to his work, and in endeavouring to compensate for his deficiencies by sincerity of purpose. The two hon. Gentlemen were successful, but were successful in different measures; for, while the hon. Member for East Surrey got something, but only something, less than he asked, the hon. Member for Leeds had his cup filled to overflowing, for he not only enlisted on his side the Leaders of his own party, but obtained from the late Government much more than he demanded—I will not say more than he desired. But the thoroughness with which the work of enfranchisement was accomplished in one-half of the country has placed the other half in a position relatively so disadvantageous, that probably no man believes that the present state of things will continue for another generation, and very few, that it will continue for another Parliament. The Reform Bill of 1867 gave every householder in towns, or rather in some towns, the prospect of a vote. It gave the householders in the counties nothing but a sense of grievous inequality. It is hardly too much to say that, as far as England outside the boundary of Parliamentary boroughs is concerned, there would have been less discontent and less desire for further legislation if there had been no Reform Bill at all. For, by the manner in which it dealt with the franchise in boroughs, the Legislature sanctioned the principle that any man who can by manual labour pay his way and keep a house over the head of himself and his family, is entitled to a voice in the government of the country. And having declared that opinion in the solemn and unmistakeable language of the statute book, Parliament then, by way of a boon to the country population, proceeded to increase by some 25 or 30 per cent the number of electors of the class which had always possessed the franchise, but refused to go beyond that point, and did not, intentionally and of design, impart the suffrage to a single member of the class which it was enfranchising wholesale in the boroughs. I say, intentionally, because in the year 1866, when introducing his Reform Bill, the present Prime Minister, who was then most deeply interested in detecting and consulting the intentions of the House, made some remarks which are in a high degree authoritative, coming as they did from him at a time when his mind was full of a mass of electoral statistics such as never was collected before, and such as we may safely venture to say will never be collected again. Wishing to reconcile a somewhat reluctant audience to his £14 rental franchise, which was pretty nearly the equivalent of £12 rating occupation which now exists, he said—

“The county constituency, when thus enlarged, will be a middle-class constituency in the same sense—nay, rather more strictly than under the present system. The number of persons properly belonging to the working classes, and having a £14 rental franchise will be so very small in number as not to be worth taking into calculation. Or, at the least, I may say that such portion of the newly-enfranchised body as may belong to the labouring class will be tenants of small holdings in land in immediate connection with the landed class.”—
[3 Hansard, clxxii. 30.]

Sir, those words will never be forgotten until the day that household suffrage in the counties becomes the law of this land; for they mean that while in a borough a man who has no ambition beyond that of doing his duty in the station to which he has been called may enjoy the full privileges of a citizen, his neighbour on the other side of an im-ginary line must forego those privileges, unless by a series of efforts which the vast majority of honest hard-working men do not feel themselves called upon to make, he can contrive to struggle out of his own class into the class above him. Now, Sir, it is this contrast of political status between persons whose social rank and whose calling is precisely the same, the special product and manufacture of our recent legislation, which is apt to escape the notice of those who criticize by anticipation the Bill which I have the honour of laying before the House. Almost every article which I have read in the Press, almost every conversation which has been addressed to me in the Lobbies, turns exclusively on the fitness of the agricultural labourer for the exercise of political power. But, Sir, the question of the county franchise never was a question exclusively of the rural labourer, and is becoming less and less so as years go on. In the year 1851 the population residing in the urban districts outside the boundaries of Parliamentary boroughs amounted to 1,700,000. Much was done to correct this state of things by the Reform Bill of 1867. Many large towns received Members of their own. Many populous suburbs were incorporated in existing borough constituencies. And yet, in spite of all that was effected by means of the creation of new seats and the extension of boundaries, the population of urban districts within the counties had risen at the last Census to stand upon 2,250,000. But, more than that, the Registrar General bids us remark, that even among the districts nominally described as rural, many, as indicated by their rapid growth, are assuming the character of towns. I am speaking below the mark in asserting that there are 3,000,000 of the inhabitants of England and Wales who are not country-folk, but townspeople in their habits, their character, their circumstances, in their ways of thought, in everything in short, except in the possession of the rate-paying household suffrage. Why should an operative who spins cotton at Bury have a vote, while the operative who spins cotton at Heywood is without one? Take the case of the population who live along the high ground that lies to the west of the Valley of the Irwell. Why should a man be deprived of a voice in the government of the country because he happens to live in that portion of the long street which happens to be called Pendleton or Farnworth, instead of in that portion which happens to be called Bolton or Manchester? Take the case of the coal districts of Durham and Northumberland; and it is more important to take their case, because among the miners in that part of the country there is arising a very genuine dissatisfaction at their exclusion from the franchise—a movement which has spontaneously grown from among themselves, and is in no manner due to suggestion or provocation from without. I know a colliery where, if a man lived at one end of a tramway down which he runs coals to the quay, he would vote as a householder, and if he lived at the other he could only vote by turning himself into a landowner. These are difficulties which it requires no great ability or observation to start, but which it will take a great deal of acuteness to answer. It is all very well to say it is only a part of the question. It is a very large part indeed. We have to meet the case of what is virtually a town population of 3,000,000 who are labouring under a disqualification always irksome, and now made intolerable by comparison with others; a disqualification for which it is simply impossible to give them any reason, except that it is there, and they must put up with it. That is not the tone which the House is at present accustomed to use towards the working classes; and I therefore look forward with much interest to know how it will deal with a matter affecting a population larger than that of Canada, four times as large as that of Victoria, and ten times as large as that of Cape Colony, for which we have been painfully elaborating a Constitution replete with all the latest notions of political justice and civil equality. There is one method of dealing with it, to which resort has already been had more than once—which is sure to be recommended in the course of this debate—but to which it is earnestly to be hoped that the House will refuse a favourable hearing; and that is by redistribution of seats, to gather our whole town population within the limits of Parliamentary boroughs. It is a remedy which has already been carried much too far; but to carry it further would be to expose the nation to positive peril. It is bad to draw a hard-and-fast line between districts where political power rests with the masses, and districts where it rests with the upper and middle classes; but it would be much worse if that line exactly represented the boundary of town and country. In the long run, the countries in which Government is least stable are those where the idea has become rooted that the public opinion of the nation rests exclusively in the great cities. Anyone who has carefully watched the political difficulties in neighbouring countries will know that there are weighty objections against turning men into voters by means of a wholesale creation of boroughs. A much safer remedy lies in the pages of this Bill. But hon. Members will, no doubt answer that though they are willing to enfranchise the urban population of the United Kingdom, they shrink from opening a door which would let in the entire body of agricultural labourers. Now, Sir, that is an objection which will come with a tolerable good grace from this side of the House, but of which, I am sure, we shall hear nothing from the others. There are, speaking broadly, two theories of local government in this country, both of which have had, and are having, the fairest of all trials; because, at this very moment, half the nation is living under the one, and half under the other. In the rural districts justice is administered by magistrates, in whose nomination the community has no voice, direct or indirect: county finance is managed by an ex officio Board in England, and an ad valorem Board in Scotland. Education is in the hands of benevolent and zealous men, who are under no responsibility, except to the central Government. In the towns the representatives of the people have the absolute control of finance and administration; the representatives of the people, under the Privy Council, are entrusted with the care of elementary instruction; and it is not too much to say that the community at large has an indirect means of expressing a preference in the choice of some at least among their magistrates.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. TREVELYAN resumed: It is this latter system which finds favour with the party to which I have the honour to belong, and from time to time we endeavour to introduce certain features of it into the government of the rural districts, an attempt which is resisted by the other great party in the State, whose Members maintain that the existing state of things is the best suited of the two to the circumstances of our rural population, which under it continues to be prosperous, moral, and contented. But, Sir, hon. Gentlemen opposite have granted the franchise to the householder of the towns, who is living under a system which I will not say they disapprove, but which, at any rate, they do not regard with any special predilection. I am therefore justified in taking it for granted that they will, with greater satisfaction and a stronger sense of public security, give the franchise to the rural householder, who has existed for centuries under the influences of a system of which they are the admirers and defenders. But on our side of the House there is a good deal of uneasiness as to the results of admitting the peasantry into the electoral ranks. Now, I hope to be able to show hon. Gentlemen that there is no sufficient foundation for this feeling. To begin with, at least one-fourth of the new electors—I believe considerably more, but at least one-fourth—will not be peasants at all, but will be townspeople, to all intents and purposes, of exactly the same class and character as the present borough electors. And however high our opinion may be of those borough electors, it would be the basest and most culpable flattery towards our own constituents to pretend than in our Northern counties the labourers who till the soil are less enlightened than the labourers who work in the factories. The exclusion of the Northumbrian labourer from the pale of citizenship on the ground of personal unfitness is a standing practical libel. In solid material comfort the Northumbrian hind need envy no operative in any part of the world. As to his interest in public affairs, read the daily newspapers which you find in every cottage, and see what sort of intellectual and political nourishment he is accustomed to. Compare them with the farrago of murders and divorce cases which make up the weekly budget—that which goes by the name of news in some of our Southern towns, and then say why the habitual reader of such trash is more able to give a reason for the political faith that is in him than a shepherd or drover who takes in The

Mr. Trevelyan

Daily Newcastle Chronicle and The Weekly Scotsman. The hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) and other hon. Gentlemen are bringing in a Bill for extending the principle of the Factory Acts to the agricultural districts. I honour them for it, but as far as Northumberland is concerned, their labours are superfluous; for the Northumbrian parent is a factory law to himself. There, employers and employed alike tacitly agree that no child shall be set to work before the age of 10. And the Northumbrian gives a fair indication of his fitness for having a voice in the affairs of his country, by the common sense which he shows in the management of his own. A recent complete re-arrangement of the labour question in a large part of the county not only proves that the objects aimed at by the men were of a far more solid and honourable nature than the grasping of more money to spend in the public-house, but that the negotiation was carried through successfully with the perfect good-will of the farmers themselves. And, as in Northumberland, so it is with slight variations in Cumberland, Durham, and the other Northern counties. In Yorkshire the physical comfort of the labourer in the rural districts is fully equal to that of the South country artizan; and Yorkshire alone contains more than one-tenth of the population which this Bill proposes to enfranchise. After reading the Report of Mr. Portman, the agricultural sub-Commissioner, on the state of education in Yorkshire, I was interested in observing the answer made by one of the Members for a division of the West Riding to a question put to him at a public meeting. A constituent asked why a householder who lived in the country was not as fit to vote as a householder who lived in the town; and the hon. Member, with great discretion, said that he objected to having the question put in that shape. But that is the shape in which Yorkshiremen and Northumbrians, and people in other counties too, are beginning to put it, and some answer will have to be found. And that answer must be a better one, and more founded on justice and the facts of the case, than that in giving the franchise to Northumberland and Durham we shall at the same time, be under the necessity of giving it to Dorsetshire and Wiltshire. For, so far from the extension of household suffrage to Dorsetshire and Wiltshire being an evil and a danger, there are weighty reasons which may be adduced to prove that it is a good in itself, good for Parliament, good for the State, best of all for the interests of the agricultural labourer. It would be good for Parliament, because as matters stand at present, there is a permanent danger of our rendering ourselves liable to the most serious charge that can be brought against a Representative body—a want of knowledge of the people whom it professes to represent. Let me refer for a moment to the movement among the agricultural labourers which began about a twelvemonth back. On the very eve of the commencement of that movement there was no mention in this House of the existence of any general discontent in the rural districts. You may read our Journals during the first part of last Session without finding any symptom whatever that within a few weeks every tongue and pen would be employed in discussing the grievances of the agricultural labourer. If so general and spontaneous a movement was brewing among the artizans of the towns, we may be sure that we should not be left to learn about it from the newspapers. It is not that Parliament has a less kindly feeling towards the country than towards the town population—I am inclined to think it is rather the other way; but whenever you give the vote to any class of men you constitute their Parliamentary Representative into an unpaid Commissioner for inquiring into their wishes, their opinions, and their condition; and as we refuse the vote to the agricultural population, we must try to get at those wishes through the medium of a paid Commission, which is the same thing as saying that, except in a superficial manner, we shall not get at them at all. But such little as we are able to ascertain respecting the real sentiments of the classes who have no vote proves to us how seriously they are misunderstood. If there is one statement more than another which has been dinned into our ears in season and out of season, it is that compulsory education cannot be applied universally, because the cottagers are averse to sending their children to school when they might be at work. But that statement, so disheartening to all who have the interest of the country at heart, is expressly contradicted by the Bishop of Manchester, when Sub-Commissioner, who tells us officially that it is the almost unanimous opinion of the labouring men, that continuous school attendance up to the age of 12 or 13 would be no detriment to a boy with a view to his future career as a farm labourer. We have been told that in the West Country labourers like to be paid part—I am sorry to say a very large part—of their wages in cider. On the other hand, one of the first resolutions passed by labour unions in country districts is, that no part of a man's wages shall be paid in spirituous liquor. Nor need there necessarily be anything incompatible between the two statements. A man is often a higher being in the exercise of a public function than as an individual; and the same poor fellow who will drink away his wife and children's bread in selfish gratification, if you give him the franchise will only be too glad of the opportunity of rising above himself, and will send to Parliament a Member pledged to remove from him the temptation of the cider truck. These are indications which prove to hon. Gentlemen that we may safely give the franchise not only to such places as Barnsley, and Keighley, and Croydon, and Luton, and Wallsend, and Accrington; not only to such counties as Cumberland and Cheshire, where wages are good and education high; but that even in what may be called the depressed districts of England there would be a great deal more to be learned than to be feared from the new voters. And the qualities in which they are deficient the possession of the franchise will give them; for there is no such potent instrument of education, whether we look to its direct or its indirect influence. The experience of all countries is that public instruction follows fast on the heels of the suffrage. In Canada the first consequence of the institution of universal suffrage was universal and obligatory education. And the impulse which the extension of the vote gives to popular education does not confine itself to the passing of a single law. In countries where the popular element is supreme, the richer and more influential part of the community have the strongest motives to see that the people are fit to govern themselves; and the consequence is that for many years past those classes across the Atlantic have been devoting themselves to this task with a persistency and an energy of which we had no idea till the year 1867 had come and gone, and till the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us that it was high time to see about educating our masters. It is, therefore, in the character of educationists, as well as in that of politicians, that we may press forward this Bill; and in fact still more so, for I feel far more certain of the effect the household suffrage will produce on the education of the people than upon the composition of this House. We do not know on which side of the House Members returned under the new system will sit; but we do know the Representatives would continue to be chosen from much the same class which provides them at present. If this Bill becomes law, the Representatives for the counties will be the same men, but they will be actuated by new ideas and new motives, for they will have the strongest of all incentives to ascertain and express the feelings of great masses of men who at this moment have absolutely no constitutional method whatever for making known their wishes and their grievances. Some hon. Friends of mine have urged me to postpone the Bill until we see the effect of the Ballot upon the existing county constituencies. They point to the recent elections in Scotland, to the increasing boldness of the resolutions passed by Farmers' Clubs and Chambers of Agriculture, and prophesy that if we let the leaven work, within 10 years we shall have 50 tenant-farmers sitting on these benches; but that by bringing forward this measure on our side of the House, we frighten and alienate the farmers, who consider their interests as opposed to those of the labourers. But, Sir, so far from the interests of the farmers and labourers being opposed, I believe that Mr. Cobden never uttered a truer word, than when he said that the welfare of the tenantry and the labourers is identical, and that the last can never be prosperous where the former is degraded. And, Sir, if it was indeed the case that the interests of the two classes are opposite, and their feelings hostile, then the fact that the farmers were beginning to choose class Representatives for the purpose of pushing their own views, would be a contingency which would lay upon us a moral obligation of passing this Bill without the delay of a single Session. Representative government is a rough and ready method of doing justice all round by providing all contending interests with a fair field and no favour; and the more we extend its limits, the harder it is for those who are excluded from the competition. I do not wish to renew the debate of last Session, and to show how with regard to the three great classes of measures which are devised for the benefit of those who look for their comfort to legislative enactments to an extent which the rich find it hard to realize—the country is already on average a generation behind the town. The Truck Acts, the Artizans' and Labourers' Dwelling Acts, and the Acts for preserving the children of the poor from premature and excessive labour have not even arrived at the dignity of being a dead letter in the rural districts. They do not even profess to apply there. No one can deny that in some parts of rural England there exists misery, pauperism, and vice disgraceful to the country and the century; and if we can have the advantage of hearing those who suffer speak for themselves through the mouth of their Representatives; if by the magic power of the suffrage the labourer of the country can attract to his sad condition some part of the interest that has hitherto been lavished almost exclusively on the workmen of the towns, I, for one, would gladly purchase that result by the sacrifice of not a few votes in a party division in this House. And now, Sir, I will briefly call attention to the provisions of this Bill, which, short as it is, I think will, on examination, be found adequate to accomplish the purposes put forth in the Preamble. In the first place, it has been asked why the whole United Kingdom has not been included in the same Bill? The answer is, that the franchise is of all questions that with regard to which it is wise to proceed on the old lines, and the great Acts of modern days for registration and enfranchisement, and the Bills introduced by private Members which were the forerunners of those Acts, deal separately with England and Scotland; and anyone who has attempted to master the intricacies, and I will even say the iniquities of English registration will allow that it is not Scotland that has suffered by the separation. And though the prospects of this Bill may lose something by leaving out Scotland, which some think is the strongest part of our case, those who hold that opinion will for the same reason rest assured that if the English Bill becomes law, on the a fortiori, or rather the a dissuiri principle, household suffrage is as good as assured to Scotland. And now as to the number of householders who will probably, or approximately, be enfranchised by the clause. There are nearly 2,500,000 inhabited houses in the counties of England and Wales, at the rate of 1 in 5 of the population. There are nearly 1,850,000 inhabited houses in boroughs, at the rate of 1 to 6 of the population. The 1,850,000 houses in the boroughs provide about 1,200,000 electors who vote as householders, or about 65 per cent. on the houses, and in the same ratio the householding voters in the counties would amount to 1,625,000. But there are already 800,000 county electors on the register who have to be deducted from this number, with the exception of those residing within the boundaries of boroughs, who amount to about 1 in 10 of the number. Deducting, then, the householders in counties who already possess votes, we arrive at the conclusion that this Bill would increase the constituency in round numbers by 900,000 names. These are large figures, but in matters relating to the franchise we have become accustomed to deal with large figures. We have learned by a happy experience to look not at the numbers of the electors, but at the character of the Representatives whom they elect; and we rely on the authority of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) who, speaking with just pride of his own work, tells us that Members of Parliament are not worse citizens, and not more reckless legislators than they were when one elector voted for them where three vote now. The next two clauses of the Bill need no remark here, and will be more fitly discussed in Committee; though it is hardly necessary to observe to a House, many Members of which had the pleasure of listening to the present Prime Minister's speeches in 1867, that household suffrage would be a delusion unless we extend to the compounder in counties the full franchise and privileges that by the Act of 1869 are secured to the compounder in boroughs. The 4th clause, however, requires a short explanation. Hon.

Members for Northern boroughs will not need to be reminded that great discomfort has been caused during the last autumn by the wholesale disfranchisement of a portion of the mining population who held their houses in part payment of wages. There was a difference of opinion among the revising barristers; but where the decision was given for exclusion, the ground was that a clause had been inserted in the leases—not with any political motive, but in order to give the landlord absolute command over his property—that the occupier was "not to be deemed a tenant." The case was strengthened by the irregularity in some cases of the arrangement between the overseer and the owner; a state of things which the 2nd sub-section is designed to meet. The 3rd sub-section is less local in its operation, and will remedy a state of the law under which large numbers of persons whom Parliament intended to be voters have been unable to obtain the suffrage, while others hold it only on the condition of constant uncertainty. There is a class of voters whom it has often been proposed to disfranchise, and those are the faggot voters, under whatever qualification they are entered. Sometimes it is a fictitious rent-charge; sometimes an old house which claims to belong to so many landlords that, if they all resided in it at once, the local Board of Health would have to interfere. Sometimes a county is astonished at the appearance of a score of mysterious strangers, standing all at once in the relation of feudal superiors to some great nobleman of the neighbourhood. Sir, we have been told—and you may be very sure that we shall be told again in the course of this debate, that the franchise in the boroughs represents numbers, and the franchise in the counties represents property. But what a burlesque of the representation of property it is when a life-rent of £10 a-year is sold for a bill of £200, bearing interest at 5 per cent, the interest of which is set off against the payment of the rent; when, by means of feu-duties, you can make £1,000 worth of votes on a pig-stye—when a troop of attorneys and land agents, and gamekeepers from the other end of the island may swamp the real property, the real persons, the real public opinion of a community. There are two means of dealing with this evil—either by enforcing residence within the county, or, by an analogy with boroughs, within seven miles of its borders; and, secondly, by destroying the qualifications under which the creation of faggot votes is carried on. In answer to hon. Gentlemen who have urged me to adopt one or another of these expedients, I reply that this is an enfranchising and not a disfranchising Bill. The Bill, however, will deal with faggot voting, indirectly indeed, but most efficaciously—for if it passes into law, instead of the faggot voters swamping the rightful electors, the rightful electors will finally and irretrievably swamp the faggot voters. Besides, the ultimate action of the measure will infallibly be to sweep away all by-franchises, whatever their antiquity. Household suffrage, like Aaron's rod, will swallow up the other qualifications, which at present can be defended on the ground that they admit fresh names to the electoral roll; but which, when every householder has the suffrage, will have no effect but that of giving more than one vote to the same person. And now, Sir, having explained both the provisions and the omissions of the Bill, I shall stand no longer in the way of a discussion which cannot fail to command great and general interest. Last year my hon. Friend the Member for East Devon (Sir John Kennaway) upbraided me with having started a subject which would be an obstacle in the way of more pressing questions already ripe for legislation. Sir, you might as well propound the theory that by increasing the horse-power of a factory you would diminish its production. Any one who compares the legislative outturn of the last four Sessions with the four years, aye, and the 20 years that preceded them, will, whatever his opinion may be as to the nature and the need of that legislation, allow that the time we spent over the Reform Bills of 1867 and 1868 has borne fruit many times over in the magnitude of our undertakings. The hon. Friend to whom I refer has put his name to a Bill for regulating the employment of children in agriculture. That Bill is very good as far as it goes; but if he came here speaking in the name not of 10,000 farmers and freeholders, but of 20,000 householders, I am confident that he would be asking us to give him direct instead of indirect compulsion, enforced by an effective and not a feeble and uncertain machinery; and whether the consideration of this question is, or is not, to delay Public Business for years is a matter which the House has in its own hands. It is impossible to saddle any individual with the responsibility of a measure which the nature of things is rapidly and irresistibly bringing to the front. We draw a distinction almost unknown in any constitutional country, or in our own colonies; which did not exist even here in its present invidious and aggravated form before 1867, between the inhabitants of the towns and the inhabitants of rural England. We brand our village population as if they were political pagans, just as their class were accounted religious pagans in the days of the Roman Empire. At a time when we must soon be debating questions nearly concerning their welfare, bodily, intellectual, and religious, we cut ourselves off from all acquaintance with their own opinions as to their own affairs, except such as comes to us filtered through the medium of the speeches and resolutions of self-elected politicians, responsible to no colleagues, and to no constituency, and all this we do, not because there is any reason for it in logic, in justice, or in common sense, but because it was so ruled by the wisdom of your ancestors—that is to say, because 400 years ago one of the worst Parliaments that ever sat in this country robbed the county inhabitants of their votes on the ground that—to use the very words of the Act—"being people of small substance and no value, they pretended a voice equivalent with the most worthy knights and esquires." There is a story told of Napoleon, who, in the park at Fontainebleau, noticed a sentry walking to and fro in the middle of a grass plot. On inquiry, he ascertained that in the time of Louis XIV. some young trees had been planted there, and a soldier was placed to keep off the cows. The plantation had grown up, had withered, and all traces of it had disappeared, but the sentry walked there still; and so we keep up a difference between the town and the county franchise, because in 1429 a Parliament of Henry VI. was afraid of our rural population. That fear has altogether passed away. What danger is there for us in giving the franchise to the householders? They are the heads of families, the industrious stationary population of the country. We are accustomed to assert that the mass of our people are loyal to the Queen, tender of the rights of property, attached to the institutions under which they have the happiness to live. Well, then, by voting for the Bill, we shall prove that we believe what we say. By voting against it, we shall show that we use this language from the teeth outwards. In the hope that I have said nothing to damage a cause with regard to which my desire is that the day may come quickly for me to deliver it over to more potent and responsible hands, I beg to commit the Bill to the earnest consideration of the House.

Mr. Trevelyan

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN, in seconding the Motion, as a county Member, said, if he had consulted his own convenience, or his own pocket, that would have been the last Bill he would have touched. County constituencies were already unwieldy enough; but inasmuch as that was a change which must come sooner or later, he thought the House might as well make up its mind. There were a number of large towns which were represented only in the counties. Why should not St. Helens, for instance, with 45,000 inhabitants, have a Representative as much as Warrington with 35,000 inhabitants? There was a time when the peasant belonged to a different class and represented a different interest; but now the urban population had overflowed into the country; and, given the same amount of education, he very much doubted whether the rural population were not quite as much to be trusted as the urban population. No danger was to be anticipated from the change proposed in the Bill; but he did see danger in 900,000 or 1,000,000 men brooding over real or imaginary grievances, and whose wrongs were aggravated by the thought that they were not to have a voice in redressing them. There had been no Sheffield rattening in the counties, or strikes, except the miserable Chipping Norton affair, of which the less said the better, and in foreign countries the peasant population who exercised the franchise were the Conservative backbone of the country. The household Parliament had turned out very much the same as former Parliaments, notwithstanding the dreary forebodings which some people had indulged in. He was not afraid of extending household suffrage, therefore, to the counties, but he thought there was some danger in excluding such a large number of men from exercising the privilege. He should support the measure, if it was pressed to a division; but he did not think it was a question which could be properly dealt with in the last few weeks of an expiring Session; it was, however, a question which was rapidly coming to the front, and one which would have to be taken in hand before very long.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the second time."—(Mr. Trevelyan.)

MR. COLLINS, in rising to move "the Previous Question," said, that the House appeared to be placed in a position of some difficulty looking at the various Amendments placed upon the Paper against the second reading of the Bill. The fate of the attempts so frequently made by the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Locke King) and the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) showed that it was utterly useless to propose to deal with a question of this nature in a fragmentary manner, as the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) now desired to do. That that was so was made evident even more recently, for in spite of the eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, the House refused in 1866 to consider the Representation of the People Bill and the Redistribution of Seats Bill separately, and not only referred both measures to the same Committee, but gave that Committee power to weld them into one. He deprecated piece-meal legislation on so important a question; for the fact was, that in dealing with the re-constitution of that House, they had to consider not only who should vote, but to take care that there was a fair representation for all the classes, for the different sentiments, and even the different prejudices that were to be found in this great community. No one could look at the present House without to some degree deplored the loss of the small boroughs which frequently returned not only men of ability, but of independence of thought. They did not require a set of dummies sent to that House to carry out the views of an ignorant constituency meeting in the market places, or a parcel of delegates returned for the purpose of repealing the Contagious Diseases Acts, or carrying other particular crotchetts. Therefore, in considering a question of that kind they had to bear in mind that it formed only a small portion of a subject far greater, and required, if dealt with at all, to be dealt with as a whole. The consequence was, that a question of this nature brought on at that period of the Session converted the House of Commons into little if anything more than a debating society. He would, however, adduce a few instances to show how unfairly the Bill, if carried, would operate if it were unaccompanied by any proposal for the re-distribution of seats. Lincolnshire, for example, with a town population of 92,000 inhabitants, returned eight borough Members, or one Member to about 11,500 inhabitants. Its rural population of 343,000, with only six Members, would only have two Members to every 115,000 of the population. In the North Riding of Yorkshire, again, there were 10 borough Members to a population of 160,000, or one to every 16,000. The rural population of 186,000 was, however, represented at the rate of one Member to every 93,000. The West Riding of Yorkshire, too, presented a glaring example of the inequality of the town and the county representations. In the West Riding there was a very considerable agricultural population, although it was small in comparison with that devoted to manufactures. The town population amounted to 887,000, and the representation was one Member to 55,000 inhabitants in round numbers; the average of the representation of the rural population, amounting to 928,000 inhabitants, by county Members, was, in round numbers, one Member to 150,000 inhabitants. In fact, the population was represented in the comparison, as in the ratio of three for boroughs to one for counties. The admission of Representatives of the labouring classes to Parliament had been deprecated; but he was not prepared to express a belief that the effect would not be beneficial. In fact, he thought that the agricultural labourer might be properly called in to modify the power which the present law gave to the tenant-farmers. The question would have to be grappled with some time or other. He thought the country would, to a certain extent, keep up the distinction between county and borough Members; but that the tendency would be to diminish the number of borough Members and increase the number of the county Representatives. If we added 1,000,000 electors to the county roll by making the constituencies homogeneous, it was impossible to suppose that the matter could stop there. The great point was to have a system of representation that would send to Parliament the best men to make the laws; but the question was not an easy one, nor so simple as the hon. Member for the Border Burghs affected to believe. It was a question, in fact, that would not be settled until two or three Parliaments had tried their hands at it, and two or three Governments had come into office for the purpose and gone out. They must look the whole question in the face. The representation, both in counties and towns, he admitted, was eminently unsatisfactory, as it had become merely a representation of bare majorities. A large majority of the county Members sat on that side of the House, and in nearly every county both Members belonged to the same party, the effect of extending the franchise having been to make people vote more and more on the party ticket. We might advantageously take a lesson from the Americans, who had adopted a much more scientific mode of representation than ours. The matter could not be dealt with satisfactorily without a moderate re-distribution of seats, as a large number of small towns would have to be disfranchised, while additional Members would have to be given to the larger towns and the larger counties. If a Bill like the present should ever pass, together with a measure for the re-distribution of seats, he believed and hoped that we should have to adopt the cumulative vote, or some other method of proportional representation. The metropolis returned 22 Members for a population of about 3,000,000 in the metropolitan borough area. London, it might be said, was divided into 10 wards; and at the last Election, with one exception, that of Westminster, it returned Members all of a colour. There was no minority clause in operation, except with reference to the City; and under no circumstance ought the Metropolis to have the same proportion as those more distant places, for the London Members were always on the spot, while others had a distance, sometimes a long one, to travel to the House. Taking the metropolis widely, he did not think he would be overstating the case, if he said that one-third of the electors of the metropolis would vote for Members on the Conservative side of the House. Supposing they divided Marylebone, or the Tower Hamlets, or St. Pancras, or separated Chelsea from Hammersmith, the result of increasing the number of Members without at the same time representing the minorities would be only an aggravation of the existing evil. That was not all, however, for according to Dod, of the four divisions into which Lancashire was divided, 25,700 electors voted for the eight hon. Gentlemen who sat for Lancashire, and 23,000 voted for those who would have sat on the Opposition benches. So that 25,700 electors returned eight Members, and 23,000 returned none. That was a system which could not be prolonged. In the three last elections in the West Riding of Yorkshire, in each case the election had been carried by the smallest possible number. In the Eastern Division, with 16,000 or 17,000 electors, the election was won by 88 votes. In the Southern Division of Yorkshire, with a constituency of 16,000, the election was won by eight votes, and in the Northern Division by 44. Other constituencies were placed in a similar position, and to pass a measure, therefore, like the present, which would give a county, say, Lancashire for instance, more Members under the present unjust system, would be to render that system unworkable, and therefore put an end to its continuance. That system was only tolerable because it came down to them from antiquity; and if it should ever be a question of really improving the representation, it would have to be done on an entirely different plan, and something more than bare majorities must be represented. The proposal to turn the town population into the rural, and have equal electoral districts, was one, in his opinion, that ought not to be entertained. When the question came to be earnestly taken in hand, it must be dealt with on an entirely new principle, and it would then be necessary that reference should be had, not to a mere numerical majority, but to the wishes of constituencies generally. He refused to regard that as a question of the mere extension of the suffrage. In fact, the hon. and learned Member for Denbigh gave up the whole point when he said that although he should be ready to vote for the Bill, he hoped it would not be pressed to a division; thereby implying that except so far as it was a step to something more, the present measure was a mere abstract Resolution. He was sure the hon. Member for the Border Burghs would not like the question to be settled on any such unsatisfactory grounds. The time would doubtless arrive when public opinion would be ripe for another Reform Bill; but whenever the subject was dealt with at all, it must be dealt with in one comprehensive Bill, having reference to the representation of England, Ireland, and Scotland. In conclusion, he begged now to submit the Motion of which he had given Notice.

Mr. Osborne Morgan

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY, in seconding the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Boston, said, he had placed on the Notice Paper a Motion for discharging the Order for the Second Reading of the Bill, because he did not think the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) could really have intended to proceed with a Bill of that character at so late a period of the Session. He now thought, however, that instead of persevering with his own Motion, the better course would be for him to second the Amendment just moved by his hon. and learned Friend. Hon. Members had good cause to complain of being invited, towards the close of the Session, to discuss a question which at the present moment was a purely speculative one, more especially when it was considered that the discussion could lead to no practical result, as any legislative action upon it would be purely out of the question. The only thing it could possibly lead to, might be some political feeling outside the House, but he did not think it would be much. He did not think the agitation in the rural districts would be permanent, or that there was any real desire to re-open the question of reform. No doubt, there were men outside the boroughs who had held large meetings at which resolutions had been passed in favour of the Bill, and who felt themselves to be superior in intellect to many of the householders in boroughs who now enjoyed the franchise; but they were not in a hurry, for they knew the franchise would come in good time, and they were willing to wait. There were many more pressing matters than that which Parliament was called upon to deal with. Moreover, whenever the question of Parliamentary Reform was re-opened, it must be met in a different manner from that of 10 or 12 years ago. The Parliament had admitted the householders in boroughs to the suffrage, and the country had not suffered from the change. He had always had a feeling of confidence in the people, and had never been an anti-Reformer; but with regard to the present time, he thought there never was greater cause for prudence, and it was most undesirable for the House to rush precipitately into a measure of that kind. So large a number would be enfranchised by such a Bill that it would be necessary to consider the question of the re-distribution of seats at the same time. It was impossible that the existing inequalities and anomalies of boroughs and counties should continue. When the hon. Member for the Border Burghs, however, asked the House on a July afternoon to pass such a Bill as that, he had no choice but to vote for the hon. and learned Member for Boston. At the same time, he had no wish permanently to exclude the labourers, and when the time came for enfranchising them, they must be admitted heartily to the suffrage. He could not, however, admit that the agricultural labourer had been ignored in the recent legislation because he had no vote. Many measures had been adopted by the Legislature during the last few years which had raised him in the social scale and increased his home comforts. Complaint had been made that the Artizans' Dwellings Act had not been extended to the country, but the dwellings of labourers in the rural districts would compare favourably with those in towns. A clergyman at the East-end of London told him the other day that porters and others frequently came up from the Eastern Counties to obtain employment on the railway in London. When they came up, they, their wives, and children were healthy and strong, but after they had lived in London for a short time they pined away, especially the children, so that he hardly knew them again. The great object of the promoters of the Bill seemed to be to put on more steam, in order to obtain more legislation. Indeed, the case was like that of the captain of the steam-boat in America, who, when racing, put more steam on, and sat upon the safety-valve, with what result might easily be imagined. In order to avoid such a catastrophe he hoped that the House would be inclined to wait a little in the matter, he being anxious at the same time that all parties should be represented in a fair and proper manner.

Previous Question proposed, "That that Question be now put." — (Mr. Collins.)

MR. CADOGAN said, he represented a district of Wiltshire which contained nearly one-third of the whole population of the county—it comprised 31 parishes, 30 of which were rural and one urban—that of Swindon, where some 20,000 or 25,000 highly paid operatives in the employment of the Great Western Railway were resident. No constituency could have left greater liberty of action to their Member than his constituency had done, and he totally denied that if the franchise were extended to the labourers, they would be sending up mere delegates to Parliament. The question whether the agricultural labourer ought not to have the same franchise as his neighbours in the towns was one that required immediate settlement. When they considered to what a remarkable extent of late the intellect and freedom of the agricultural labourer had come out, he contended that he ought to, and that sooner or later he would. He believed that the public activity on this subject would increase, instead of dying out as the Conservatives fondly hoped. Hon. Members opposite deceived themselves, if they thought the public were not awake to the importance of the subject, and that the Bill was a mere clap-trap, or a pop-gun fired off on a Wednesday's sitting for political purposes.

MR. BEACH said, it was always inconvenient to attach a specific pecuniary qualification to the franchise, because whatever the amount, there were certain to be Motions in favour of reducing it to a smaller sum. Thus, in the course of years, there was found to be no convenient resting-place between the £10 franchise and household suffrage. When the freehold franchise for counties was supplemented by the Chandos Clause, further reductions in the £50 tenancy were inevitable. Hitherto the chief qualification in counties was the freehold franchise, and it was surprising how many of the agricultural working population already possessed the franchise. When he said that, he did not grudge them the privilege, the chief objection was to their number. Admitting that still larger numbers were as competent to exercise the franchise as the householders in towns, he could not help seeing that the result of admitting these vast numbers would be that the county constituencies would become so unwieldy that they could not be managed in any way. The difficulty of conveying voters to the poll in counties was already very great, and, seeing the deficiency of polling-places, how could the householders in agricultural villages be asked to walk several miles, and give up a whole day's work in order to exercise the franchise? It was now illegal to ask these men to eat or drink anything. Directly the Legislature made the franchise uniform in towns and counties, it must face the question of electoral re-distribution. What they wanted was, that the present constituencies should be supplemented and strengthened, but not altogether swamped. The present constituencies, however, were scarcely prepared to be swept away and to see the whole of England carved out into squares. Some means must be found to lessen the preponderance of mere numbers. Whether it would be desirable to adopt the minority vote or the cumulative vote might be matter for consideration; but it would be absolutely necessary to secure the fair representation of minorities throughout the length and breadth of the land. It was not by stirring up agitation on behalf of the agricultural labourer that his interests could be best promoted, but by promoting good feeling between the tenants and labourers, and by admitting the latter from time to time to a share in the representation.

MR. DIXON congratulated the hon. Member who had introduced the Bill, on the manner in which it had been received. He rejoiced to hear so many admissions from hon. Gentlemen opposite that the agricultural labourers were as well fitted to exercise the franchise as the artizans in towns. He was glad to hear that, because, of course, they did not expect to carry the Bill that Session, and such an expression of opinion would facilitate the progress of that kind of legislation in the future. He could assure those hon. Members that there was not the slightest jealousy of the counties on the part of the towns. He would also admit that whenever the House approached the question of a fair distribution of political power, a very much larger number of Members must be given to the counties. If the agricultural labourers were, as alleged, as intelligent as the artizans in towns and wanted the franchise, it would only be a gracious act on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite to concede to them a position of equality in regard to Parliamentary elections. It was a question of time only. In that conviction he was strengthened by what he had seen and heard at recent meetings in connection with the new movement, which had originated with the labourers themselves, Mr. Arch, their President, being an agricultural labourer. He believed that the present discussion would hasten the settlement of that important question. With respect to equal electoral districts, he would say that just in proportion as the franchise was fairly and justly distributed in all parts of the country, rural and urban, so would the real mind of the people be represented within that House, and its power and influence as a Legislative Body would be increased.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) knows that he has not the slightest chance of carrying the Bill beyond its present stage. I do not blame him for bringing the question on so late in the Session, because he was prevented from doing it earlier by the prospect of a change of Government; but, then, the House has this to consider—Can it afford to devote day after day to the function of a mere debating club? This morning an hon. Member called your attention, Sir, to the fact of there not being 40 Members present in the House. I have no doubt that he intended no disrespect to the House. Still, he was open to reproof, because by the Rules of the House, even though there may not be 40 Members present, you, Sir, must remain in that Chair until 4 o'clock; and I think that no stronger testimony could be borne to the sense of the House, that it is wasting its time to-day, than the

